Senator FRASER.—No. Another Government has intervened. The two men at the head of the present Government, Mr. Allan McLean and Mr. Reid, are now Ministers in the Federal Parliament, and I have confidence in both of them. The objection that I have to the Trades Hall Party—I prefer always to refer to them as the Trades Hall Party—

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The socialistic party.

Senator FRASER.—I answer that by saying that I may be a Socialist myself to a certain extent, and under certain conditions. Some say that because the State here owns the railways, we are Socialists. We could not have railways in this State or in any other State of the Commonwealth, or we could have but only a very few, if they had to be constructed by private enterprise. There might be a line between here and Geelong, and a few other such lines. My complaint against the Trades Hall Party, as I prefer to call them, is that so far as I can judge—I hope I am wrong—they are against the Empire.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator is entirely wrong.

Senator FRASER.—Did they support the sending of a contingent to South Africa?

Senator HIGGS.—They only desire that there should be a series of republics instead of a monarchy!

Senator FRASER.—Exactly. Senator Higgs has openly declared on the floor of this Chamber that he desires a republic. I, on the contrary, am for the flag. I hold up not one but both hands for the flag. Honorable senators opposite do not hold up their hands at all for the flag; they are all for a republic.

Senator GUTHRIE.—We have a new flag for the Commonwealth.

Senator FRASER.—Yes, but it is a part of the old flag. It is a part of the flag which floats over some hundreds of millions of human beings, and over more liberty and more that is sacred and good than the flag of any other nation on God's earth. Where do people fly for liberty and safety?

Senator DAWSON.—To Australia.

Senator GUTHRIE.—To Ireland.

Senator FRASER.—To England, Ireland, and Scotland, and to the countries over which the grand old flag flies.

Senator STYLES.—They run away from Scotland.

Senator FRASER.—The flag floats there, and I say that it is a hopeful sign in any part of God's earth. It offers a welcome to people everywhere. The history of the British Empire is a creditable one in every phase. My quarrel with the Trades Hall Party is that they are against the sending of contingents to assist the Empire in its hour of need, and opposed to the flag.

Senator DAWSON.—And do not support kanaka labour.

Senator FRASER.—I may deal with that later on, though it is but a very small matter. The British Empire is composed of whites and blacks. Do honorable senators opposite desire to change it; could they change it if they wished? Can whites live where blacks only can live? Can whites live in India, China, and many other parts?

Senator MCGREGOR.—They are living there now.

Senator FRASER.—Can whites live in the tropical parts of the earth? Do honorable senators opposite propose to supplant the Almighty? Do they propose to change the nature of things on this earth?

Senator GIVENS.—The whole population of Victoria was black at one time. How does the honorable senator account for the change? He is interfering with the designs of the Almighty now.

Senator FRASER.—My honorable friend is getting black already. In three more generations the honorable senator who interjects will be black also.

Senator GIVENS.—Senator Fraser is black already; he advocates black labour.

Senator FRASER.—Black or white, I am for the Empire. I have no desire to handicap or to act with inhumanity towards any of my fellow creatures. I say that there are parts of this earth, and parts of this Commonwealth, where white men cannot labour with credit and satisfaction to themselves.

Senator DAWSON.—What part of the Commonwealth?

Senator FRASER.—I have often told the honorable senator, and he can answer the question for himself. In Cairns, in the north, for instance.

Senator DAWSON.—In North Queensland?

Senator FRASER.—Yes. I say here, what I said publicly in the Masonic-hall in Melbourne, that the climate of Cairns is as bad, or worse, than the climate of Mauritius.

Senator GIVENS.—The honorable senator knows nothing about it.

Senator FRASER.—I have been frequently through the district. I drove from Rockhampton almost to the Gulf and back again. That is what honorable senators opposite have never done.

Senator PEARCE.—The honorable senator's chum, Mr. Nicholas FitzGerald, has gone to Cairns to recuperate his health.

Senator DAWSON.—Senator Neild went there also to recuperate his health.

Senator FRASER.—I should like to go there now myself. It is a very pleasant place at this time of the year. But let honorable senators go there in February or January and work in the cane-fields during those months.

Senator GIVENS.—Melbourne is hotter at that time of the year.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator mean to say that he drove from Rockhampton to the Gulf?

Senator FRASER.—Yes; from Rockhampton to the Flinders—to McKinley and Croydon.

Senator DAWSON.—By what route?

Senator FRASER.—I will tell the honorable senator. He does not know the country, he only knows the coast. I drove via Barcaldine, Aramac, Dagworth, across the Diamantina, and into McKinley township, where there was a telegraph office, and where I had a property.

Senator DAWSON.—And the honorable senator got by that route to Winton?

Senator FRASER.—Right through Winton, with a pair of horses I bought at Rockhampton.

Senator DAWSON.—The honorable senator cannot show that route on the map.

Senator FRASER.—Now, will the honorable senator keep silent. I have another objection to the Trades Hall Party, and it is this: That it was only by the greatest possible pressure that the first Prime Minister, Sir Edmund Barton, for whom I have a great regard, could manage to get the Naval Agreement Bill through the House of Representatives. It was only by threatening the resignation of his Government that he did so. We find exactly the same thing occurring whenever any matter affecting the Empire is brought forward in the House of Representatives, or in the States Parliaments.

Senator PEARCE.—Senator Symon was with us in opposition to the Naval Agreement Bill; the honorable senator should not forget that. He is now prepared to follow Senator Symon, who was at that time disloyal, if we were disloyal.

Senator FRASER.—It is different when Senator Symon is in a responsible position. As a Minister, he is a member of a Cabinet which will discuss matters together, and arrive at a conclusion as to what they will do. At any rate, I charge the Trades Hall Party with having been entirely opposed to that measure.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—For good reasons.

Senator FRASER.—What were the reasons? I say that the agreement proposed was the most magnificent agreement ever entered into.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—We desired to contribute in men and ships.

Senator FRASER.—What ships could we build here? They would not be worth a straw. What could we do against Japan?

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—It is degrading to pay tribute.

Senator FRASER.—It is not degrading to be in combination with an Empire such as the world has never seen, and perhaps never will see again. I give this credit to the Labour Party: I believe they will come to see differently by-and-by. I know that there are reasonable clear-headed men amongst them. I am challenging their present principles, and I say that the Naval Agreement Bill was only put through the House of Representatives against their opposition with the greatest possible difficulty. On almost every occasion the Government of the day had to go almost on their knees to get such measures through. I do not complain of the measures introduced by the Barton Government. Looking over them during the last day or two, I saw very little to object to in them, but how sadly were they altered. In the Post and Telegraph Bill, a miserable little clause was introduced which disarranged all our affairs.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Why not repeal it now that honorable senators have the chance?

Senator FRASER.—I hope that we will, but we must have a little time for these things.

Senator HIGGS.—Are honorable senators going to try to repeal it?

Senator FRASER.—Perhaps it can only be done after we have appealed to the people, and thus get the power to do it if we have not the power now. Probably, if we attempted to do it now Senator Higgs would vote against us.

Senator HIGGS.—Hear, hear.

Senator FRASER.—Well, there is no use in our trying to do impossibilities. The introduction of that little clause has had the effect of throwing our mail system into utter disorganization.

Senator GUTHRIE.—We get a mail every week, as usual. Where is the disorganization?

Senator FRASER.—The old contract has not yet expired, and there is no fresh contract.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Give us time.

Senator FRASER.—The honorable senator proposes that we should wait until the old contract has expired. That is a happy-go-lucky way of doing business. When we look for a new contract we may not be able to make one.

Senator GUTHRIE.—It is not necessary.

Senator FRASER.—The affairs of nations are not conducted on those lines; individuals do not carry on business in a happy-go-lucky fashion, but wisely arrange matters beforehand.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Where will be the utter disorganization?

Senator FRASER.—The Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company may not send their vessels here at all, if to send them does not pay.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The vessels may make Fremantle their terminus.

Senator FRASER.—That might happen. Then what about the poor producers? The Trades Hall Party do not seem to care about the producers.

Senator MCGREGOR.—Some of the butter producers have been cheating.

Senator FRASER.—Let people who cheat be punished. What I wish to see is good honest government.

Senator GIVENS.—Does the honorable senator think that producers who cheat ought to be in gaol?

Senator FRASER.—Every one who cheats, whether rich or poor, ought to be in gaol. We ought to recollect that, along with the mail contracts, are contracts for the carriage of perishable goods, and that the State of Victoria, for instance, would be insolvent in six months if produce could not be sent to Europe.

Senator MCGREGOR.—We do not subsidize the vessels of the White Star Line or the Blue Anchor Line.

Senator FRASER.—The White Star Line is a carrying line.

Senator GUTHRIE.—It carries produce.

Senator FRASER.—Yes, but the mail boats have special contracts for the carriage of produce, and the work is done to the satisfaction of those concerned.

Senator PEARCE.—On the contrary, there have been great complaints.

Senator FRASER.—If there have been complaints, the cause is the disorganization of the mail service. I do not see why we should risk the loss of the benefits which we now enjoy, in order to place one or two white men in the stokeholds.

Senator DAWSON.—We must consider the safety of the Empire.

Senator FRASER.—Such a policy means risk to the Empire. If we handicap the British ship-owner, we do a positive injury to the Empire.

Senator PEARCE.—Will the British ship-owner fight his ships?

Senator FRASER.—The British ship-owner wishes for as many sailors as he can get.

Senator STYLES.—White sailors?

Senator FRASER.—That is so, if he can get white sailors, but if he cannot, he must take lascars for the stokehold.

Senator STYLES.—A ship-owner can get white sailors if he pays for them.

Senator DAWSON.—Where must we get the Naval Reserve if not from the mercantile marine?

Senator FRASER.—We get our Naval Reserve from the seafaring class.

Senator DAWSON.—What is the seafaring class?

Senator FRASER.—If there are 10,000 Germans sailorizing for Great Britain, and they choose to become British subjects—

Senator STYLES.—Ah, that is the point!

Senator FRASER.—Half the battle is over when they get into a British ship.

Senator STYLES.—Yes; half of their battle.

Senator FRASER.—A considerable portion of South Australia is colonized by Germans; and does any honorable senator say that they are not good citizens? Cannot German sailors on British ships be also good citizens?

Senator DAWSON.—No.

Senator FRASER.—Many of those German sailors do settle here; and I see no objection to German, Italian, or French sailors being employed on British ships.

Senator DE LARGIE.—We would rather see British sailors all the time.

The PRESIDENT.—I must ask honorable senators not to interject.

Senator FRASER.—I entirely agree with the remark of Senator de Largie.

Senator DAWSON.—I advise Senator Fraser to read F. T. Bullen on this subject.

Senator FRASER.—There are many reasons why I changed my seat, and amongst them was the proposal for a Transcontinental Railway. I had something to do with the Port Augusta railway, and therefore had a knowledge of the subject. I have always held the view which I hold now; I do not change my opinions without good reason. I think I was one of the first to oppose this line, and such was my opposition that great pressure was brought to bear upon me in order to induce me to change my opinions.

Senator DAWSON.—By whom?

Senator FRASER.—That is a secret.

Senator DAWSON.—The caucus?

Senator FRASER.—It was not a caucus. In my opening speech in this House I told honorable senators that I was opposed to the construction of this line; and on other points I did not agree with the programme of the then Government. I know that Australian Governments in the past have been guilty of gross extravagance, a continuance of which must cause them to come to grief, whether the administration be in the hands of the Labour Party or the Conservative Party.

Senator PEARCE.—Kyabram water schemes, for instance.

Senator FRASER.—I believe in reproductive schemes, not in schemes which do not pay, but merely increase the Public Service enormously.

Senator DAWSON.—What about the Maffra sugar-beet scheme?

Senator FRASER.—I lost £500 in that scheme.

Senator GUTHRIE.—And a lot of Government money was lost, too.

Senator FRASER.—It cannot be said that I compelled the Government to lose their money. Even now I am vain enough to believe that if I started a beet-sugar business to-morrow under my entire control, I could make it a success.

The PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think his remarks have anything to do with the Government policy?

Senator FRASER.—I do not think they have, Mr. President, and I thank you for reminding me of the fact.

Senator STYLES.—Do I understand Senator Fraser to say that he is in favour of high excise duties on colonial beer and other stimulants, and low import duties? Is it not such a policy that is shutting up Joshua Bros.' distillery?

Senator FRASER.—My remarks applied more particularly to beer than to spirits. I am entirely opposed to the Labour or Socialistic Party.

Senator PEARCE.—Is the honorable senator opposed to old-age pensions, which are included in the Labour Party's programme?

Senator FRASER.—I am in favour of old-age pensions, which are in force already.

Senator PEARCE.—Not in Australia.

Senator FRASER.—Old-age pensions are in force amongst three-fifths of the population of Australia. If a man has resided ten years, say, in Victoria, and ten years in New South Wales, I see no reason why he should be deprived of an old-age pension should he need one. As to Socialism, can any honorable senator representing that shade of politics show me one place on earth where communistic or socialistic settlements have been a success?

Senator DAWSON.—Can the honorable senator show me a place where Socialism has ever been tried?

Senator FRASER.—Yes.

Senator DE LARGIE.—Socialism is different from Communism.

Senator FRASER.—I do not think so; and I say that in no part of the world is there a country in which such a system has been a success.

Senator FINDLEY.—Socialism was successful in America 150 years ago.

Senator PEARCE.—What about the State-owned railways and postal service?

Senator FRASER.—According to the honorable senator, I suppose that the municipality of Melbourne is claimed as an example of Socialism?

Senator GIVENS.—It is pure Socialism.

Senator FRASER.—Although it is conducted by the rate-payers and property-owners?

Senator GIVENS.—That is so.

Senator FRASER.—Then I suppose the Melbourne Gas Company is Socialism?

Senator PEARCE.—That is private enterprise. The electric lighting system is Socialism; but the Gas Company represents private enterprise.

Senator STYLES.—Why did the Victorian Government spend money in buying suburban railways which were being worked just as well as they are now?

Senator FRASER.—Because those suburban lines interfered with other lines, and it was desired to have one system. There is as wide a divergence between the Commonwealth owning the railways, which open up immense territories, and socialistic—

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The Government run the railways in order to develop the public estate.

Senator FRASER.—And the public estate could not be developed otherwise.

Senator PEARCE.—It is Socialism all the same.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Nothing of the kind.

Senator FRASER.—What I say is that the Tom Mann brand of Socialism means the taxation of property-owners out of their own property.

Senator DAWSON.—Nonsense! Do I understand the honorable senator to say that he has some evidence to show that there has been a complete community under Socialism which has failed?

Senator FRASER.—There have been fifty within the last fifty years.

Senator DAWSON.—Will the honorable senator please mention one?

Senator FRASER.—There have been many in South Australia.

Senator DAWSON.—That is Communism, not Socialism.

Senator FRASER.—I was in Queensland when Lane started his socialistic efforts. He chartered the ship Royal Tar, and each member of the party had to be possessed of a minimum of £60, and as much more as they chose.

Senator DAWSON.—That is not Socialism.

Senator FRASER.—Lane and his party started for Paraguay, where I believe they got a free grant of land, though I am not positive on that point. Before they got to their destination, however, the most bitter quarrelling started amongst them, and when they got there there was still more bitterness. The Government of Queensland, as an act of humanity, paid the return passages of some of the men. I have a letter on the subject, which was published only the other day; but I do not wish to occupy the time of honorable senators in reading it.

Senator DAWSON.—Does the honorable senator call that Socialism?

Senator FRASER.—Certainly.

Senator DAWSON.—That shows all the honorable senator knows about Socialism.

Senator FRASER.—The settlement broke up in confusion. Mr. Lane remained there for a considerable time, and many of the settlers had to live on wild monkeys. The other day, one of the unfortunate individuals applied to relatives in Queensland—I think in Maryborough or Gympie—to send over £5 to enable him to work his way out of that unfortunate country to the coast. He was a shearer by occupation, and his pay was 1s. 6d. a day—about 1s. in our currency, but 1s. 6d. in a depreciated currency. In that part of the world, when a man is supposed to get 10s. per day he receives what is equivalent to only 6s. per day in our currency. That socialistic colony has utterly failed.

Senator DAWSON.—That is a communistic, not a socialistic colony.

Senator FRASER.—In the United Kingdom a celebrated gentleman spent thousands of pounds making an experiment, and yet it came to utter grief.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Laurence Oliphant called his settlement Utopia.

Senator FRASER.—Yes; in periodicals I have read articles on the subject. Many socialistic colonies have been started in South Australia.

Senator GUTHRIE.—How many individualistic enterprises have failed?

Senator FRASER.—The honorable senator will not deny that the people of South Australia, while Mr. Kingston was Premier, started socialistic colonies. The land was given to the people free.

Senator GUTHRIE.—No; rent had to be paid, and the colonies were communistic, not socialistic.

Senator FRASER.—What is the difference between one and the other?

Senator PEARCE.—The same difference as exists between a white boy and a black boy.

Senator FRASER.—I have a lot to learn if that is so. The labour crowd outside Parliament frequently credit the prosperity of New Zealand to its labour laws. I hold in my hand some quotations from a work by Mr. Victor S. Clark, who was sent out by the Labour Bureau of the United States to collect information and labour statistics. He is a very level-headed and clever man, and many of his statements are well worth reading.

Senator GUTHRIE.—He has no sympathy with labour laws.

Senator FRASER.—He has no sympathy with any laws unless they are honest ones, and can bear examination. About twelve years ago New Zealand was in a very tight place financially.

Senator FINDLEY.—She was on the verge of bankruptcy, and it was due to Toryism.

Senator PULSFORD.—Nonsense!

Senator FRASER.—That is quite true. The prosperity of the Colony is entirely due to her enormous and increasing export trade.

Senator FINDLEY.—To land settlement, and the solution of the unemployed question.

Senator FRASER.—I am speaking of a time before the idea of freezing meat had taken hold of business men. In 1889 the frozen meat trade was a mere nothing, but in 1900 it was valued at $8,000,000, and in 1903 it had increased in value to $15,000,000. In 1900 New Zealand exported £2,605,000 worth of butter, and in 1903 £8,000,000 worth. In the latter year the total exports had increased from $50,000,000 to $70,000,000, and it would have increased to $80,000,000 but for the low price of wool during the intervening years. The prosperity of the Colony is entirely due to the export business.

Senator GUTHRIE. — Encouraged by Socialism.

Senator FRASER. — Discouraged by Socialism. In New Zealand the authorities have not been game to apply the compulsory provisions of the Arbitration Act to the rural industries. Why? Because they realize that it would be ruinous to do so.

Senator MCGREGOR.—They have never had any cause to do so.

Senator PEARCE.—There is no Agricultural Labourers' Union there.

Senator FRASER.—The Government and the unionists of New Zealand are wise, and, therefore, they have not applied the provisions of the Arbitration Act to rural industries. That is another strong reason which I have against the policy of the Labour Party. The moment that the compulsory powers of the proposed Arbitration Act are applied to the rural industries of the Commonwealth, our producers will be handicapped.

Senator PEARCE.—Will the honorable senator be willing to give in our Bill the same powers that have been given in the New Zealand Act? We should be pleased with a measure of that kind.

Senator FRASER.—I should not trust the Labour Party with them.

Senator GIVENS.—But the honorable senator may have to trust us whether he likes it or not.

Senator FRASER.—I shall not grant the powers willingly. I shall strive to keep the flag flying as long as I can. I shall not help to put a dangerous provision in any measure. Any person who does not realize that we live by our exports has not cut his eye teeth. Every State in the Commonwealth depends absolutely upon the products of the soil which are exported. We live entirely by the producers. If we could not export we should be insolvent within a year. Therefore any legislation which tends to raise the rates of freight must be injurious to the advancement of the Commonwealth. By handicapping British ships we raise the rate of freights against the producer, and increase his difficulties.

Senator GUTHRIE.—What does the honorable senator mean by the term "handicapping"?

Senator FRASER.—By applying compulsory arbitration to the employees of the producers. We cannot raise the price of farm produce. I grant that if it could be raised it would be fair-play to adopt this policy all round, but we cannot raise the price of wheat or gold. The price of coal can be raised, but only against the local consumer.

Senator PEARCE.—We can relieve the farmer of all the parasites who live upon him.

Senator FRASER.—That is impossible, for he depends upon the price which he receives at Home. What is happening in New South Wales to-day? I understand that 500 or 600 coal-miners are idle.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Because the coal-owners are cutting the throats of each other.

Senator FRASER.—The miners are idle because the mine-owners cannot get buyers abroad for their coal. The great consumption of New South Wales coal is abroad, and not in the Commonwealth. And when the foreign trade is destroyed or ruined, no matter from what cause, the miners must perforce be idle.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Is it not a fact that in Melbourne the price of coal has been reduced by 50 per cent. within the last few months?

Senator FRASER.—I do not find that it has been. I have paid 20s. per ton for my coal this winter, as against 22s. 6d. last year.

Senator GUTHRIE.—There has been a further reduction in price since the honorable senator has bought.

Senator FRASER.—The Australian consumer has to pay the price of coal, whatever it is, and no doubt he can afford to do so. I look upon the worker in a coal mine as a producer. The miner and the mine-owner must work together for the common good, and my complaint against the Trades Hall party is that they are continually trying to create differences between these classes. What is happening now in New South Wales? There are hundreds of cases awaiting the attention of the courts. The Act, instead of being a Conciliation Act, is quite the reverse. It is a misnomer to call it a Conciliation Act. It has created any number of difficulties. Will honorable senators tell me that we can change human nature? Are we not all anxious to do the best we can for ourselves? Was not Senator Higgs anxious to be made Chairman of Committees? Had I been a young man, perhaps I should have aspired to that position myself. Is it not the ambition of every human being to lift himself a little? Has not the condition of the people been levelled up every decade during the last 200 years? Are not people better off to-day than they were 100 years ago? Look at the millions that are spent upon charities! Look at the liberality of the people of England towards the poorer classes and public institutions! Look at what even General Booth has been able to do for the fallen classes! Can any honorable senator say with any sincerity of speech, that human nature can be changed by the methods of the Labour Party? Are we likely to make a confidence man into an honest man, or a drunkard into a sober man, by means of the caucus or the political machine? Has the caucus acted in such a way as to inspire public confidence? Have not the unions of New South Wales acted worse than the butter agents? Have they not shut out their brother man from employment?

Senator PEARCE.—Absolutely, No.

Senator FRASER.—I say that they have done so, and the statement is not to be contradicted. I could mention twenty cases.

Senator DAWSON.—Mention one case.

Senator FRASER.—I mention the Saddler case. Let the honorable senator look it up for himself.

Senator FINDLEY.—There are hundreds of cases of employers who have black-listed employes.

Senator FRASER.—I do not say that employers are not equally guilty with employes. There are faults on both sides. But I do say that, instead of having a Conciliation Act in New South Wales, we have there an Act which is creating disturbance, and which is doing a terrible lot of injury. I have spoken longer than I intended to do, and I apologize to the Senate.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I did not propose to trouble the Senate with any remarks in this debate, which cannot have much result at the best. I should not have said anything, except for some remarks made by the last speaker, who has continued the libelling that has been going on about the climate in the portion of the Commonwealth from which I come. I wish to remove that false impression from the minds of honorable senators, and of people outside who follow our proceedings. I will mention, in the first place, that the climate of Cairns has received very high encomiums indeed from very distinguished people, as being, not only a good place for white people, but actually a sanatorium.

Senator WALKER.—In the winter months.

Senator GIVENS.—I will tell Senator Walker about the climate in the summer, as well as in the winter, before I have finished. The late Governor-General, Lord Hopetoun, now Marquis of Linlithgow, said that Cairns had one of the finest climates he had ever been in, and that it had a remarkable restorative effect upon his health.

Senator WALKER.—He went to Herberston, did he not?

Senator GIVENS.—He made a casual visit to Kuranda, and also visited the coastal range.

Senator WALKER.—In what month?

Senator GIVENS.—About August; but I will give the Senate some official figures about the climate throughout the year. At the present time, we have a distinguished Melbourne gentleman at Cairns for the benefit of his health—a member of the Legislative Council of this State—and he speaks highly of it. Senator Fraser made use of certain expressions which will require a very great deal of explanation.

Senator HIGGS.—His whole speech was remarkable.

Senator GIVENS.—It was very breezy and enjoyable indeed. We all thought that it was quite a treat. He remarked, however, that in all our efforts to place a white population in certain portions of this Commonwealth, we were simply supplanting the Almighty. I suppose he meant by that that we were trying to alter the Divine law of nature.

Senator FRASER.—Yes.

Senator GIVENS.—If we are trying to alter the Divine order of things by putting a white population on North Queensland, we are also altering the Divine order of things by putting a white population in New Zealand, Tasmania, or Victoria. Because, from what we know of them, the original population of New Zealand, Tasmania, and Victoria were as black as the blackest people that can be found in the northern portion of this continent.

Senator PEARCE.—By the same reasoning British soldiers have no right to be in India.

Senator GIVENS.—That is so. Senator Fraser or any other gentleman who advocates that the northern portion of Australia should be handed over to the blacks, simply because Divine Providence originally intended that it should be occupied by black people, have just as much reason to advocate that Victoria and Tasmania, which are eminently suitable for a white population, should, in accordance with the Divine order of things, be left to be occupied by a black population.

Senator DAWSON.—And we ought also to have a black Federal Parliament!

Senator GIVENS.—There are a great many misconceptions with regard to the Queensland climate which I wish to remove, if I can. I dare say that Senator Fraser and many others agree that the southern portion of Queensland is fit for a white population.

Senator FRASER.—I was speaking of the cane-fields.

Senator GIVENS.—The argument has been that while the climate of Southern Queensland may be fit for a white population, such is not the case in the north, and that Cairns especially should be singled out as a place that is only fit for a black population. I am going to show, from official figures, that the climate of Cairns is a better and more agreeable climate than that of Bundaberg or Brisbane. But I ask honorable senators to remember that climate does not always depend upon latitude. Compare the climate of Ireland, in the United Kingdom, with the climate of Labrador, in the North American Continent. The climate of Labrador is most inhospitable. It is so cold and bleak that it is almost impossible for any inhabitant to live there. But Ireland, in almost the same latitude, has one of the most genial climates any one could live in.

Senator WALKER.—Owing to the Gulf stream.

Senator GIVENS.—Exactly. Therefore, climate cannot always be judged by latitude. Again, in the coastal districts of Cairns, the prevailing winds are south-east. That is, they have to come over a wide stretch of the Pacific Ocean before they reach the land. Every one knows that a hot wind, or any warm wind, is cooled by coming over the sea. Therefore, the people living there have always cool air, when there are south-east winds blowing. Again, if the winds come from the west, or from the north, they cross the high mountains which constitute the coast range. The winds are thereby cooled. Consequently, we have a cool wind, no matter which way it blows.

Senator FRASER.—There are no high mountains there.

Senator GIVENS.—That remark shows how the honorable senator exposes his ignorance on this subject. The highest mountains in Queensland are there in the Bellenden Ker Range, the most considerable mountain in which is Bartle Frere, 5,400 feet above the level of the sea. Let me point out how the temperature at Cairns compares with the temperature in the south portion of Queensland. I quote now from a report made by Dr. Maxwell, to the Federal Government, in 1901. It will be found in volume 4, page 275, of the Queensland Votes and Proceedings for the year 1901. The mean minimum temperature in Cairns during four years was 67°6. In Bundaberg it was 61°3. That is, the mean minimum temperature was only 6 degrees higher in Cairns than in Bundaberg. That was during the cool months. Turning to the high temperatures, we find that the mean maximum temperature, in four years, at Cairns, was 83°3, and at Bundaberg, 83°4. So that the temperature was actually a fraction lower at Cairns as compared with Bundaberg.

Senator CLEMONS.—But no reference is made to the humidity of the atmosphere.

Senator GIVENS.—I thought that that question would come, and I am ready for it. I have fought out this question in the Queensland Legislature. Whenever people are bowled out in reference to the question of heat, they ask, "What about humidity?" We have documentary proof from the highest authorities, for a period of four years. When I was a member of the Queensland State Parliament, I moved for a return showing the humidity of the temperature for four years, in various typical coastal stations of Queensland from Cairns to Brisbane. The very persons who, at that time, were talking about their desire to get the fullest possible information in order that the Commonwealth Parliament might legislate with a full knowledge of the subject, fought all they knew against the laying of that return on the table in the Queensland Parliament. After a fight I succeeded in getting it tabled, and honorable senators, if they care to refer to it, will find it at page 1389 of volume III. of the Votes and Proceedings of the Queensland Legislative Assembly for 1901. The table is a very long one, and I do not, therefore, propose to quote it at length, but I shall give honorable senators the mean humidity for each of the four years at Cairns, Mackay, Bundaberg, and Brisbane. For 1897 the mean percentage of humidity, reckoning 100 per cent. as saturation, was for Cairns, 77 per cent.; Mackay, 74; Bundaberg, 73; and Brisbane, 72. The figures for 1898 were Cairns, 78 per cent.; Mackay, 75; Bundaberg, 76; and Brisbane, 73. For 1899, Cairns, 74 per cent.; Mackay, 73; Bundaberg, 74; and Brisbane, 74. And for 1900 the figures were Cairns, 73 per cent.; Mackay, 72; Bundaberg, 73; and Brisbane 71. In the face of these figures, compiled by the Queensland Government Meteorologist, Mr. Clement Wragge, or, as he was sometimes called, Mr. "Inclement" Wragge, I ask what point there was in the interjection by Senator Clemons, "What about the humidity?"

Senator CLEMONS.—Does not the honorable senator think that he has proved it?

Senator GIVENS.—I am glad to hear the honorable and learned senator admit it. What is more to the point is that the six months of the year in which nine-tenths of the work that has to be done in the cane-fields of the Cairns district is performed, from the 1st July to the middle of December, are the dry months in that portion of the State, and the percentage of humidity during those months is less in the Cairns district than in the southern portion of the State. So that from the climatic point of view, it is absolutely untrue to say that the conditions of cultivation in the northern portion of Queensland are more unfavorable to the employment of white labour than those existing in any other portion of Queensland.

Senator FRASER.—Dr. Maxwell says they are.

Senator GIVENS.—I have quoted Dr. Maxwell as to the temperature returns, and

Mr. Clement Wragge's report as to the humidity returns. I am free to admit that when we had beaten them out of the field on the temperature and humidity returns, our opponents took up another attitude, and said, "It is not a question of either heat or humidity, but of atmospheric tension." I did not bother about atmospheric tension, because I knew that when we had beaten them upon that point also, they would say it was the differential calculus, or something of that kind. There is one other testimony I should like to quote before I conclude this part of the subject. During the first Parliament Senator Neild frequently and forcibly expressed the opinion on the floor of the Chamber that North Queensland, especially at Cairns, was not fit for a white man to live in, much less to work in. Quite recently, however, when, unfortunately, owing to the state of his health, the honorable senator had to obtain leave of absence from the Senate, he actually went to recuperate at the place which he had denounced. And I believe he has since freely expressed the opinion that his stay there did him a great deal of good, and that the place is admirable for the purpose for which he visited it.

Senator GRAY.—He was there in the winter.

Senator GIVENS.—The figures I have quoted prove that the climate of Queensland is not only genial in the winter, but that in the summer time it is not so hot as places far south. Last summer I watched the thermometer readings at Melbourne and Cairns during the months of December and January, and I found that the high temperature in Melbourne exceeded by at least two degrees the high temperature at Cairns; and any one who takes the trouble to consult the official figures will find that what I have stated is the fact.

Senator GIVENS.—I have a motion on the notice-paper, which will allow a full discussion of that phase of the question; and I shall be happy to argue the point at the proper time with Senator Dobson, or any other honorable senator. There is just one other statement of Senator Fraser which I should like to controvert. Speaking of the Immigration Restriction Act, and of the White Australian legislation of the Commonwealth Parliament generally, Senator

Fraser denounced, in the strongest possible terms, that portion of the legislation which deals with the class of labour to be employed on British shipping. We have nothing to do in this Parliament with the kind of labour to be employed on British shipping, over which we have no jurisdiction; nor has this Parliament ever presumed to dictate to the British Empire what sort of labour ought to be employed in any of the Empire's ships. What we have done, and what we have a perfect right to do—what I believe we were wise in doing in the interests of the Empire itself—has been to declare that we will not subsidize any vessels which carry other than white crews. Senator Fraser was very impressive when, lifting up both hands, he declared that he held them up for the flag every time—he made an almighty mouthful about his loyalty. I am one who believes that, like a woman's virtue, if it exists, a man's loyalty does not need any protesting. I never yet knew a woman with any claims to respectability, who went about the country "blowing" about her virtue. A woman's virtue is unquestioned. And so with every Britisher's loyalty—there is no need to be continually protesting about it. But Senator Fraser, while making a song about his loyalty to the flag, proved conclusively, over and over again, that, although he might be loyal to the flag, he was disloyal to the British people. I take it that loyalty to the people of the Empire—the race from which we sprang—is greater than loyalty to any flag whatever. Senator Fraser's argument practically is that the interests of the British Empire, and of the British people should be entirely swept aside in the interests of the profits of the ship-owners—that it does not matter what sort of crews are employed so long as the ship-owners are enabled to compete in the open markets of the world and obtain their "pound of flesh" in the shape of profits. I hold that, so far as it can be accomplished by legislation, whether in this Parliament, the British Parliament, or any other Parliament, the employment of any crew whatever, excepting a British crew, so long as that is obtainable, should be absolutely prohibited on any British ship which enjoys the protection of the flag and the trade received from the British people. The integrity of the British Empire depends absolutely on ability to obtain an adequate number of capable seamen for defence in time of difficulty, danger, or war.

Senator Givens.

In a recent contribution to a controversy on this question, the British Navy League, which I do not know can be charged with having any great sympathy with labour ideals, advocated exactly the same policy, namely, that British ship-owners ought to be compelled to man their vessels with British seamen. Their reason is that, otherwise, the supply of British seamen for the British Navy will inevitably be exhausted, as, indeed, it must. What has been the main factor in bringing about the dominance of the British Empire throughout the world? What has enabled the Empire to obtain its present high position amongst the nations of the earth? Undoubtedly, it is the fact that she possessed a seafaring people, always prepared to defend the Empire, and to extend her rule in every quarter of the world. The British Navy is to-day the might of the British Empire. Without the Navy England would sink into the position of a third-rate or fourth-rate power. But the British Navy would be absolutely useless without British seamen—it would be a magnificent machine without the proper means for setting it to work. Unless the mercantile marine is manned by British sailors, inevitably the time is not far distant when the Navy will be starved for want of men. Those facts are pointed out by some of the most enlightened statesmen in England to-day. The British Navy League, which has made a special study of the subject, and has collected a large amount of data on which to base conclusions, has stated, as plainly as we do, that unless something is done to prevent British seafaring men from being driven out of the British mercantile marine, the time must come when there will not be sufficient sailors to man the Navy—when Great Britain will have no reserve of seamen in time of danger, trouble, and difficulty, and must give up her supremacy.

Senator BEST.—Is that the reason actuating the Labour Party in opposing the employment of lascars on mail steamers?

Senator GIVENS.—That is one of the main reasons why we advocate that policy, and why we oppose the immigration of coloured races to the country. One of the main reasons I have always put forward against the introduction of Chinese, Japanese, coolies, kanakas, and other coloured men into Queensland, is that if the hour of difficulty or danger comes to the mother country—we hope the hour may not come—when she may have to put her back against the wall to fight against a combination, it may be, of European nations, our duty will be, not to add to her burden, but to fight in our own defence; and if we had to depend on such races to fight for our liberty and the integrity of the Commonwealth, it would be a very poor day for us. It has been put forward as an argument that work in the stakehold is not fit for white men, and that they should not be asked to do it; but I say that under proper conditions, a white man can work in the stakehold or anywhere else.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—If he has proper ventilation.

Senator GIVENS.—If a white man has proper conditions in regard to hours, food, and accommodation when not actually employed, he can and will work in any place in the world. People who make those barefaced statements have staring them in the face the fact that white men are doing this work, and have done it for all time.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH. — White stokers are employed in the Norddeutscher-Lloyd vessels.

Senator GIVENS.—Ever since steamships were invented, white men have been doing this work. The whole trouble is that the employment of white men does not allow ship-owners so large a profit. The whole ideal of ship-owners is profit; they care nothing, although they talk very loudly, for the British Empire, so long as their pockets are well lined. While ship-owners are continually maligning their race, and saying that they are not fit for this or that work, they forget that Britishers, to whom they refuse employment, have very often to starve. I have said that patriotism does not actuate these people who talk so largely about it, and that is true. Without imparting any heat or passion into the debate, it may be said that we have evidence that when profits are at stake, ship-owners care nothing for patriotism or humanity. We learn from the reports of several Royal Commissions in the old country, which inquired into the circumstances of several manufacturing industries, that human life is sacrificed under the bad conditions which are allowed to prevail in chemical factories, match factories, and similar places. Those who carry on such industries never alter the conditions and prevent this sacrifice of life until they are compelled to do so by law. They care nothing about patriotism, and we have it on the very best evidence, which has never been contradicted, that when Great Britain goes to war, very often the guns and bullets which are levelled at her soldiers have been made in British factories. The engines of warfare employed by the enemy against British soldiers have very often been manufactured by Britishers who were the loudest in advocating the war. These are facts which I do not think any one will attempt to deny, and they prove conclusively that the patriotism which animates honorable gentlemen like Senator Fraser, who says that both his hands go up for the flag every time, does not amount to much—is of a bogus character. As I pointed out before, there is a higher loyalty than loyalty to the flag, and that is loyalty, not to any one particular section, but to the people of the whole nation.

Senator GRAY.—Does not the flag represent the people?

Senator GIVENS.—Not always. If I were to deal with that question fully I would point out that the flag has often been flown in fights against the people. I do not, however, propose to deal with that matter, which is not altogether relevant. Before dealing with the Government policy in particular, or such portion of a policy as I have been able to discover in a very close search, I should like to refer to one or two statements made by honorable senators. Senator Clemons has condemned the banking proposals of the Labour Party as iniquities which should be condemned by almost everybody, that is, by almost everybody whom honorable senators opposite would characterize as right-thinking persons. I believe I am right in concluding, from an interjection, that Senator Pulsford holds exactly the same view.

Senator PULSFORD.—Quite so.

Senator GIVENS.—The Labour Party are not peculiar by any means as regards their banking proposals, nor have they invented such a method of dealing with the banks. For very many years the Dominion of Canada has had in force an exactly similar law, although there has not been a Labour Party in power in that country. This law was advocated in the first instance, and enacted in the second instance, by men who were not tainted with the doctrines of the Labour Party.

Senator KEATING.—Those proposals were actually suggested from Downing-street.

Senator PULSFORD.—The circumstances of Canada are entirely different from those of Australia.

Senator WALKER.—Where do the Canadian banks keep their coin reserves?

Senator GUTHRIE.—In the Treasury.

Senator WALKER.—In New York largely.

Senator GIVENS.—The coin reserves are, or ought to be, kept by the banks in their vaults, or other places to which they can have immediate access.

Senator WALKER.—Many of the Canadian banks have branches in New York.

Senator GIVENS.—At any rate, the Canadian banks are compelled by Dominion law to keep a certain proportion of their reserves in Canadian stock. What was the case in Australia before ever this idea was advocated here, when things were in the happy condition which honorable senators opposite seem to think is the most desirable? I refer to the time when the banks were issuing balance-sheets showing very handsome reserves. I wonder if Senator Walker ever asked where the majority of the reserves were kept. I should very much like to know now where they were kept, and so would, I believe, any other man who had anything to do with the affairs of the country at that time. When an inquiry was made it was proved that these coin reserves were non-existent to a very large extent, and that the banks would have required a very strong safe or vault to keep hold of coin then.

Senator PULSFORD.—Reserves are not necessarily coin reserves.

Senator GIVENS.—Of course not. In a pamphlet which was sent to us recently by a gentleman in New South Wales, the argument was put forward that it was absolutely necessary to have a very considerable quantity of coin, so that the gold reserves should bear a certain proportion to the total amount of liquid assets. For what purpose are gold reserves held by the banks? These are supposed to be held in the first place as a guarantee that the banks will be able to meet any demand which may be made upon them. Up to a certain point they are supposed to give that guarantee, because no bank pretends to hold the full amount of its liabilities in coin reserves. I do not think that a bank in the world, not even the Bank of England, holds an amount equal to the whole of its liabilities in absolutely liquid reserves, simply because no bank could adopt that plan, and at the same time make a profit. One of the first objects of a coin reserve is to enable a bank to meet any sudden run or demand on it. What causes a sudden run on a bank? What makes the people rush to a bank and want to withdraw their deposits or receive coin for the bank's notes? It is simply a loss of confidence in the bank. No bank, not even the Bank of England, I believe, could last a week if it had lost the confidence of the public and its customers. In Australia in 1893, we had an experience of a run being made on the banks, and the State had immediately to come to their assistance. In some instances the State had to proclaim a certain number of days as bank holidays, in order to afford to the banks an opportunity to gather in their reserves, and the run on the banks to subside.

Senator WALKER.—That was in Victoria.

Senator KEATING.—No; in New South Wales, where the notes were made legal tender.

Senator WALKER.—But the banks there did not shut their doors for a few days.

Senator KEATING.—If New South Wales had not had Sir George Dibbs at the head of the Government it would have had a bank panic still.

Senator WALKER.—Is the honorable and learned senator aware that the Bank of England can suspend payment if it likes, and that Sir George Dibbs gave the same advantage to the banks of New South Wales as it has?

Senator KEATING.—The State came to the assistance of the banks.

Senator GIVENS.—This all bears out my argument, that where a bank has lost public confidence the State has to step in and restore that confidence.

Senator KEATING.—Has the honorable senator ever known the people of Canada to lose confidence in their banks during the last thirty-four years?

Senator GIVENS.—Not once. We have had other instances where the States have had to step in and guarantee the note issue of banks. The notes were supposed to be payable when presented, and the fact that the State had to give that guarantee was positive proof that, at that time, the notes were not worth the paper on which they were printed. But immediately the guarantee was given by the State, these notes were accepted without question by the general public, even in that time of panic. Now, what are the banking proposals of the Labour Party? Our object, in the first place, is to insure that the public, who are compelled by the exigencies of business to trust the banks to a certain extent, shall have some guarantee that on presentation their notes shall be redeemed, that the assets of the banks shall not be allowed to dwindle into mere paper assets, as had occurred in the case of many private banks in 1893. We have heard a great deal about the confiscation of the banks' gold. There is not a shadow of justification for supposing that there is a word about confiscation in our proposals.

Senator GRAY.—It is borrowing.

Senator GIVENS.—It is borrowing. It is proposed to compel the banks to do what they say they do without compulsion.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—It is the substitution of one security for another.

Senator GIVENS.—Our desire is to give a guarantee to the people that there shall be adequate security to justify their confidence in the banks. Whenever we have had a run on the banks, whether it has been in New Zealand, or in any State of the Commonwealth, the people have always been allowed to "fall in." In Queensland, it came to such a pass that, in order to preserve the people from the probability, or the certainty, of being defrauded by the issue of notes, which had, in some instances, proved to be perfectly valueless, we were compelled to withdraw the privilege of issuing notes from the banks. At the present time, in that State, no bank can issue a note and have it accepted as legal tender.

Senator KEATING.—That is an interference with private enterprise.

Senator GIVENS.—This course was taken by a purely Conservative Government, owing to the rotten condition of the banking institutions at that time. The State issues every note, and the banks have to plank down good gold for the notes.

Senator WALKER.—Excuse me, in Queensland the banks give their fixed deposits for these notes.

Senator GIVENS.—Although Senator Walker is a director of a bank, still I must dispute his word on this point, and refer him to the Statute, which may be seen in our Library.

Senator KEATING.—Even if he is right, a fixed deposit is really the same thing as gold.

Senator GIVENS.—What has been the result of the issue of these Treasury notes? Notwithstanding that Queensland has passed through a time of trouble and difficulty which is almost unprecedented in its history, notwithstanding that it has been alleged that the State was almost bankrupt owing to the recurrence of bad seasons, and the mismanagement of affairs by a corrupt Tory Government, not one citizen has ever objected to accept a Treasury note for £1 or £5, as readily as he would accept gold. Therefore, I ask, is it not a reasonable thing for this Parliament, in the interests of the people, to say to any banking institution, "Before you engage in a business which may involve a number of persons in ruin if it is not carried on properly, you must give us some guarantee that the people's interest and money shall be safeguarded." We ask that a certain percentage—20 or 30 or 40 per cent. if you like—of the reserves of banking corporations shall be held in Commonwealth securities, so that the people shall have an adequate guarantee that, at any rate, that proportion of the reserves shall be safe. We have a perfect right to insist upon that guarantee being given. Up to the present time, banking institutions have been allowed to carry on their business practically at their own sweet will. What was the consequence in Melbourne some years ago? A state of misery and destitution was brought about by the failure of privately conducted banks that had not to give any guarantee, which was almost without a parallel in the history of the world.

Senator KEATING.—They locked up £54,000,000, and they have not given one pennyworth of security for its repayment.

Senator GIVENS.—In most cases they never will, because the money has been absolutely lost.

Senator WALKER.—In Victoria, the notes are a first charge on all the assets of a bank.

Senator GIVENS.—So they are in every State.

Senator WALKER.—They are not in New South Wales.

Senator GIVENS.—It does not matter whether the notes are a first or last charge on the assets, because the fact remains that they bear on their face this indorsement by the bank, "We promise to pay on demand." You could demand until you were black in the face, but you could not get the money, because the banks had not got it. Even the strongest bank in Australia—the Bank of New South Wales, with which Senator Walker is connected—was glad to get a little saving grace to tide over the position. Nevertheless I believe that the position of that bank was almost unquestioned.

Senator WALKER.—That bank did not ask the Government for grace; the Government offered it.

Senator GIVENS.—There is no question that the Bank of New South Wales asked for and did receive some sort of Government assistance.

Senator WALKER.—They simply availed themselves of the Act which Parliament passed.

Senator GIVENS.—They wanted Government assistance, and they took it.

Senator WALKER.—We took it—yes.

Senator GIVENS.—Even the facts admitted by honorable senators opposite go to prove that something is necessary to safeguard the interests of the public.

Senator WALKER.—Therefore the honorable senator would take the gold away from the banks.

Senator GIVENS.—We are not going to take their gold away from them, but we are going to insure that a certain portion of their reserves shall be utilized. It is retained for the security of the people who have accepted bank-paper in all good faith. But we have found in the past that, notwithstanding glowing balance-sheets, and notwithstanding the statements often made that the banks held such and such reserves, when the time of stress and difficulty came these reserves were not available. The public had no redress. What was the position in Queensland? One of the banks, doing a very large business—the Queensland National Bank—held State money to the extent of millions, which has been locked up in interminable deposits.

Senator WALKER.—Interminable? I think not.

Senator GIVENS.—Practically so, because there was a certain percentage which the Government were to forego, and the rest was not to be paid for something like from twenty-five to fifty years.

Senator WALKER.—That is not interminable.

Senator GIVENS.—There were several other banks in a similar position. We have a right to demand that a certain portion of the reserves which the banks say that they put by shall be utilized. We have a right, in the interests of the public whom we represent, and upon whom the banks depend for their prosperity, to demand that a portion of those reserves shall be held in the security of the Commonwealth—that is, in the security of the whole of the people themselves—for the safeguarding of the interests of those people. What have the banks got to lose? Absolutely nothing, as is proved by the experience of Canada. Suppose that a bank keeps 30 per cent. of its reserves in gold coin. I am putting this as a supposititious case, and not as an indication of what a bank would keep. That coin is locked up from year to year, doing absolutely nothing, unless there is a run on the bank.

Senator WALKER.—It gives confidence to the public.

Senator GIVENS.—The public have no guarantee that the money will be there when it is wanted, as I have proved by the cases I have cited. When in those instances the public wanted the gold coin which was supposed to be available it was not there. Suppose, as Senator Walker says, that the gold coin reserve is retained in the coffers of the banks in order to inspire confidence. In that case it is lying useless. Why should not a certain proportion of it be put to use, so long as there is something put in its place which will inspire equal or greater confidence? The experience of Canada proves that that money can be utilized for the benefit of the whole people, that instead of its being locked up it can be put into circulation, accomplishing beneficent works for the benefit of the people, while confidence is not impaired in the slightest degree.

Senator GRAY.—Why not do the same with limited liability companies?

Senator GIVENS.—If they were doing business in the same way as the banks are doing business, and were intrusted with millions of the people's money for investment that argument would be good.

Senator GRAY.—Some of them are doing business in just the same way.

Senator GIVENS.—If those companies held millions of the people's money, call—

Senator GRAY.—A great many of them.

Senator GIVENS.—They are banks, and they do that. I am prepared to extend this proposal to every company that is doing banking business. These banks are receiving money at call, and on fixed deposit from customers all over the Commonwealth. They issue notes, except in Queensland, where the issue of notes is a Government monopoly. The notes they promise to pay on demand, but sometimes when the banks have been asked to redeem their promises they have not been able to do so. Experience has proved that some sort of legislative interference is necessary. We are asked why we require a guarantee from these banks. Because past experience has shown that it is necessary, and because is absolutely desirable to bring into circulation money which is locked up and doing nothing, inasmuch as it is proved that public confidence can be inspired and maintained equally effectively by other means.

Senator CLEMONS.—Why stop at 40 per cent?

Senator GIVENS.—Because there is always a certain amount of money which is required for the transaction of current daily business. The other portion is not required, unless there is a run on a bank, which is due to want of confidence; and that confidence can be more effectively maintained by a guarantee of the people than by a supposititious cash reserve in the vaults of the bank. I say supposititious, advisedly, because when it came to the point the coin reserves did not exist, although certificates were issued showing that they did exist. In 1893, that was the common experience. The exceptions were few in which the actual coin reserve was in existence to anything like the amount set forth in the balance-sheets of the banks. We have experience in Canada and Australia that a Government guarantee is a surer and more efficacious means of securing public confidence than anything else. Even in the banking crisis of 1893, when the people were almost mad with excitement over the failure of the banks, as soon as the Government guaranteed the notes they were accepted without question in every State of the Commonwealth. Why, when we can do three good things in one Act, should we not do them? Those things are, first, that we can exact a fair guarantee that the people's interests will be safeguarded by these proposals; secondly, we can prevent money from being locked up uselessly in vaults or safes and put it to a beneficent use in carrying on necessary works for the benefit of the people; and, thirdly, we can give an absolute security for that confidence which the public ought to feel in the banking institutions with which they transact business. It would suit everybody except those who want to rake in profits all the time. Not that those gentlemen ever hope to make a profit out of the money which they actually retain as gold reserves in the vaults, because it is impossible to make a profit out of money unless it is put to use. But the profit which they hope to make is this—that if the people are deprived of the use of that money, and are compelled to borrow from other sources, they will have to pay high interest, and in consequence the money-lenders and the profit-mongers will reap a greater advantage. I think I have said enough to prove that these proposals are in the interests of the people of the Commonwealth. It does not matter whether honorable senators opposite approve or disapprove of them, the people will see that the great example of Canada in this regard is worth following, and will soon wake up to the necessity of following it. No matter whether the present Government or any other Government is in power, they will have to do this thing. I was very much amused the other day at the remarks of Senator Walker when addressing himself to this question. He is not usually humorous—or at least he does not attempt to be. But sometimes he is humorous unconsciously. He said that what was required more than anything else at the present time was fiscal peace. Senator Walker was something like the Melbourne Argus in that connexion. That journal supplemented Senator Walker's desire for fiscal peace by saying that one other thing was just as much required, and that was political peace. Other Governments having been turned out of office, and the Argus Government now being in office, that journal wants fiscal peace, and no more fighting.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The honorable senator's Government wanted fiscal peace also.

Senator GIVENS.—I have no desire for fiscal peace.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The honorable senator does not want peace of any kind.

Senator GIVENS.—I do not want it at too high a price. If I see something that does not tend to the well-being of the Commonwealth there will be no cry for fiscal peace from me, or for peace of any kind until it is remedied, no matter whether a Government which I support occupies the Treasury bench or not. There is no peace. Because honorable senators opposite happen to have secured possession of the Treasury bench they desire political peace and fiscal peace. Nobody must attempt to dislodge them. So far as I am concerned, they will get no peace from me. I shall endeavour to dislodge them on the first available opportunity, because I believe it would be disastrous to the best interests of Australia if the present Government were allowed to retain office one hour longer than is absolutely necessary.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It is necessary for a good many years yet.

Senator GUTHRIE.—Next week will see the end, I think.

Senator GIVENS.—What is the position with regard to fiscal peace? Mr. Deakin, as leader of the Government at the time, put forward a platform of fiscal peace during the life of the ensuing Parliament, at the general elections held last year. But he put it forward with a very considerable qualification. He submitted that platform in conjunction with an idea of preferential trade, and a further idea that there should be certain bonuses granted. The party represented on the Treasury bench at the present time, led by the Right Honorable George Houston Reid, would not accept fiscal peace at any price at the general election. They said it was the white flag, and they fired upon the white flag. They were beaten, and now having been beaten, they say, "Allow us to come in under the white flag." The members of the party to which I belong put forward no such cry as fiscal peace at the elections.

Senator WALKER.—The honorable senator is a fiscal atheist, is he not?

Senator GIVENS.—I am not a fiscal atheist. I believe that one of the most important aims we should have in view for the young nation which we are trying to build up here under the Southern Cross, is that so far as possible we should be placed in the position of a self-contained nation, independent of any portion of the outside world. What is our position as an island Continent? If there were war to-morrow in which we were involved, we should be liable to be cut off from all the supplies for which we have hitherto been looking to the foreigner.

Senator GRAY.—The honorable senator does not suppose that ships would come here empty?

Senator GIVENS.—If an honorable senator is so stupid that he cannot see that in war time it is possible that ships would be unable to trade with an island Continent, it is useless to argue with him.

Senator GUTHRIE.—There has been no communication with Japan for months.

Senator GIVENS.—Though Great Britain possesses a magnificent navy, the finest and most powerful the world has ever seen, it has always been recognised by her statesmen, that were England at war with a first-class European power, it is possible that her supplies of the necessities of life for her people might be very seriously interrupted.

Senator DOBSON.—With a coast line extending for 8,000 miles, it would take a big nation to cut us off.

Senator GIVENS.—A coast line of 8,000 miles does not amount to very much, considering our present means of communication. We have only three or four ports of the Commonwealth connected by rail. If we could not get goods introduced at Sydney, Melbourne, or Adelaide, and they had to be landed at Brisbane or Rockhampton, we should find very great difficulty in keeping Melbourne or Sydney supplied. Then, what about the enormous areas in other parts of the Commonwealth, which are not connected by rail with the various ports? How would they be supplied? I repeat that it is most desirable that Australia should, as far as possible, be a self-contained nation. That we cannot hope to be, without the establishment of industries of various kinds within the Commonwealth, and they cannot be established without some adequate system of protection. Let it be remembered that the vast bulk of the great industries even of free-trade England were built up under a strictly protective system. I ask why we should not follow the good example of "the dear old mother-land," in that respect. I do not propose to argue the question of Protection versus Free-trade in the course of this debate. The subject is too large to be dealt with casually in a debate of this kind. No one could hope to do it justice by mere casual references, and I wish only to define my position in reply to Senator Walker's interjection. I assure the honorable senator that I am not a fiscal atheist. I believe that a fiscal policy of some sort is absolutely essential as a part of the financial policy which any party aspiring to govern in the Commonwealth must have. I hold very strong views as to what our fiscal policy should be, and at the proper time I shall have the courage to freely enunciate those views. Senator Walker referred, amongst other things, to the Western Australian railway. I really do not know what attitude the honorable senator or the party to which he belongs is going to take up on that great question.

Senator WALKER.—I am in favour of it.

Senator GIVENS.—So, I understand, is the present Minister of Home Affairs, who, on various occasions, and on many platforms, has most strongly denounced it.

What an extraordinary change of opinion the translation of an honorable gentleman from one side of the House to another often makes.

Senator MULCAHY.—It does, with members of all parties.

Senator GIVENS.—A month ago the present Minister of Home Affairs denounced this proposal in the most unmeasured language. Nothing was then too bad to say about it. It was a desert railway, which involved an unmitigated steal from the funds of the Commonwealth.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Who said that?

Senator GUTHRIE.—The present Minister of Home Affairs, Mr. Dugald Thomson.

Senator GIVENS.—We now find the honorable gentleman in favour of the proposal, and actually introducing a Bill dealing with the subject, in another place.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Why should he not change his mind?

Senator GIVENS.—Certainly, if he pleases. The honorable gentleman's change of mind pre-supposes that he has a mind to change; but what I complain about is that these changes of mind occur only as peculiar coincidences at a time when some political benefit may be gained by the individual changing his mind.

Senator MULCAHY.—Has the honorable senator never changed his mind for a benefit?

Senator GIVENS.—I hope that when I do change my mind, it will not be for place, pay, or power.

Senator GRAY.—I do not think the honorable senator can say that Mr. Dugald Thomson has changed his mind for those reasons.

Senator GIVENS.—I am not saying anything at all about the honorable gentleman, beyond the fact that his change of mind at this time appears to be a peculiar coincidence.

Senator MULCAHY.—The honorable senator may as well say a thing as imply it.

Senator GIVENS.—When we find these coincidences so very apt to arise in the case of honorable gentlemen of a peculiar political brand, we cannot be blamed for drawing certain conclusions—I do not say what those conclusions are. The whole trouble with honorable senators opposite, in their demand for fiscal peace, has been admitted by Senator Millen, in the speech he delivered during this debate. It is that, if the Labour Party were allowed to remain in power, they would consolidate their position, and strengthen themselves with the people of the Commonwealth. That is what the honorable senator said. What does that mean? There is only one way in which a governing party can consolidate and strengthen its position, and that is by legislating and administering the affairs of the country in the interests of the people. We cannot strengthen or consolidate our position without the approval of the people. Without that approval there can be no improvement made in our position. According to Senator Millen, if the Labour Party had been allowed to remain in power, they would have consolidated and improved their position. That means, if it means anything at all, that the people of the Commonwealth had approved, did approve, and would continue to approve of the legislation and administration of the Labour Party, and because of that those opposed to them thought that they should put them out as soon as possible. The statement made by Senator Millen involves an admission that the people were approving, and would probably continue to approve of the legislation and administration of the Labour Party, as being good for them, and beneficial to the Commonwealth; but, rather than see that good result brought about, Senator Millen, and the party to which he belongs, were prepared to remove from the Treasury bench those who were accomplishing such good work. Merely for the sake of aggrandizing their own party, and for the sake of place and power, they were prepared to turn off the Treasury bench a Government whom they admitted did good work, and in such a way as to obtain the approval and confidence of the whole of the people of the Commonwealth.

Senator GUTHRIE.—No word was ever said against their administration.

Senator MULCAHY.—There was not very much of it.

Senator GUTHRIE.—There was four months of it.

Senator GIVENS.—I have stated the logical conclusions to be arrived at from what Senator Millen said, and I challenge anybody to find a flaw in that logic. Of course, Senator Millen said also that the ostensible object of the published platform of the Labour Party did not cover the whole of our aims. The honorable senator did not disapprove, and was not frightened of anything we propose at present. It was what was coming after that that the honorable senator objected to.

Senator CLEMONS.—I do not think the honorable senator said that.

Senator GIVENS.—Senator Clemons can look up Hansard, and find it for himself.

Senator WALKER.—It is what Senator Millen said.

Senator GIVENS.—We have a difference of opinion on the other side, straight away. Senator Walker is honest enough to admit that I have quoted Senator Millen fairly.

Senator CLEMONS.—I did not for a moment suggest that the honorable senator had not quoted Senator Millen honestly.

Senator GIVENS.—I did not understand Senator Clemons to admit that a minute ago. Senator Millen believes that everything we propose at the present time is right. He is not afraid of anything we have on our immediate programme; it is the ultimate ends we have in view that the honorable senator is afraid of.

Senator WALKER.—Tom Mann-ism.

Senator GIVENS.—I ask whether we have not just as good a right to be afraid of what may be beyond the present platform of honorable senators opposite, as they have to be afraid of what is beyond our present platform. Do they in their published platform show the whole of their ideas and conclusions? Do they, in their public enunciations of policy, give the whole of their aspirations, aims, and objects? Not they.

Senator WALKER.—They have taken a leaf out of the book of the Labour Party.

Senator GIVENS.—I want to show the utter insincerity of the sort of criticism to which the Labour Party has been subjected. It is admitted by honorable senators opposite that they take exactly the same course which they denounce the Labour Party for taking; though we of the Labour Party have not done anything to justify the charges made. So far as the Labour Party are concerned, we are not revolutionary Socialists. We do not want to accomplish reforms by revolution, because we believe that reforms thus accomplished would not be lasting or have a good effect. What we believe in is evolution—a gradual growth. We want to take one step at a time, and judge by the circumstances of that time as to what the subsequent steps shall be. It has been charged against us that we are never satisfied—that we agitate until we get what we want, and then immediately reach out our hands for more. Of course we do, and quite right too. But the Tory is never content that that should be the case, although a moment's thought should convince him that the very fact that the people are never satisfied, but are always reaching out for more, is the surest guarantee of our continued prosperity, and the best assurance of the vitality and continued life of our race. When we sink to a state of plodding contentment, in which we are satisfied with anything that comes along, that day will spell stagnation, and stagnation will inevitably spell ruin. We desire to continually strive for something better, and that is what the Labour Party means to do—to keep on striving until they arrive at the final goal, whether that be this year, next year, or next century, when human effort can make no further progress towards human happiness. Until the sum total of possible human happiness is obtained, I hope the Labour Party, and every progressive party, will never rest content. I should like to make a passing reference to Senator Millen's observations on what he called the "Petriana scandal." These are not my words, but the words of Senator Millen, whom we now find supporting certain members of a Government who perpetrated that scandal. Could anything be more inconsistent or more degrading to the public life of the Commonwealth, than that a man in a representative position should describe a certain course of action as a scandal, and at the same time give his support to the very men who were guilty of what he denounces? The scandal, if scandal there was, lay in the lying and misrepresentations used by the Free-Trade Party of New South Wales for political purposes. It was lying of the most shameless description from beginning to end, and I do not hesitate to say so.

Senator KEATING.—Do not forget the Melbourne Argus.

Senator GIVENS.—There was the Melbourne Argus too; but it was the Free-trade Party who used this, and other dirty weapons, which I had better not mention in a respectable Chamber of this sort. It has been proved over and over again from the papers laid on the table during the session that the statements made about the Petriana case were absolutely false, and the parties who made the statements knew that they were false, but they used them deliberately, and of malice aforethought for the attainment of their own political ends. They could not fight nor win their case honorably, but had to descend to dirty political methods of this sort in their efforts to discredit the Government then in power. Now, strange to say, we find those gentlemen who denounced the "Petriana scandal," and the Government who perpetrated it, arm in arm, and cheek by jowl with the men they denounced.

Senator WALKER.—How about the Stelling case?

Senator GIVENS.—That was a case of a similar description. Honorable senators opposite are so much in love with the criminal that they want to gather him to their bosom with as little impediment as possible. If I were to go into the particulars of the "Petriana scandal," the Stelling case, or of the famous six hatters we heard so much noise about, my observations would be of inordinate length. As the Labour Party did not perpetrate the awful things which honorable senators opposite so freely and eloquently denounce, we are not on our defence, and we shall therefore leave it to Senator Drake, Sir George Turner, and other honorable gentlemen who are now associated with honorable senators opposite, to defend and explain the position. Senator Millen, in the course of his remarks said—and I think I quote him correctly—that the Labour Party stands for collective effort, while he stands for individualism; and before I conclude, I intend to deal with that aspect of the question. Senator Millen's statement, or enunciation of policy in this connexion can, I believe, be taken as fairly representative of the views expressed by most honorable members on the other side, and therefore my remarks will apply generally, and not to Senator Millen, or any other honorable senator, in particular. But prior to dealing with this matter I desire to point out for the benefit of the Senate and the people of the Commonwealth that the policy of the present Administration, so far as we have had any enunciation of it, is absolutely a colourless one, containing nothing which has not been promised or taken in hand by previous Administrations. That policy is one which the present head of the Government described in his celebrated speech at Warragul as a "crawling policy"; and now that it has been adopted by him I suppose we are justified in styling the Prime Minister a "crawling" politician.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—That is too elaborate a joke.

Senator GIVENS.—I do not know that. Mr. Reid was not a little bit delicate about applying the epithet, which I admit is not elegant. But the Labour Party did not invent the adjective in the first instance, and I am now using the eloquent language of such a distinguished statesman as the present head of the Government. So far as we have been able to find any policy in the declaration of the Government, it is that which they have stated on public platforms from one end of the Commonwealth to the other, and which has been stated by Senator Millen here—the policy of anti-Socialism. I do not think there is an honorable senator opposite who will deny that that indicates their real objection to the Labour Party, and is the real policy they are putting forward at the present time.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator had better define "Socialism" before he goes on.

Senator GIVENS.—I shall do that for the benefit of the honorable senator. Honorable senators opposite have denounced each other year after year, and Administration after Administration have denounced each other in the most bitter language; and I suppose we must give them credit for sincerity in advocating separate policies which each has declared would be ruinous to the country. The protectionists said that protection was the chief plank in their platform, and that without it the country would be ruined—that if the destinies of the Commonwealth were placed in the hands of the free-traders, it would be "good-bye" to the prosperity of Australia and of the various States. The free-traders said exactly the same thing about the protectionists, who were described as robbers of one class of the community for the benefit of another. Now we find the free-traders and the protectionists arm in arm.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—So they are in the Labour Party, are they not?

Senator GIVENS.—The Labour Party never deceived the public of Australia, but came forward with a straight-out platform, declaring that they put that platform first and the fiscal issue second.

Senator WALKER.—The Labour Party are apparently divided on the fiscal question.

Senator GIVENS.—Some of the members of the Labour Party hold free-trade principles, so far as fiscal ideas can be called principles, and there are other members who hold protectionist opinions. But, in my opinion, fiscal ideas of one kind or another are not principles, but mere matters of expediency, largely or almost entirely governed by time, place, and circumstances.

Senator PULSFORD.—The honorable senator is evidently a fiscal atheist, after all.

Senator GIVENS.—I am not a fiscal atheist. As we find those ardent free-traders arm-in-arm with the men they denounced as robbers—

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—It shows how forgiving they are.

Senator GIVENS.—It shows that greater than fiscal principles, or any differences which may have previously existed, there is a motive at work, and that great and guiding motive is hatred of the Labour Party—absolute hatred of the Labour Party.

Senator WALKER.—Political hatred.

Senator GIVENS.—I am speaking in no other sense but political.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I hope the honorable senator does not speak of me as hating the Labour Party, because I am all love for them.

Senator GIVENS.—The Attorney-General is as mild as a sucking dove, and would not, I am sure, say a word to disturb the equanimity or calm of this Chamber. I believe that when he spoke at a public function in Adelaide recently he denounced the Labour Party.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I think not.

Senator GIVENS.—Is the report wrong again?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I spoke in chastening love of them.

Senator GIVENS.—Yes, just like a mother feels when she spanks the baby. It is evident that there must have been some very strong motive to make these erstwhile political enemies on the other side come together.

Senator DOBSON.—When the alliance comes off what are the honorable senator's friends going to do? Go arm in arm together.

Senator GIVENS.—I have always been able to go arm in arm with any reformer, whether he has been a protectionist or a free-trader, because we did not put the fiscal question as a leading issue to the people, and we break no pledge by leaving it sunk. Furthermore, we always told the electors that it was a mere secondary matter, and that labour principles should receive first consideration, because we find that in free-trade England there are millions of persons who are in a condition of absolute starvation to-day, and that the same thing exists in protectionist America, showing conclusively that neither free-trade nor protection of itself will effect the industrial salvation of the masses of the people. But honorable senators on the other side put their fiscal faith first, and yet they have sunk it, joined together by a common hatred of the Labour Party—that is, of the aspirations of the masses of the people of Australia.

Senator WALKER.—In defence against attacks.

Senator GIVENS.—I shall be able to enlighten the honorable senator before I have finished. As a matter of fact, the party which is stigmatized as being all that is bad have no desire, as they have evidenced time and again, to grasp the governing power for the mere sake of being in office. The only desire we have ever had in entering the parliamentary arena, or accepting any public or administrative position, has been to promote the well-being of the people of Australia, as has been proved over and over again. We are here not to represent property or social position, or anything of that kind, but to represent the common rights of humanity. When honorable senators opposite have sunk their fiscal belief, and every point of difference which has hitherto existed between them, to fight us, unquestionably they are fighting against the well-being of the masses of the people.

Senator DOBSON.—You have a funny way of protecting the rights of the non-unionists.

Senator GIVENS.—We shall have an opportunity to discuss that question by-and-by, and it ought not to be necessary for me to remind an old parliamentarian like Senator Dobson that it is quite unusual, and, I believe, highly disorderly, to anticipate the debate on a measure. We welcome the coalition on the other side, because it places all the enemies of the masses of the people in one camp. We are not now liable to a flank attack. We have all our enemies in front of us, and we know exactly whom we have to deal with, and the people of Australia will continue to deal with them until, as occurred in Queensland the other day, they are practically wiped out.

Senator WALKER.—The Labour Party had to unite with a certain section there to do it.

Senator GIVENS.—Queensland has absolutely the worst franchise to be found in Australia. In some electorates the property vote amounts to 50 per cent. A man may possess a vote for every electorate in the State, and may record a vote for seventy-two candidates. But, in spite of the franchise and everything else, in a House of seventy-two members, we have thirty-four straight labour men, and we are allied with the Progressive Party of twenty members. In fact, the position is so unprecedented that benches have had to be removed from the Opposition to the Government side in order to accommodate all the Progressivists.

THE PRESIDENT.—Does the honorable senator think that that has anything to do with the policy of the Government?

Senator GIVENS.—So far as I know, sir, this debate is on the question as to whether a certain paper shall be printed or not.

THE PRESIDENT.—Yes, and on that question the policy of the Government and that of the Opposition can be debated.

Senator GIVENS.—I am showing that, according to the results of the recent Queensland elections, a very important portion of the Commonwealth is in entire opposition to the policy of the present Government, and I think, with all due respect to you, sir, I am entitled to quote a fact like that to bear out my argument. The only policy I have been able to discover on the other side, if it is worthy of being called a policy, is that the Government and their supporters are against the Labour Party. What does that mean? It means that they are against the workers of the community, because the Labour Party aspires to represent the workers.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator told us about ten minutes ago that the Labour Party represent all the people.

Senator GIVENS.—I think I shall have to come down to definitions or "fundamentals," in order to instruct the honorable and learned senator.

Senator DOBSON.—I hope that the honorable senator will stick there.

Senator GIVENS.—I do not intend to stick at the bottom all the time. The honorable and learned senator would like the majority of the people to stick at the bottom, and allow him to trample upon them just as he likes; but they are not going to stick there. When I speak of the workers, I speak about the only persons in the community who are worth talking about.

Senator DOBSON.—That is right. The Labour Party are not representing all the people, but only the workers.

Senator GIVENS.—I define a worker to mean any person in the community who performs a useful function, whether by brain or by hand, either in production, or in distribution. That definition is wide enough to cover at least 90 per cent. of the community. Any man who does not perform a useful function—I do not care if he be a millionaire—is not worth considering. Because, after all, there are only two classes in the community—the workers and the loafers. A millionaire can be a loafer, just as much as a man who is taken up in the street and given six months under the Vagrant Act. The millionaire is very often the worst sort of loafer, because not only is his own capacity for wealth production wasted, but the capacity for usefulness of dozens of persons is wasted in waiting upon him. That is an economic truth which may not be acceptable to Senator Dobson.

Senator DOBSON.—It is very contradictory of former remarks of the honorable senator.

Senator GIVENS.—I have not accused the honorable and learned senator of understanding anything. I am here to state the case as well as I can, and put forward plain arguments in its support. But I am not here to supply the honorable and learned senator with the necessary brains to understand them.

Senator MULCAHY.—What has a senator's personal qualifications to do with the policy of the Government?

Senator GIVENS.—I submit that when stupid interjections are being continually fired off at me, I am entitled to explain the difficulty I am in in meeting a gentleman of the density of Senator Dobson. Why are the Labour Party hated so much by honorable senators on the other side? They hate us so much that they have sunk the fiscal principles which are so dear to them in order to "down" us. Our aims can stand any amount of criticism. We do not desire to do an injustice to any person in the community, whether he is rich or poor. All we ask for is a fair deal for every man, woman, and child. We intend to insist that every person shall get a fair deal.

Senator DOBSON.—The honorable senator called a man who has land or money a robber.

Senator GIVENS.—I refuse to have words put into my mouth by Senator Dobson; I did not call any man a robber.

Senator DOBSON.—Some members of the Labour Party did.

Senator GIVENS.—The honorable and learned senator cannot accuse me of not expressing my opinions fully and plainly this evening. I have not minced my words, nor shall I. If I believe that a man is a robber, I shall tell him so, either here or outside. The Labour Party will insist upon getting a fair deal for every person. So far, there has been one law for the rich and one law for the poor. It is very likely that the Attorney-General will deny that.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not assent to it.

Senator GIVENS.—That implies that the honorable and learned senator does not deny my statement.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I do not assent to it.

Senator GIVENS.—If it is denied, I can quote innumerable instances to show where there has been one law for the rich, and one law for the poor. The Labour Party want to make no such distinction as that. We desire to have one law for the rich and poor alike, and to have it clearly understood that no man shall get an exemption from a law because of his social position, or his wealth, or anything else. We want to make the law courts and the fount of justice as free to the poorest individual in the community as to the highest.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Is not that so now?

Senator GIVENS.—It may be in theory, but it is not in practice.

Senator WALKER.—Is it fair play to give a preference to unionists?

Senator GIVENS.—I have said several times that it is disorderly to anticipate the debate on a measure, and I do not intend to break the rule. I shall argue that point with the greatest pleasure, either with Senator Dobson or with Senator Walker when the proper time comes. The criticism which is levelled against the Labour Party and its methods strikes me as being exceedingly stupid. Only a party that is devoid of any sound logical reason would stoop to make some of the miserable excuses which have been put forward by honorable senators opposite as reasons why they dislike and hate the Labour Party. In the first place, we are accused of putting forward a cast-iron programme. Are we not entitled to tell the people before we seek their suffrages what our views are on the principal questions of the day? Would it be honest for us not to do so? And yet because we put forward our views in plain black and white, because we took the people into our confidence, and told them exactly what we mean, it is sought to hound us out of public life. That is what it means when they object to our cast-iron platform. We are also accused of signing a pledge. Why should we not sign a pledge to the people? The past political history of every State in the Commonwealth has proved that a number of people have gone on to the platform, and have virtually pledged themselves to certain specific political principles, but have betrayed the people when they got into Parliament. They have afterwards denied that they gave such pledges, simply because there was no definite record that they had done so. We take out of the hands of any member of our party the possibility of deceiving the people in that way. We say, "If you want to be a member of our party, you must subscribe to the broad principles which we believe in, and which every member of our party subscribes to." Is it unreasonable that before a person is recognised by us as one of ourselves, he should be asked to sign and subscribe to exactly the same platform as that to which we have given our adherence? There is no coercion in that. If a man does not wish to sign the platform, he is perfectly free not to do so; only we must be given the same liberty to keep our party clear of men who will not subscribe to our principles. There is nothing improper in any member of Parliament signing a pledge to the people who elect him. Let me remind honorable senators that before they take their place in this Chamber, they have not only to sign a pledge, but to swear to it. Take the case of a minister of religion in any denomination. That holy man—whom we might reasonably be expected to have his word taken without making any definite pledge—is expected to make a public vow that he believes in certain things. Is it not a fact that a justice of the peace, when he is appointed, has not only to pledge his word, but to swear that he will administer justice evenly and impartially? Is it not a fact that in nearly every public office of any consequence a man has not only to sign a pledge, but to swear it? Turn to the highest office in the Empire. Take King Edward himself. Before he mounted the throne of England, he not only had to sign a pledge, but to swear in the most solemn manner; and that pledge was the most cast-iron one that could be imagined. I think that what is good enough for King Edward, who is so much admired by ultra loyal senators opposite, ought to

Senator DOBSON.—We are governed by discussion, not by cast-iron pledges.

Senator GIVENS.—Every one knows that Parliament is a deliberative assembly, but is it not a fact that every member comes into Parliament with certain definite convictions and principles? Does he not tell the electors that he will enter Parliament with certain fixed ideas in his mind as to the best things to do under certain circumstances? There is plenty of room for discussion and deliberation in reference to the details of those principles and measures to give the fullest possible room for individual liberty. Take a supposititious case. Senator Dobson believes that human life is sacred. He would not hesitate for a moment to go on any platform and say that he was in favour of any law which would prohibit the taking of life and punish any man who did violence to another. Would that pledge deprive him, when he entered Parliament, from exercising a full discretion as to the details of any measure that was intended to carry out that principle? No one knows better than Senator Dobson that it would not, and he is really beating the air in putting forward ridiculous objections of that kind.

Senator DOBSON.—Facts are never ridiculous; this is a deliberative assembly, and the honorable senator's party come into it bound hand and foot, and can do nothing.

Senator GIVENS.—There is not a member of our party who comes into Parliament bound hand and foot in any way. Every member gives his adherence to certain principles which have been agitating the public mind, and which are prominently before the electors. The public are entitled to know the attitude of candidates upon those subjects. But after a member of our party comes into Parliament he has a perfect right to discuss the details of any measure as to how far it is necessary to go, and what it is necessary to do, in order to give due effect to the principles to which he has adhered. Another thing which has been urged against the Labour Party is that we deliberate in caucus. Senator Dobson said that he is in favour of deliberation, yet he denounces us because we deliberate too much.

Senator DOBSON.—I want the honorable senator's party to deliberate in public, not in secret.

Senator GIVENS.—Has Senator Dobson ever attended a caucus meeting?

Senator DOBSON.—I think I held about three in two years.

Senator GIVENS.—That shows what an autocrat the honorable and learned senator was when he was in power, and how dangerous it would be to allow the semblance of power to a man who would not even consult his own supporters more than twice or thrice in two years. What is infinitely worse than caucus government is government by one man who is determined to do what he likes without consulting others. But the very fact that Senator Dobson held two or three caucus meetings gives away his whole case. To hold one caucus meeting is as bad as to hold a dozen. A dozen meetings are just as capable of being justified as one if they are necessary. But the most effective form of caucus meeting of which I have ever heard is a Cabinet meeting. Senator Mulcahy has been a Cabinet Minister. When his Cabinet met did they do so publicly? Did they take the representatives of the people into their confidence? On the contrary, they were sworn to secrecy when they accepted office. The very men who have attended Cabinet meetings, which were absolutely secret, have the unblushing effrontery and the cast-iron audacity to condemn us for holding caucus meetings! How is a party to arrive at the best line of policy to pursue unless they hold caucus meetings? Why should they not consult with each other? Is there anything inherently wrong in it, or anything that can be offensive to any fair-minded man? Undoubtedly not. Those who condemn us for holding caucus meetings without any adequate reason also object to our platform, though not because of what is contained in it, for they are coquetting with most of it themselves. They object to us because they call us Socialists. I do not mince matters for a moment. I never did deny, and I never will deny, that I am a Socialist, nor shall I ever feel a little bit ashamed of being a Socialist. I believe that Socialism is the only system which will secure the industrial salvation of the masses of the people. Socialism is more than justified by everything that we see around us in our civilization. I will not give my own opinion as to what civilization is, but I will quote an expert opinion. Professor Alfred Russell Wallace, in his celebrated work on the Malay Archipelago, in his concluding chapters, makes a few observations upon this subject. It must be remembered that he is a man in the highest ranks of science. After spending seven years in the Malay Archipelago amongst savage races, he said that if civilization had nothing better to offer us than we see around us to-day, then that civilization stands condemned, as compared with the savagery which he witnessed amongst the Malays. Senator Millen said that the difference between his party and ours is the difference between Individualism and Socialism. I accept that as correct. What is the result of the individualism which we see around us? During the recent debates in England on preferential trade, it has been stated repeatedly that, out of a population of about 40,000,000 in the United Kingdom, there are 12,000,000 who are continually on the verge of starvation, notwithstanding the fact that Great Britain is the wealthiest nation in the world. At the same time, millions of money are lying absolutely idle, because profitable investment cannot be found for them. That is the position in free-trade England; but I am free to admit that the state of things in protectionist America is almost as bad. Go to Germany, to France, or to any other country, and you will find that as wealth has accumulated in the hands of a few, so has misery increased amongst the many. Where are the effects of individualism? Individualism will callously crush the life out of the little child, if that child stands between it and the realization of its profits. It will separate the wife from the husband. It will compel children to go without adequate education or even without adequate food, in the interests of profit-making. Individualism, for the sake of profits, will even poison the children, by giving them adulterated milk and food. What do we see in Victoria, as the result of the inquiries of the Royal Commission on the butter bonuses? If the statements made before that Commission are proved, and they have not been contradicted, men who have moved in the highest ranks of commercial life, men against whom no breath of suspicion was formerly urged, are now being arraigned before the public, and I venture to say that in the minds of the public they must for ever stand condemned, owing to the malpractices of which they have been guilty. They have done what they have been accused of doing, in the pursuit of individualism, the chief ideal of which is the increase of profits, irrespective of the good of the State, or of any canon of morality. They fulfilled the commercial law of getting the highest profits it was possible for them to grab by any means in their power. That is individualism all through. Has not the State been compelled to pass laws to prevent adulteration; to prevent the trade of the country being ruined by the malpractices of exporters in exporting shoddy and inferior goods? Has it not been necessary to have State interference in a thousand and one forms at every turn in every civilized nation? Why has this State interference been necessary? It is owing to the evil results of the system of individualism, a system by which every man grabs all he can for himself, irrespective of the well-being of the State, and of every other individual in the community. The aim of the merchant, the exporter, the importer, and everybody engaged in trade is to grasp every possible profit, and men cannot do that without being hard, cruel, and callous to those with whom they are dealing, those whom they employ, and to all with whom they come in contact. I do not altogether blame people for these things, because the action taken is often absolutely forced upon them by the conditions under which they live. Suppose that an exporter of butter, carrying on business in Victoria, had acted absolutely honestly for the last eight or nine years. Suppose he refused to take anything but his legitimate profit, acted fairly by the men with whom he was dealing here, and by those with whom he was dealing on the other side of the world, as well as with the carriers who transported his produce. He could not possibly have hoped to make a living in competition with the men who were getting secret commissions, the men who were stealing the Government brand and putting it upon their goods without authority or justification, and the men who were guilty of all the malpractices which have been exposed by the Butter Commission. When we see all these evils rampant, is it not time that every individual, who has the welfare of the community at heart, should ask himself what is the remedy, or can a remedy be found? Why are so many of the people poor, and so few very rich. In England at the present time 80 per cent. of the total wealth of that mighty kingdom is in the hands of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the community. Ninety-eight and a half per cent. of the community have to be content with 20 per cent. of its wealth. Is not that an awful condition of affairs? Is it not safe also to say that the 98½ per cent., who do not own the wealth, have produced the greater portion of it? Undoubtedly they have. Yet they have little or nothing to-day. Starvation is their lot. The fear of want continually assails them. Although they may be in full work to-day, they may be out of work to-morrow with nothing but starvation staring them in the face. That is the result of individualism. We want something better than that. We require a remedy for that state of things if one is to be found, and no one who has the welfare of the people at heart can rest content until a remedy is found. There should be some means by which, so long as people are willing and capable of working, they should be afforded ample opportunity to produce a sufficiency of all things to supply their daily needs. What is the explanation put forward by honorable senators opposite, and those in all parts of the world who think as they do, for the misery we see around us? What is their explanation for the unemployed, and for times of depression, which they all agree result in a great deal of harm, but which they say cannot be remedied? If there is depression to-day, they generally say it is because of over-production at some other time. The market is glutted, because the harvest is good and prices are very low. There has been over-production, too many boots have been put on the market, production has outpaced consumption, there is a glut in the market, and bootmakers are idle. It is the same with the clothing and every other trade one could mention. I ask whether, to an intelligent man, statements of that kind do not appear to be the utterest nonsense? How can there be over production of wheat and breadstuffs, whilst people are starving for the want of bread? How can there be over-production of boots, when in the old country men, women, and children are without boots to wear? How can there be over-production of clothing and blankets when people are going around suffering from the cold because of their nakedness and their want of these things? So on through the whole gamut. The argument is not sound, and I say that so long as a human want remains unsatisfied there can be no over-production. Why should there be any over-production? Under a proper and well-organized system, if there were over-production of one article, people would immediately set about striking a balance by producing something else that was wanted, and there would be a sufficiency of all things to go round. That is what collective effort means — organized effort against individual effort which has resulted in disaster, and in periods of depression, during which hundreds and thousands of people have been thrown out of work, and starvation has stared them in the face. That, we are told, is the result of over-production, and I deny that there can be over-production when the whole of the people are never fully satisfied in any one particular line. But supposing the explanation given were true, it only furnishes another argument in favour of organized collective effort as against disorganized individual effort. We require some means by which the masses of the people will be enabled, by legitimate toil, to supply themselves with a sufficiency of the comforts and necessities of life. We require also that this shall be accomplished in such a way that people will not be compelled to endure a life of grinding slavery. The statistician, who is the most necessary man in public life to-day, proves that if every able-bodied man were to work a reasonable amount of time there could be a great deal more of the good things of life produced than there is to-day, in a great deal less time. That would mean that no one would have to do too much work, and there would be ample leisure time for recreation and improvement for everybody. This is what we hope to be able to obtain by Socialism. We hope to go on in the direction of Socialism for a very considerable time. We do not hope to reach the ultimate goal to-day or to-morrow. We may not reach it in the next century, or the century after that, but we do hope to go on in the way which we know results in benefits to the people. We desire to take one step at a time, and to be guided by circumstances as to the best and wisest step to take in the future. Members of the Labour Party are not here to represent the privileged classes. We object to all privilege. We do not desire that any one should have privileges, whether he be rich or poor. But let me say right here, that if a privilege should be given to anybody, it should be given to the poor man. Why? Because he needs it most. The wealthy individual can generally look after himself very well, and if a privilege is to be granted to any one, it should be to the poor man, who does not enjoy many of the advantages of this world. But we do not advocate that anybody should be given privileges. We argue that everybody should get absolute justice. If absolute justice were granted to every man, no man would require charity or favours, and we do not advocate that they should be given them. We are for a fair deal for every man, rich or poor, and we intend to keep on fighting until we get it. I believe that a first essential and preliminary, in order that every man may be given a fair deal in this Commonwealth, is that we should turn out the present Government as soon as possible, and I hope we shall shortly have the pleasure of doing so.

Debate (on motion by Senator PULSFORD) adjourned.

Senate adjourned at 9.42 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 14 September, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

LEGISLATION IN THE INTERESTS OF PRODUCERS.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I desire to ask the Postmaster-General whether it is true, as he is reported to have said, that it is the intention of the Government to ask Parliament to legislate in the interests of producers, as against persons who make secret commissions upon sales of produce, and, if so, under what power in the Constitution is the Government acting; further, whether it is the policy of the Government to encourage socialistic experiments of that kind?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—My honorable and learned friend ought to be a good judge of socialistic experiments. I delivered an address at Numurkah on Monday last, in which I incidentally referred to the evidence given by witnesses examined by the Butter Commission. At the same time, I pointed out that it was the policy of the Government to assist in placing the products of the Commonwealth upon the London market.

Mr. WATSON.—That is very good Socialism.

Mr. REID.—It embodies a sound commercial principle.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I stated that it was the policy of the Government to assist the producers by appointing a High Commissioner, and in other ways. I pointed out at the same time that I understood that honorable members opposite were in accord with the policy of the Government in that direction.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—We do not know what the policy of the Government is.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I said also that we were in favour of assisting the producers by establishing a Department of Agriculture, if we could do so, after a conference with the States Governments, on the lines suggested by the honorable and learned member for Bendigo. I believe that the proposal submitted by the honorable and learned member will receive the general sanction of honorable members. At all events, honorable members may rest assured that it has the strong sympathy of the Government.

MINIMUM WAGE ON GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

Mr. MAUGER.—I wish to ask the Minister of Home Affairs whether he will insist upon the union minimum rates of wages being paid to the carpenters and others who are working upon the new offices of the Commonwealth in Russell-street? It has come to my knowledge that the rates now being paid are in some cases 1s. or 2s. per day lower than those which are generally recognised in the trades to which the workmen belong.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I understand that our contracts provide, as directed by Parliament, that the minimum wage shall be paid to all workmen employed by the contractor. I have no knowledge of any exception having been made in connexion with the contract to which the honorable member has referred. If that condition, or any other, is not being fulfilled, it will be the duty of the Government to see that that is done.

PAPER.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH laid upon the table the following paper:—

Post Office Money Order Transactions, 1901, 1902, and 1903.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Motion (by Mr. WATSON) agreed to—

That leave of absence for one month be granted to the right honorable member for Adelaide.

SUNDAY WORK AT FLAT TOP.

Mr. BAMFORD asked the Minister of Trade and Customs, upon notice—

1. Whether it is correct that the Minister has withdrawn or altered the regulation, lately in force, which disallowed the loading or discharging of cargo at Flat Top Island anchorage, Queensland, on Sundays?

2. If so, what were the representations made to the Minister which induced him to allow of the resumption of Sunday work at the place named?

3. Further, if the Minister has withdrawn the regulation referred to, were any inquiries made by him, before taking action, as to the objections held by persons interested, other than shippers and consignees, to cargo being worked on Sundays, and as to why the regulation forbidding Sunday work at Flat Top had been issued by previous Ministers?

Mr. McLEAN.—As this question refers to a very important matter, I thought it desirable to obtain all the information on the subject available in the Department.

1 and 2. As a general principle the working of vessels on Sundays is not allowed by the Department, and no regulation in violation of that principle has been made. In July, 1902, Mr. Kingston, who was then Minister, directed that, as a temporary arrangement, and pending further consideration, Sunday work might be allowed in Tidal Ports, Open Roadsteads, and Outer Anchorages or other places on the Queensland coast, where the conditions were of an exceptional nature.

In May, 1904, the following order was issued by the Minister, Mr. Fisher:—

In regard to the carrying out of the regulations the following relaxation may be made with regard to the working of vessels on Sundays, and certain holidays, viz.:—Good Friday, Christmas Day, and Eight Hours Day.

Mails may be taken on board and landed, and passengers may land and embark, but no cargo may be shipped or discharged. (This was in accordance with previous practice.)

As to Queensland: That small ports where coastal vessels are in the habit of calling for (say) an hour or two for the purpose of loading local produce, Sunday work may be permitted when, in the opinion of the collector, there is absolute necessity for it; otherwise the standing rule is to be strictly enforced.

In August, 1904, strong representations were made by representative merchants and others to the Minister (Mr. Fisher) in favour of relaxing the above arrangements (especially in regard to Keppel Bay), as a result of which instructions were issued that the previous practice should not be interfered with at that port till the 1st November next, in order to allow of readjustment of time-table of vessels and trains, &c. The representations above-mentioned were supplemented by a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce, Mackay, indorsed by the Brisbane Chamber of Commerce, and supported by the Queensland Government, to the effect that the conditions prevailing prior to the issue of the order of May, 1904, be reverted to at Flat Top and Keppel Bay, and were forwarded for the Minister's consideration. The Minister decided that the concession granted in the case of Keppel Bay might be extended to Flat Top, the conditions as to both these ports being similar, on the understanding that it should not cover the loading of entire cargoes or large quantities of produce.

3. Representations made on both sides were fully considered, but seeing that the two ports mentioned had been treated alike up to the beginning of August, it did not seem equitable to grant a concession in one case and refuse it in the other. As a matter of fact, it was found that absolute prohibition of Sunday work had not been strictly enforced up to the date mentioned at those ports.

Before the 1st of November the views of all persons concerned, such as the Queensland State Government, the various bodies connected with the handling of goods, the residents of the districts referred to, and the Chamber of Commerce, &c., will be fully considered with the object of arriving at a satisfactory settlement of the question.

It will be seen that the concession I granted to Flat Top Island was the same that had been granted by my predecessor in the case of Keppel Bay; that is, that the previous practice should be allowed to continue to the 1st November in order to give us time to look thoroughly into the question. But the concession I granted was in a modified form, and only applied to portions of cargoes; where there are large quantities of cargo to handle they will have to wait.

Mr. BAMFORD.—I have reason to believe that that rule has been violated.

Mr. McLEAN.—Those are the instructions I issued.

FORTNIGHTLY PAYMENT OF COMMONWEALTH SALARIES.

Mr. RONALD asked the Treasurer, upon notice—

(1) If he could give an estimate of what the extra cost would be of paying all salaries in the Commonwealth fortnightly rather than monthly, as at present?

(2) What the extra cost would be of paying salaries up to £156 per annum fortnightly rather than monthly, as at present?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I am not in a position at the present time to give an estimate of the cost of paying salaries fortnightly, instead of monthly. This is a matter which has been brought up on several occasions. About two years ago I looked into the question, and a reference to the different Departments showed that considerable extra expenditure would be required for this particular purpose, and there were other departmental objections. However, as this is a matter within the control of the Minister of Home Affairs, who has to deal with the Public Service, I propose to discuss the matter with him at an early date, and see whether some arrangement other than that suggested by the Departments, which would mean extra expenditure, cannot be arrived at, by which a certain number of employes may be paid fortnightly. Personally, I am in sympathy with the suggestion, if it does not disturb the Departments or cost too much.

PUBLIC SERVANTS' INCREMENTS.

Mr. RONALD asked the Minister of Home Affairs, upon notice—

(1) How many men entitled to increments under section 19 of the Public Service Act of Victoria have been paid according to the decision of the Federal High Court?

(2) What has the cost of litigation been in this matter?

(3) How much was paid in increments according to section 19 without litigation, and to whom were these increments paid? Is the Minister aware that it has been said that all the higher salaries in the service were paid without dispute and litigation? Is such statement correct?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—I shall endeavour to obtain the information and lay it upon the table of Parliament in the form of a return.

RETIREMENTS FROM THE DEFENCE FORCES.

Mr. CROUCH asked the Minister of Defence, upon notice—

(1) Whether it is true, as stated in the press, that Colonel Savage and Colonel Taunton, of New South Wales, were awarded compensation or retiring allowance?

(2) What was the amount in each case, and for what reason was it given?

(3) Does the Minister propose to treat similarly all ranks in all States who retire from the Defence Forces, and, if not, why?

Mr. McCAY.—The replies to the honorable and learned member's questions are as follow:—

1. Yes.

2. Lt.-Col. Savage received £1,154 17s. 2d., and Colonel Taunton £1,619 17s. 3d. The services of these officers were dispensed with in pursuance of a scheme of retrenchment rendered necessary to meet the wish of Parliament for a reduction in Defence expenditure—that was in 1902-3—

and in view of the exceptional circumstances, Parliament was asked, and agreed to vote a sum as compensation (computed at the rate of one month's pay for each year of service) to members of the Permanent Forces retired in consequence of such retrenchment.

I may add that that compensation was given to every one retired at that time, in consequence of retrenchment.

Mr. CROUCH.—I did not notice it was at the same time.

Mr. McCAY.—The reply to the third question is:—

It was announced to Parliament at the time when these and other gratuities were approved that they were not to be regarded as a precedent; and it is not intended to establish a practice of granting gratuities on retirement.

KALGOORLIE TO PORT AUGUSTA RAILWAY SURVEY BILL.

In Committee (consideration of Governor-General's message resumed from 19 September, vide page 4580) on motion Mr. BATCHELOR—

That it is expedient that an appropriation of moneys be made for the purposes of a Bill for an Act to authorize the survey of a route for a railway to connect Kalgoorlie, in the State of Western Australia, with Port Augusta, in the State of South Australia.

Mr. KENNEDY (Moira).—I regret that in my remarks up to the present I have been drawn away by interjection from the subject immediately under discussion, namely, the desirableness or otherwise of entering into an undertaking of the nature without the consent of the State concerned, as provided in the Constitution. But having been drawn aside, I am compelled to follow a little longer the same line of argument. Considerable stress has been laid on the point that from a military point of view this line is absolutely essential for the safe defence of Australia; and I propose to take up the time of the Committee in order to briefly refer to the opinion expressed by the ablest military authority we have in the Commonwealth, Major-General Hutton. I have not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with the General Officer Commanding, but I may reasonably assume, from the position he occupies—the salary for which is provided by the taxpayers—that he is well qualified for his duties. The report of the General Officer Commanding on this matter was published, owing to the fact that the Minister of Defence saw fit to refer the report of the engineers on the proposed railway to the Defence Department. The first document dealing with the matter is dated 24th March, 1903.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is a later report than that.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That interjection reminds me how well it would be if we practised what we preached. The right honorable member for Swan has always held forth to the House the desirability of doing to others as we would be done by, and not later than last evening we had him repeatedly explaining to honorable members who ventured to interject that they would be able to express their opinions in the course of their own speeches. Since I commenced speaking I have been subjected to continuous correction at the hands of the right honorable member, but my desire to inform the Committee of what, in my opinion, is our position, and not to be advised entirely by the right honorable gentleman. I have no feeling of resentment against the right honorable member on account of his interjections, but he reminds me very much of a spoilt child, who is not subject to reproof in any way. I ask the right honorable member for Swan to consider from my point of view the time involved by his drawing me aside, even momentarily, from the main subject under consideration. The first document of March, 1903, is from the Secretary of the Department over which the right honorable gentleman presided, and is as follows:—

I have the honour to forward herewith copy of Report of the Conference of Engineers-in-Chief upon the subject of the proposed Transcontinental Railway, and to ask that same may be considered by the Defence Department and report furnished, in view of the possible strategical importance of this railway in connexion with the defence of Australia.

The reply to that was—

In reply to your minute of 30th March last requesting that I would submit for your consideration a minute upon the Report of the Conference of Engineers-in-Chief upon the proposed Transcontinental Railway, I beg to observe as follows:—

1. The contemplated extension of railway communication between Kalgoorlie in Western Australia and Port Augusta in South Australia is, from a strategical and military point of view, of unquestionable value. The isolation of Western Australia without direct land communication with the other five States of Australia will, in time of war, cause a general feeling of insecurity. Under the existing circumstances, Western Australia, for purposes of co-operative military assistance from the other States, is as far distant from direct means of reinforcement as New Zealand is from the Eastern States of Australia.

2. In order, however, to correctly view the present construction of the railway in question as an important factor in the defence of the Commonwealth, it will be well to consider the special importance of Western Australia in the eyes of foreign powers, and the description of attack to which Australia is subject, and to meet which intercommunication between the States by land must be regarded as of paramount value.

The potential wealth of the gold-fields, and the vast extent of valuable and unoccupied land in the territories of Western Australia, render the acquisition of that portion of the Australian Continent a most valuable prize to foreign nations. The strategical situation, moreover, of Western Australia, dominating, as it does, the southern side of the Indian Ocean, and the converging trade routes from the West, must be considered as of the greatest importance to British and Australian interests.

As long as the supremacy of the sea is in the hands of the Royal Navy no serious attack on Australia upon a large scale may be considered as practicable. In this regard little attention need be paid to the temporary and local effect of a raid by one or two of an enemy's ships upon one or other of the undefended ports. It would, however, be the height of folly to disregard the possibility of the supremacy of the sea being temporarily or permanently lost.

I submit that the construction of a line of railway from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie would not materially influence the condition of the British Navy. Consequently the carrying out of this project would not sensibly affect the military or naval defence of Australia.

Mr. FOWLER.—It would mean a great deal in the defence of Australia.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I will deal with that aspect of the question presently. The report continues—

It is impossible to foresee the result of naval warfare in the future, or to anticipate the effect of fleets acting on the part of a combination of great Powers hostile to British Imperial interests. In the event, therefore, of the supremacy of the sea being either temporarily or permanently lost by either of the foregoing possible contingencies, an attack on a large scale might be attempted with every reasonable chance of success either on the shores of Western Australia or on some other part of the immense coast line of the Australian Continent. It may be assumed that no Power or combination of Powers would undertake an attack of such magnitude without employing from 20,000 to 50,000 well equipped, well trained, and well organized troops, according to the extent of the contemplated operations.

It may be safely assumed that a hostile invasion of the description indicated, and with a view to permanent territorial occupation, would never be attempted in Western Australia with a less force than 20,000 men, and that a force at least equal in numbers and equal in equipment would be required in defence.

It may be as well to state at once that a force of the requisite strength organized and capable of taking the field does not at present exist in Australia, and that there are at present no local means of equipping such a force.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—At present.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Yes. The right honorable member reminds me of the spoilt child again. He desires to see a railway constructed for the purpose of conveying troops which have no existence. Moreover, according to the best authority, we have no local means of equipping such a force.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We are getting the equipment.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I admit that. We are also growing older. The report proceeds—

The organization is wanting; the departments necessary for a mobile army have yet to be created; and there are neither sufficient guns, arms, equipment, nor ammunition available. It will therefore be seen that the construction of the railway as contemplated would, under existing circumstance, confer no advantage to Australia in its present condition of military disorganization and unpreparedness.

I ask those who argue that the construction of the Transcontinental Railway is absolutely necessary for the defence of Australia, to put forward something in refutation of that statement.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Another report was issued ten months later than that from which the honorable member is quoting—a report which he has evidently not read.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have read it, and if the right honorable member for Swan will act upon the advice which he so constantly tenders to the Committee, by saying what he thinks during the course of his speech, he will be better employed than in attempting to put his ideas into my mouth. The report further states—

The most that could be expected from the military situation at present existing would be the concentration of a certain number of armed men, who, without adequate organization, administrative departments, or the required equipment, would be quite incapable of coping with even an inferior number of an invader's troops, carefully trained, organized, and equipped with the latest modern appliances, as they unquestionably would be.

It will, therefore, be seen from the foregoing that, important as it would be for defence purposes to possess Inter-State communication as proposed, the establishment of railway communication would in itself be of small value without a military force being in existence which could be utilized by its means with any reasonable hope of success.

It has been stated that a wonderful transformation has been effected in the military establishments of Australia since March, 1903. I would ask those who entertain that view to supply the Committee with authentic information as to the exact increase which has taken place in the strength of the Military Forces since that period, and as to their equipment to-day as compared with that which existed twelve months ago. I do not propose to occupy any further time—

Mr. CARPENTER.—Go on.

Mr. FOWLER.—Criticism will not damage this proposal.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I wish to be fair. Unfortunately, we are not in a position to discuss the merits of the proposed railway. We have only very meagre information in regard to it.

Mr. FOWLER.—Does that not indicate the necessity which exists for a survey being made?

Mr. KENNEDY.—It may. But I have attempted to show that the obligation for completing this survey rests upon those States which will be benefited by the railway if constructed.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable member should not forget his water scheme.

Mr. KENNEDY.—It is that sort of interjection which is responsible for the coining of the phrase "log-rolling." Surely the honorable member will not be a party to anything of that character. Let us deal with each proposal submitted upon its merits. The interjection of the honorable member suggests that in the future I may be interested in some irrigation scheme, and that therefore I should not criticise this proposal too harshly. It implies that if I do not wink at it I shall incur the wrath of those who are directly interested in the project.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I did not imply any such thing.

Mr. KENNEDY.—In the course of his speech the honorable member will have an opportunity of saying what he did imply.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable member is distinctly unfair, notwithstanding that a few minutes ago he declared that he wished to be fair.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have no desire to be unfair, but it is not pleasant to be blocked in the middle of a sentence.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable member makes insinuations.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I do not. I shall be only too delighted if the honorable member is in a position to refute my statements. Last night I referred to the astuteness of those gentlemen with whom previous Prime Ministers had to deal. I pointed out that the present Prime Minister occupies a unique position, in that, both in season and out of season, he has advocated the construction of this railway. If I understand their utterances aright, a number of members of the present Cabinet were not always wedded to this undertaking, or to the expenditure of any money. The correspondence which I have read proves that previous Prime Ministers did not entertain any idea of proceeding with this work until the assent of the States concerned had been obtained. Up to the present, the assent of the South Australian Government has not been secured. That Government has refused to consent to the construction of this line, even if the closest investigation proves that the estimate of the probable cost will not be exceeded, and the survey does not disclose any unforeseen difficulties. I have already referred to a statement made in the Legislature of Western Australia, which is embodied in a pamphlet issued, I believe, under the auspices of the ex-Premier of Western Australia, Mr. James. Under the head of "Remonstrances in the Western Australian Parliament," we find at page 10 of this pamphlet, the statement that—

The matter came before the Legislature of Western Australia on October 6, on a motion in the Assembly for adjournment proposed by a gold-fields member, the leader of the Labour Party, when all the gold-fields members took the opportunity to indignantly repudiate what was characterized as "the misinterpretation of the gold-fields sentiments by the Premier of South Australia," and strongly condemned the latter's utterances. Other members spoke in the same strain; and Mr. James read the recent correspondence between himself and Mr. Jenkins on the whole matter of the proposed railway. He announced that he had just received a letter from the latter, dated September 29th, in which it was stated that there was "no likelihood whatever" of South Australia "at any time" passing a Bill for the construction of the Union Railway, "except upon strict conditions as to both route and gauge."

It is most extraordinary that no intimation of this sort has ever been made in any of the correspondence which has passed between the Premier of South Australia and the respective Prime Ministers of the Commonwealth. In correspondence with the Premier of Western Australia, the Premier of South Australia has refused point blank to assent to the construction of the line, except with reservations as to both route and gauge.

Mr. FOWLER.—That is merely the attitude of the present Premier of South Australia. We have had others who held a different view of the matter, and shall probably have such men again in office.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is so, but I think that particular attention should be paid at the present time to the facts which I have put before the Committee. The present Premier of South Australia, whilst officially expressing the opinion that the Parliament of that State is not bound by promises made by his predecessors in office, would, nevertheless, attempt to bind the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth in that way. He reminded the late Prime Minister, the honorable member for Bland, when a final appeal was made to him, that the Commonwealth Government was practically bound to the expenditure involved in making this survey by a promise which had been made by a previous Prime Minister, but Mr. Jenkins would repudiate all obligations with respect to promises or pledges given by his predecessors in office. When we have to deal with such a gentleman we cannot be too careful in regard to our position. It is clearly and distinctly stated in the pamphlet to which I have referred that it is only subject to the reservations named that there is any possibility of the South Australian Parliament assenting to the construction of this line by the Commonwealth. What does that imply so far as the questions of route and of gauge are concerned? We know that the lengths already constructed are not laid down on the gauge that we are likely to adopt as the standard for Australia.

Mr. FOWLER.—The Premier of Western Australia has expressed the willingness of his Government to construct a 4ft. 8½in. gauge line up to the fields.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Enabling Bill passed by the Western Australian Parliament shows that, if it shows anything at all. Between Kalgoorlie and the Western Australian coast there are over 300 miles of railway that will have to be widened.

Mr. FOWLER.—The State Government will lay down a new line.

Mr. KENNEDY.—But what about the cost of making a similar alteration of the line between Adelaide and Port Augusta? Is one of the causes of the objection of South Australia to this proposal to be found in that consideration?

Mr. GLYNN.—There are two breaks there.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I have no personal knowledge of the facts, but I gather from the reports that it would be possible to avoid altering the gauge of the complete length of line by making a deviation at Terowie. From a perusal of the reports, I believe that the question of the alteration of the gauge is a material factor in the attitude taken up by South Australia. That alteration will have to be carried out at the cost of the State, unless the Commonwealth is to control the whole length of the line. In dealing with the gauges of the line from the fields to the sea-coast of Western Australia, and that from Port Augusta back to Adelaide, the pamphlet sets forth that—

It should be borne in mind that the above estimates of cost by Mr. O'Connor, as well as those following by the Commonwealth engineers, do not provide for widening the gauge between Fremantle and Kalgoorlie, a work that will be necessary should the 4ft 8½in. standard be adopted for the trunk line to South Australia. By the Enabling Act passed by the Western Australian Legislature last session, which measure is further summarized in a further section of this pamphlet, the State is pledged to carry out this work of converting the existing line, if necessary, concurrently with the construction of the new line by the Commonwealth Government. In any case, seeing that the adoption of the 4ft. 8½in. gauge as the standard for all Australia is, in all likelihood, inevitable, the State will, before long, find it necessary to undertake the conversion of its trunk lines to that width.

The extent to which South Australia would go in making the necessary changes is a matter for that State to decide. One of the conditions which South Australia seeks to impose before agreeing to the Union Railway project is in regard to the gauge. To avoid a break at Port Augusta, the South Australian Government aims at stipulating that the line throughout should be on the 3ft. 6in. gauge.

That is the difficulty, and it is for this reason that I insist that we should have, without any reservation whatever, the assent of the South Australian Parliament to the carrying out of this work before we spend even a shilling on a preliminary survey. The cost of the survey will be practically part and parcel of the cost of constructing the line. The report continues—

But this width would not allow of a high enough rate of train speed; besides, it is generally agreed by all engineering authorities that to adopt the narrow gauge for a trunk line of this important character would be a great initial error that would in the near future have to be retrieved at enormous cost. This prospect is the more evident in the face of the almost positive certainty that the 4ft. 8½in. gauge will be adopted as the standard for the Commonwealth. Even if the narrower width were to be decided upon for the new connecting line, there would still remain the awkward break at Terowie, the junction with the broad gauge (5ft. 3in.) portion of the South Australian railway system. The distance from Terowie to Adelaide on this gauge is 13½ miles.

I wish to refer briefly to a statement which I made earlier in my address with regard to the opinions expressed in the Western Australian Parliament as to the construction of a line which would obviate for a considerable time the necessity for the construction of a railway from Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta, that is, the construction of a line from Kalgoorlie to Esperance. What I referred to was a statement made by a member of the Western Australian Parliament when the Bill empowering the Commonwealth to construct the proposed Transcontinental railway was under consideration there. That the fact is mentioned in this pamphlet is evidence that I was speaking according to the book—

In the course of the discussion, the Minister for Lands, himself a gold-fields member, remarked that, though it was true that the people of Kalgoorlie desired the Esperance line, they would not, in a choice between that project and the Union Railway, sacrifice the interests of the Commonwealth for the sake of the purely local convenience to be derived from the former line.

Mr. Kennedy.

It is the general taxpayer of the Commonwealth who will have to nurse the baby if the Union line is made, and the obligation, therefore, rests upon us to see, before we sanction it, that the Commonwealth will benefit by its construction. We must be certain that we are justified in borrowing money for the purpose—a proceeding against which this Parliament has hitherto set its face—before we sanction the construction of the line. Further evidence goes to strengthen the opinion which I have already expressed as to the improbability of the tract of country which the proposed line would traverse being developed to any extent. According to the report of Mr. O'Connor—

Up to the present the test boring operations carried on by the Western Australian Government for some time past have not resulted in tapping any sources of fresh water at moderate depths. But these operations have resulted in indications that reservoirs of the requisite freedom from any undesirable ingredient will probably be reached at greater depths, and this hope is strengthened by the knowledge that such supplies are found in country of similar formation elsewhere.

Mr. FOWLER.—Those anticipations have since been realized.

Mr. KENNEDY.—If that statement can be substantiated by quotations from reliable authorities, I shall be delighted to hear that I am in the wrong; but I have read official reports of later dates, and I have not found anything which contradicts the opinion which I have just read. I have already said that close to the coast there is not even pastoral settlement.

Mr. FOWLER.—The country near the coast is worse than that further inland.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The proposed railway would be only fifty or sixty miles from the coast, and, according to the most eminent meteorologists in South Australia and Western Australia, the country which it would cross has an annual rainfall of only five inches.

Mr. FOWLER.—Fifteen inches.

Mr. KENNEDY.—On the coast, the rainfall may be from twelve to fifteen inches, but what are the conditions which prevail between Port Augusta and the border, or between Tarcoola and the border? The people of South Australia know enough about that country to know better than to try to develop it.

Mr. POYNTON.—They appear not to know as much about it as the honorable member does.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Although a previous Premier of South Australia gave a certain promise in regard to this railway, the State is now opposed to its construction.

Mr. POYNTON.—That is because of the influence of the vested interests at Port Adelaide.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That may or may not be so; but the forecast made many years ago with regard to the possibilities of that portion of South Australia lying beyond what is known as Goyder's line is being confirmed every day—that permanent settlement beyond that line is practically impossible.

Mr. POYNTON.—I do not think that it is an agricultural country.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I would like to know how much stock it can carry. Notwithstanding the advances of settlement in both South Australia and Western Australia, can any honorable member say that stock is being carried on the immense tract of country which stretches from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie? The public men of Western Australia have stated openly that it would be impossible for a rabbit to cross from South Australia to the fertile fringe of Western Australia.

Mr. FOWLER.—The rabbits have, nevertheless, come across.

Mr. KENNEDY.—They have come round the coast.

Mr. FRAZER.—The statement which the honorable member repeats was made by the Age and a few Victorian legislators.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Age is not interested in making a statement of that kind, except for the advantage of the public; but at any rate I am not responsible for statements which appear in that newspaper.

Mr. FRAZER.—The honorable member's opinion seems to agree with them.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I am responsible for my own utterances only. I find that quite enough, without taking responsibility for the statements of a newspaper. I have shown that Victorians have gone to the north-western parts of Western Australia, to the interior of Queensland, and to the western parts of New South Wales, to get land, and is it likely that they would have left untouched the country through which the proposed railway would pass, and which is so much nearer at hand, if it were worth anything?

Mr. FOWLER.—There are millions of acres of splendid country in Western Australia still awaiting development.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is so, and I have no doubt that Victorians will take up that land before the people of Western Australia. My position is that we are not justified in spending money on the proposed survey until we have obtained the consent of both the States concerned, and that has not yet been granted. Furthermore, I think that the survey should be undertaken jointly by the Governments of those States. The amount at issue is not a very large one.

Mr. POYNTON.—It comes to about 1½d. per head of the population.

Mr. KENNEDY.—For that reason I think that the States concerned should undertake the work, and not ask the Commonwealth to do so. The amount of money involved is not a matter for serious consideration, but the underlying principle is of the utmost importance.

Mr. CAMERON.—An attempt is being made to introduce the thin edge of the wedge.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Just so. I think that Western Australia and South Australia may fairly be asked to come into line, and agree to have the survey made at their own expense—the question of repayment by the Commonwealth may be considered at a later stage—and when the whole of the information necessary has been obtained, we might be called upon to consider the question of the construction of the line. At present, however, I do not think it is desirable that we should spend one shilling in connexion with the project. We have evidence that the South Australian Government have refused point blank to assent to the Commonwealth constructing the line, except under certain conditions which it is thought necessary to impose to protect the interests of that State. I do not think that we should be justified in spending any money under such conditions. It is not in any antagonistic spirit that I object to the proposal now before us. I regret that I was drawn into a discussion on the merits of the line, because I admit that we have not the information necessary to enable us to speak of them except in general terms. There are many undertakings, such as the irrigation schemes referred to by the honorable member for Fremantle, which could be undertaken by the Commonwealth; but honorable members must recognise that this Parliament can do nothing in that direction without first obtaining the consent of the States concerned. We should first have to consult the New South Wales, South Australian, and Victorian Governments. That is why I say that in order to be consistent, to preserve our self-respect, and to avoid encroaching upon the rights of the States, we should, in all fairness, ask Western Australia and South Australia to proceed with the survey, and to place themselves in a position to make a definite proposal the merits of which could be fully considered.

Mr. McLEAN (Gippsland—Minister of Trade and Customs).—My honorable friend, the member for Moira, during the course of his remarks drew attention to my previous attitude with regard to the construction of this line, and wished to know—I think that he was speaking in a jocular way—if I had altered my views since I took a seat upon the Treasury benches.

Mr. KENNEDY.—I said that I did not know what were the Minister's views; but that I was under the impression that he was an economist.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not suppose that my honorable friend would, for one moment, suggest that I would alter my views upon an important question of this kind for the sake of a seat upon the Treasury benches; but as I value his good opinion, as I do that of most honorable members, I feel it is only fair that I should briefly explain my position. I say at once that I have always entertained very grave doubts whether the financial prospects of the proposed line would justify the large expenditure involved in its construction. I have expressed this view on many occasions, and my doubts have not yet been removed. I still entertain the same views that I have held for a considerable time past, but I think that it is only fair to say at once that my opinion, like that of other honorable members, has been founded on very imperfect data. I recognise, on the other hand, that the representatives of Western Australia, who know more about the matter than I do, are strongly of opinion that the construction of the line would be justified. Now, what is the question that we are required to consider? We have been asked by the Western Australian Government to make a survey of the line, and satisfy ourselves whether there is any warrant for its construction. Now, it appears to me that that is not an unreasonable request to make. I had long since made up my mind to support the proposal for the survey of the line. The honorable member for Grampians has just handed me a copy of Hansard containing an interjection of mine with reference to this matter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the survey is favorable, will the Minister support the construction of the railway?

Mr. McLEAN.—I shall explain my views upon that matter in due course. The honorable member for Grampians, when speaking upon the Address-in-Reply, upon the 17th March last, said:—

I do not see the need for a survey in which every level would be taken, and every peg put into position, because that would be too expensive.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member would like to see a flying survey made.

Mr. SKENE.—Something a little more definite than a flying survey.

Mr. McLEAN.—A trial survey.

I had for a very long time past made up my mind to support a trial survey, in order that we might have some information to guide us in our consideration of the merits of the project.

Mr. CAMERON.—Has the Minister any idea what the survey will cost?

Mr. McLEAN.—The amount allocated for the work is £20,000, and I may tell my honorable friends that I am not the person to advocate the reckless expenditure of £20,000, or of even half that sum. I have, however, to ask myself whether the request now made by Western Australia is a reasonable one. In the first place, we have to consider the position of that State, which is so situated that it does not derive any benefit, that I can discover, from the Federation.

Mr. CAMERON.—How much does Tasmania derive from it?

Mr. McLEAN.—I hope my honorable friend will not interrupt me, as I am making only a very short statement in reply to the honorable member for Moira. The trade carried on between Western Australia and the other States is very large, and is almost entirely in favour of the eastern States. Western Australia is not a producing State, but is a very good customer of the other States, for whom she provides one of our best markets. She does not enter into competition with the producers or manufacturers of the eastern States. The right honorable member for Swan last night pointed out that the trade of Western Australia is at the present time £17,000,000 per annum, and we know that that trade, and also the population, is rapidly increasing. Therefore, honorable members will see that an expenditure of £20,000 is a mere fraction, in comparison with the benefits that the eastern States get from their trade relations with

Western Australia every year; and it would be churlish on our part if we were to refuse so small a request as is involved in a survey to set the question definitely at rest. My opinion, as I have stated, is that the results of the survey will not prove favorable to the construction of the line; but I may be doing an injustice to Western Australia in entertaining that opinion, and it is right that the question should be settled on its merits. I do not think that the amount involved is an unreasonably large concession to make to a State from which we derive such large advantages in connexion with trade. In addition, I may say that the last three Governments have pledged themselves to this work, and it would require very strong reasons to justify us in ignoring the pledges given. I admit at once that the Government have no power to bind Parliament; but, at the same time, we ought to consider that Western Australia consists of our own kith and kin, and is the only portion of the Commonwealth which derives, so far as I can discover, no visible benefit from the Federal union. In view of the fact that we derive the large advantages to which I have referred, we should give some consideration to the request for a survey of this line. At any rate, we should think twice before repudiating the promise or promises made by former Governments. This is my position in a nutshell. I do not intend to be a party, unless the results of the survey justify it, to committing the Commonwealth to the expenditure involved in the construction of the line; that is a serious matter, to be dealt with on its merits. But the construction of the line is not the question before us. What we have to consider is whether we should or should not accede to the request of the people of Western Australia, and ascertain for ourselves at a very moderate cost all the facts connected with the proposed railway. I have for a long time thought that the information now desired should be obtained. I would be one of the last members in the House to now commit the Commonwealth to the larger and further expenditure involved in the construction of the line. Of course, if the results of the survey afford any justification, I shall be very pleased indeed to learn that I have been wrong; but I am strongly of the opinion, from the meagre information at my disposal, that the line would not pay. When we obtain the information disclosed by the survey, and when we have the whole of the facts before us, we can consider the further question of the construction, and we shall also then have to consider the terms in regard to the proportion of the loss to be borne by the States which derive most benefit from the work. The honorable member who last spoke knows that the South Australian Government consented to the survey through their territory; and I do not agree with him that we should refuse to get the necessary information in the meantime because that Government attach a condition to their consent. If it be found that the financial prospects do not justify the construction of the line, it will not be necessary to proceed further. The people of Western Australia are reasonable, and will be satisfied with the results disclosed; I understand that their only desire is to have the matter dealt with on its merits.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What does the honorable member call "justification"?

Mr. McLEAN.—If the returns from the line would substantially pay the interest on cost of construction.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then the Minister would borrow money at once to construct the line?

Mr. McLEAN.—When the honorable member says "at once," that is a very different matter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It bears on this question.

Mr. McLEAN.—No. In the first place this survey will take a considerable time. We know that at the present time the money markets of the world are not in a favorable condition for borrowing for a large work. To borrow under present conditions would be to load this line for all time to come with an unfairly large interest charge. I am perfectly sure that the Western Australian members would be the first to say that, if the results of the survey do justify the construction of the line, we ought to wait for more favorable conditions for borrowing before entering into the obligation. But those are matters which will be dealt with at the proper time. In the meantime we have only to consider whether we shall accede to the wishes of the people of Western Australia to the extent of expending £20,000, in order to ascertain the financial prospects of the undertaking, and to guide us in determining whether we are justified in proceeding further. I believe I am as strongly impressed with the necessity for economy as is any member of the House, but, careful as I should be before committing the Commonwealth to the construction of the line, I hold that the request now made is reasonable and moderate. It is due to our friends in Western Australia that we should accede to their desire to the extent they now ask.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I intend to imitate as far as I can the excellent example set by the Minister of Trade and Customs, who dealt with this question in a very brief way. There are many reasons for taking that line of action. There is the consideration that this debate has arisen, as few debates have done, in this or any other Parliament, on a motion in connexion with the introduction of a Bill; and I quite agree with the right honorable member for Swan that this is a most extraordinary proceeding. Western Australia, as the Minister of Trade and Customs has admitted, receives absolutely no benefit from Federation; and yet, on the very first occasion on which the representatives of that State ask for what may be considered a right, the request is met by an innovation in the procedure, and a reluctance even to give leave for the discussion of a Bill to make a small appropriation. As this debate will have to be gone over again on the various stages of the Bill, if leave be given to introduce the measure, it seems to me that we are now following a very purposeless procedure. In one respect I have great pleasure in congratulating the Minister of Trade and Customs, who certainly gave me the impression some time ago that he was opposed to this railway, and even I think to a survey. It is very satisfactory indeed to witness such a rapid conversion. I would not suggest for a moment that the fact that he now occupies a seat upon the Treasury benches is in any way responsible for this remarkable change of front. I can only attribute it to the fact that some additional information has reached the honorable gentleman. I think that he is quite consistent in the matter, and I congratulate him upon desiring more information in reference to the project, before we finally decide to construct the railway. I feel sure that when the final survey has been made, the honorable gentleman will be agreeably disappointed to find that the information thus obtained will justify him in voting for the construction of the line. Before dealing with that aspect of the matter, however, I wish to refer briefly to the remarks of the honorable member for Moira. He appears to blame Western Australia, as he blames South Australia, for neglect in bringing this matter to a practical issue. All I can say is that nothing has been left undone by the Government and the people of Western Australia to advance this project. They have met the Government of South Australia upon every possible occasion, and in every possible way. But a most extraordinary thing has happened. Two Premiers of South Australia pledged themselves to endeavour to induce the Parliament of that State to give legislative sanction to the construction of this line. Subsequently a third Premier came into office, who absolutely repudiated those pledges. I think that nothing more could have been done by Western Australia than has been done. To explain the action of South Australia in this matter, I should like to quote the report of an interview with a gentleman who at the time dominated the politics of that State, although he was not its Premier. Mr. John Darling, upon 3rd March, 1903, whilst on his way to London, was interviewed in Perth in reference to this project. He said—

We, in South Australia, are extremely anxious for the development of our northern country, and for that reason I would not be prepared to recommend the Western Australian line until the line from Oodnadatta to Port Darwin is accomplished. I may tell you candidly that as far as I am concerned at the present time, if a Bill to give the consent of South Australia to your line were introduced into Parliament I would oppose it. We want our own Transcontinental line, and the Kalgoorlie-Port Augusta line would very prejudicially affect our chances of getting it.

Then the interviewer asked him this question—

What better prospects does the Port Darwin line offer?

To that inquiry Mr. Darling replied—

We have very fine country in the north to develop, and we have the possibilities of a great gold-field at the Macdonnell ranges, about 1,200 miles from Adelaide.

The interviewer then put this further question to him—

Is it a better field than Kalgoorlie?

Mr. Darling's answer is significant. He replied—

Perhaps not; but it is in South Australia, you see.

That is the secret of the opposition to this railway. That interview explains why the Premier of South Australia repudiated a promise which was given by two of his predecessors—a promise which is upon record in the papers that have been laid upon the table of this House. Many people in the eastern States appear to be ignorant of the great resources of Western Australia. I regret to say that it appears to be what theologians call "invincible ignorance" in some respects, for the newspapers will not give the people an opportunity of learning the true facts of the case. I have in a small pamphlet here some particulars of the developments which have recently taken place in Western Australia, which I wish could be conveyed to the electors of the Commonwealth. I quite agree with the right honorable member for Swan that if we could get to the people of Australia and place our case fairly before them we should gain their enthusiastic approval of the construction of this line. Unfortunately, for some reason or other—perhaps because New South Wales, South Australia, and Victoria, particularly the last named, have sunk a large amount of loan money unprofitably in railways—this great national work which is essential to connect the scattered portions of the continent is decried. When this little pamphlet was prepared by the Premier of Western Australia some two years ago, its population numbered 220,000, of whom an exceptionally large proportion were adult males. Its territory embraces an area of upwards of 640,000,000 acres, and comprises almost one-third of the area of the Continent. Its revenue amounts to upwards of £3,600,000 per annum, although no income or land tax has yet been imposed. Its Savings Bank shows a sum of £1,908,898 to the credit of depositors, while the ordinary banks have local assets of nearly £6,500,000 sterling. These figures have since been added to considerably, because the population has materially increased. Its imports amount to upwards of £7,000,000 per annum, and its exports to upwards of £9,000,000 per annum. It has eighteen declared gold-fields, for which full administrative facilities are provided. These gold-fields have produced more than £40,500,000 worth of gold, weighing upwards of 330 tons (avoirdupois), the output for 1902 being worth £7,947,663; whilst for the last four years the output has exceeded £6,000,000 per annum. The Minister of Trade and Customs has said that Western Australia is not a great producing State.

Mr. McLEAN.—But it is a great consuming State.

Mr. MAHON.—That fact is to the advantage of Victoria and the other States. I think that the Minister unintentionally conveyed a wrong impression. Not only is Western Australia a great producing State from a mineral point of view—

Mr. McLEAN.—I merely desired to show that our trade relations with Western Australia were all to our advantage, because that State consumes what the other States produce.

Mr. MAHON.—The Minister's remarks, nevertheless, might convey a wrong impression. Western Australia possesses upwards of 400,000 cattle, and 2,750,000 sheep, and has more than 250,000 acres under cultivation. Its pastoral leases comprise upwards of 100,000,000 acres—

Mr. McLEAN.—Western Australia is not exporting to the other States.

Mr. MAHON.—Certainly not. I merely wish to correct the statement of the Minister, which might, perhaps, convey a false impression to the public. I feel sure that he did not intend to reflect upon Western Australia.

Mr. McLEAN.—I said that we were under an obligation to that State.

Mr. MAHON.—Quite so; but as I happened to have the figures before me, I thought it apropos to submit them to the House. Western Australia annually produces almost 1,000,000 bushels of wheat, or an evenly distributed average of 10 bushels to the acre; over £80,000 worth of coal; £110,000 worth of copper; £50,000 worth of tin; and over £73,000 worth of sandalwood. She exported, in 1902, £7,500,000 worth of gold bullion and specie; £500,000 worth of timber; £500,000 worth of wool; and over £111,000 worth of hides and skins. In addition to that, she had an output of £178,000 worth of pearls and pearl-shell, and about £200,000 worth of other products. It is also worthy of mention that provision is made for a sinking fund in connexion with every loan floated by the State, and that out of its loan indebtedness of £15,000,000, no less than £13,500,000 represents expenditure on reproductive works. In other words, the whole of that sum is yielding interest. I have no desire to weary the Committee by any lengthy address, because I feel sure that the spirit of fair-mindedness which prevails in this House will cause honorable members to recognise the desirableness of leave being granted to introduce this Bill, and that, if necessary, we shall be able at a later stage to present all the facts required to enable honorable members to arrive at a decision. I was rather amused, however, by the speech made last night by the honorable and learned member for Parkes, who proposed that Western Australia should be called upon to pay the cost of the survey, subject to the condition that if the railway were constructed, and proved a sound investment, the State might approach the Commonwealth, and induce it to recoup it in respect of this indebtedness. That is a suggestion which might have emanated very well from a pawnbroker, or from some person having but a limited political vision; but coming as it did from one who professes to have the widest political outlook, it certainly occasioned me some surprise.

Mr. ROBINSON.—His outlook is so wide that he cannot cover its whole extent.

Mr. MAHON.—That is so. Another remark which was made by the honorable and learned member for Indi also caused me some astonishment. The right honorable member for Swan very pertinently inquired whether the opponents of this proposal objected to it on the ground of the expenditure which the construction of the railway would involve, and went on to ask, "If that be so, are they prepared to give a private company the right to build the line, and to control it for a prolonged period?" The honorable and learned member for Indi subsequently objected to anything being done in that direction, urging that, although the Commonwealth might not be prepared to build the line, we should very naturally object to hand over the undertaking to a syndicate. But the right honorable member for Swan expressed the opinion that if a syndicate were prepared to undertake the construction of the line, believing that it would be a profitable undertaking, the Government of the Commonwealth ought not to hesitate to build it. I am sure that will be the opinion expressed by the people of Australia. If the undertaking be good enough for a syndicate, it ought surely to be good enough for the nation. The honorable member for Moira indulged in a variation of the proposition made by the honorable member for Parkes, that South Australia and Western Australia should be asked to share the cost of the survey; but from the quotations I have made, from the opinions expressed by a leading South Australian politician, it will be seen that it is simply absurd for any one to tell us that we should first obtain the assent of South Australia to this project. As I have already explained, that State has a rival line in contemplation; and while this scheme holds the field she will never look with a kindly eye upon the proposal to construct the line which Western Australia desires. I am free to admit that it would be very foolish for South Australia to attempt the construction of the great Northern Railway. What population would it serve at Port Darwin? There we have a population of some 300 or 400 Europeans, whilst the remaining residents consist chiefly of Chinese. On the other hand, a railway extending to Coolgardie and the eastern gold-fields of Western Australia would serve a white population of at least 50,000, all earning good wages, and spending their money freely. If Kalgoorlie were on the route of the projected northern line, South Australia would be very anxious indeed to connect it with the railway systems of the States. I agree further with the right honorable member for Swan that the principal advantages derived from the construction of the trans-continental line would be reaped, not by Perth or Fremantle, but to a very material extent by South Australia. I am absolutely convinced that a large number of the residents of the eastern gold-fields of Western Australia would avail themselves of this railway to travel direct to Adelaide when they wished to visit the eastern States, in preference to journeying via Perth and Fremantle, as they do at the present time. In these circumstances the construction of this line would not be in the interests of the coastal towns of Western Australia. Nor can it be said that there is anything inconsistent in this proposal with the projected construction of the railway mentioned by the honorable member for Moira, running from Kalgoorlie to Esperance Bay. It is absolutely idle for any honorable member to speak about obtaining the assent of the South Australian Government to this proposal. The Commonwealth Government has already done all that is possible in that direction. The late Prime Minister certainly did all that he could to obtain the assent of South Australia. He pressed the Premier of South Australia for a reply to an inquiry whether the Parliament of that State would consent to pass a Bill, allowing the line to pass through South Australian territory. In a final answer to a message, asking the plain question whether he would carry out the promise made by his predecessors to introduce a Bill giving legal authority for

I have nothing to add to mine of 12th inst., further than to state that survey and reliable estimates are always prepared before we ask Parliament by Act to sanction the construction of any line of railway.

The present Government, following the action of its predecessors, has now asked the House to agree to pass a sum necessary to allow the making of a survey which is the preliminary regarded by South Australia as essential to the giving of her consent to the construction of the line. That being so, I think that the representatives of Western Australia have a fair claim to consideration. I would urge the Parliament to consider very seriously the position of the western State. The Minister of Trade and Customs has truly said that Western Australia has received no benefit, and is not likely to receive any advantage from Federation. He might well have gone further, and have said that Western Australia has made very considerable sacrifices for Federation. In these circumstances I think it is incumbent upon the people of the other States to consider the position of the western community. It cannot be denied that the isolation of Western Australia constitutes a serious menace to the permanency of the Federal Union. We know very well that in the corporeal sphere the disuse of a member is followed by its atrophy.

Mr. EWING.—And then by death.

Mr. MAHON.—Exactly. I am afraid that unless you make your Union felt in the extreme western State of the Commonwealth, unless you give the people there some tangible advantages as a reward for the many sacrifices which they have made, a strong feeling of antagonism against the Federation will grow up in that community.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is no doubt about it.

Mr. MAHON.—I would ask the members of this Parliament to consider what it was that lost England her North American Colonies, and estranged Ireland from the Empire for centuries? Was it not that the legislators of Great Britain attempted to rule in defiance of the wishes of the people of the North American Colonies and against the wishes of the people of Ireland? And are we, in this twentieth century, to repeat the disastrous mistakes which have clouded the history of Great Britain? I am not one to talk secession, or the dismemberment of the Union; but if the people of Western Australia are goaded into action, I should not be surprised if within the next four or five years a very strong agitation arose against the Union in that State. Of course it would be our duty to deprecate anything of the kind; but if the people of Western Australia were to say, "We no longer wish to remain federated," how could we prevent them from collecting their own Customs duties, and managing their own affairs, as they did prior to Federation.

Mr. GLYNN.—The southern States of America were very soon prevented from doing that.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes, by the use of swords and bullets.

Mr. MAHON.—If honorable members are so niggardly as to grudge a small outlay for the construction of a railway which would cement the Union, can they contemplate with equanimity the possibility of a much larger outlay later on to keep it intact? That is a consideration which should not be lost sight of by responsible men. I do not say that any prominent person is likely to advocate secession; but at this stage of our history we should not allow anything to happen which would give the people of Western Australia, or of any other State, reasonable grounds for resentment or antagonism to Federation. We have hitherto endeavoured, so far as we could, to legislate for other parts of the Commonwealth in accordance with the wishes of the persons concerned. We have made great sacrifices to maintain the policy of a White Australia. The people of Western Australia have never grumbled at having to put their hands into their pockets to pay the sugar bounties, nor have they grumbled because the State of Victoria has received the major portion of the benefits which have been obtained from Federation. Neither are they likely to grumble if, in the future, New South Wales, which has large coalfields, becomes the home of manufactures, whose competition may drive similar manufactures out of Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Some of the Western Australian manufacturers have already left that State and come to Victoria.

Mr. MAHON.—I hope that Parliament will consider the aspect of the matter which I have put before it. I do not wish to be accused of talking dismemberment or disunion; but we should endeavour to see a little ahead, and not give to any part of our community reasonable grounds for feeling that it has been tricked into joining the Federation, and that it is now being unjustly treated.

Mr. EWING (Richmond).—I do not desire to unduly extend this debate; my intention is to offer only a few remarks pertinent to some of the statements I have heard in this Chamber. I believe that the vast majority of the people of Western Australia would not affirm the truth of the statement that any State entered the Union only to obtain material advantages. Behind the creation and the existence of the Australian Union is something very much greater than material interest—the spirit of fellowship and brotherhood. Federation was the result of an uprising in the direction of nationality, and was not brought about for material reasons. But while saying that, I differ from those who think that no weight should be given to material considerations in our national life, and that the proposal which we are discussing is a novel one. It is nothing of the kind. The Dominion of Canada is probably more like our Australian Commonwealth than is any other Union which now exists, and we find, on looking back upon her history, that several of the States of the Dominion, prior to joining the Union, made requests similar to that which has been made by the State of Western Australia. Let me give the Committee one or two instances. Although the population of Prince Edward Island was probably as patriotic as any other community which is now part of the Dominion, it refused to join the Canadian Union until some £300,000 had been promised by the Dominion to get rid of the private ownership of land which existed in the State. The people of Prince Edward Island were not disloyal or selfish; but they felt that the matter was one with which they could not deal themselves, and therefore they asked the Dominion to assist them. Then, again, in 1870 the Dominion paid the old historic Hudson's Bay Company some £300,000 before Rupertsland and the North-West Territory would join the Union. Again, to take a more nearly analogous case, British Columbia in the same year refused to join the Union until the Dominion Parliament had definitely undertaken to construct the Canadian-Pacific railway. Further back—in 1867—at the time when the Canadian Federation was consummated, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick took up a similar attitude in regard to the construction of the railway from Quebec to the seaboard of the Maritime Provinces. In all these cases what were primarily local or State needs were attended to by the Federation, which had, perhaps, only a secondary interest in what was done. Therefore what is now proposed is no new thing in the history of Federal Governments. The honorable member for Coolgardie made reference to the unwisdom which characterised the attitude of Great Britain towards its colonies in North America, which we now know as the United States. It is unnecessary to enter into a dissertation on the principles of taxation. The statements of Burke form a treasury for the intellectual world, and he summed up the situation in this way, "It does not matter very much," he said, "whether we are taxing the people of North America or whether we are not: the question is, do they think we are taxing them?" To determine a similar question, I have spent some little time in investigating the speeches made to the people of Western Australia in regard to the proposed Transcontinental Railway. Whether those who were in power were entitled to make promises or not, and whether such promises were sufficiently definite to be tangible, there is no doubt that the vast majority of the people of Western Australia believed that a compact was entered into. Then, taking Burke's view of the situation, we come to the question, not whether a promise was made, but whether they believed that it was made. I feel sure that they did so believe.

Mr. POYNTON.—There is no doubt that it was made.

Mr. EWING.—The honorable member knows that some honorable members who believe that no such promise should have been made, state that it was made by persons without authority, and it would be very difficult to say on whom responsibility should rest.

Mr. FRAZER.—A promise was made by persons holding responsible positions.

Mr. EWING.—That aspect of the question has also been discussed, and it has been contended that the responsibility incurred was personal rather than national. I thoroughly believe that if the people of Australia thought that a contract had been made, they would have no hesitation in consenting to the proposed survey, which would cost little more than one penny per head of the population of the Commonwealth.

Mr. POYNTON.—One-penny farthing per head, or sixpence per family.

Mr. EWING.—That is not very much to pay for a principle, and I do not think that the Australian public would worry themselves over that aspect of the matter. It is very much more difficult to display enthusiasm with regard to national questions than with regard to personal matters. I am quite satisfied that the honorable member for Melbourne Ports would be very enthusiastic with regard to any work that would ameliorate the condition of the electors in his constituency. Similarly, the Mayor of Bundaberg would no doubt be very enthusiastic with regard to any proposal for bonuses which would tend to ameliorate the condition of the sugar-growers of the north. But when honorable members are asked to deal with a question which relates to some portion of the continent far removed from their own constituencies, and beyond the region of local interest, they feel that they have to accept a grave responsibility. They will, without hesitation, do what they know their constituents would like, but few men care to be called upon to explain that they have done something with regard to which their constituents are in doubt, or which may be they believe is not necessary, or that they have not been prompted by their knowledge of the benefit to their constituents, as much as by the higher sense of responsibility to the people of the Commonwealth as a whole. We are under the same obligation to do what is right and just to the people of Western Australia as we are to see that justice is done to our own constituents. We cannot, perhaps, expect our constituents to view the matter in quite the same light as we do, but we ought to endeavour to divest ourselves of local influences, and to do the best we can for the whole Commonwealth. Even though an honorable member may have doubts with regard to the construction of the railway—and I grant that I have serious doubts—he can scarcely object to take the view adopted by the leader of the Opposition. The honorable member for Bland said, and quite rightly, “We go no further than the question of exploration and inquiry; so far Australia is prepared to go.” So far he bound himself, and we are not asked to go any further. When the Transvaal war broke out we were astounded to find that the English officers knew nothing of the topography of the country—we were equally astonished to learn that the Japanese knew all about Manchuria—and yet we are not at all astounded that the representatives of Australia and the Defence authorities should know nothing about that vast tract of country which extends from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie.

Mr. FOWLER.—We have had foreigners making more careful inquiries than have our own Defence Department.

Mr. EWING.—It appears to me scandalous that we should have no knowledge of a tract of country extending half-way across the continent, and it is incumbent upon us to make the proposed inquiry. Even if an honorable member does not believe in the railway, he might still vote in favour of the proposal for a survey. I should support it even though no railway were projected, because it is imperative that we should know something with regard to the continent we are called upon to govern. If in any other State there was 1,000 miles of territory, regarding which the States Departments and the representatives of the people knew nothing, I should gladly vote £20,000 to defray the cost of an investigation. Without binding myself to the construction of the railway, I think it is right and proper that the Parliament should vote the proposed sum of money for investigation purposes, in order that we may be furnished with essential information as speedily as possible.

Mr. FRAZER (Kalgoorlie).—I am gratified at the tone which the debate has taken, and I am also glad that it is thoroughly understood that all that we are required to do at present is to make out a reasonable case for a survey of the proposed line. Some time ago I was told that a number of honorable members were under the impression that the line was being advocated in the interests of a small gang of persons in Perth and Fremantle. A statement to that effect was made in the Chamber, and I take the first opportunity to say that it is absolutely incorrect. The people of Western Australia are almost unanimously of opinion that a line should be built to connect that State with the eastern railway systems. It is not surprising that this feeling should exist, when we consider the number of persons from the eastern States who have settled in Western Australia, but who still have interests of a domestic or other character in the places from which they came. I have a return prepared by the manager of the Money Order Office in Western Australia, dated 11th April, 1904, showing the amount of money forwarded through his Department from 1898 to 1903 inclusive to the other States. During that period £426,721 15s. 6d. was remitted to South Australia.

Mr. FOWLER.—That amount was made up of small sums, forwarded by means of money orders, and was apart altogether from any remittances by cheque or draft.

Mr. FRAZER.—Quite so. £1,316,353 8s. was remitted to Victoria.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was an absolute present to Victoria; we received no quid pro quo.

Mr. TUDOR.—I suppose that the men who sent the money had to work for it?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes, but they presented it to the people of Victoria.

Mr. FRAZER.—During the same period £491,511 11s. 5d. was remitted to New South Wales, £68,904 4s. 10d. to Queensland, and £96,033 9s. 3d. to Tasmania, the total being £2,399,524 9s. In view of the ties which exist between many of the workers in Western Australia and their families and relatives on the other side of the continent, it is only natural that kindly feelings should be entertained by them towards the other States, and I can assure honorable members that they feel greatly disappointed when antagonism is expressed towards the proposed railway. The promise given to Western Australia prior to her joining the Federation imposes a moral obligation upon representatives of at least some of the States to do all they can to assist in bringing about the construction of the proposed line. Some reference has been made to the remarks of two Premiers of South Australia, but unfortunately the position of affairs is not thoroughly understood by honorable members, or by the people of Australia. The right honorable member for Adelaide, when Premier of South Australia, used expressions which fully justified the people of Western Australia in believing that they would receive the hearty co-operation of South Australia in securing the construction of the railway. The right honorable gentleman, in one of his letters to the right honorable member for Swan, said—

This would, indeed, be an Australian work worthy of undertaking by the Federal authority, on behalf of the nation, in pursuance of the authorities contained in the Commonwealth Bill. It is, of course, a work of special interest to Western Australia and South Australia, and I devoutly hope that the day is not far distant when the representatives of Western Australia and South Australia may, in their places in a Federal Parliament, be found working side by side for the advancement of Australian interests in this and other matters of national concern.

Some doubt having been subsequently expressed as to the attitude of South Australia, the right honorable member for Adelaide communicated with the honorable member for Swan as follows:—

Cannot understand reference to probable reluctance of South Australia to permit Federal construction of railway connecting colonies. We have no fear of any such anti-Federal, "dog-in-the-manger" policy.

These communications clearly show that the people of Western Australia were justified in expecting that the great national work which they desired to see carried out would receive strong support in the Commonwealth Parliament. It is not, however, our wish that the commencement of this great work should rest on sympathy, so I desire to present a few facts concerning the great Western State, which do not appear to be universally known in the East. At the present time, Western Australia possesses a population of nearly 250,000, a great proportion of which is comprised of adult males. It cannot be disputed that Western Australia is the greatest mining State in the Union. It contains eighteen declared gold-fields, and during the period that mining has been actively carried on £10,000,000 have been disbursed in dividends. Last year the dividends paid aggregated £1,500,000. During the same period the coal produced was valued at £86,000, the copper at £110,769, and the tin at £52,102. I think it will be generally admitted that a State which is capable of producing such a large quantity of gold is worthy of some consideration. At the present time, Western Australia has about 100,000,000 acres under pastoral lease. Despite the statements which appear in the newspapers of the eastern States, it is a fact that a considerable portion of the country which would be traversed by the proposed railway has been taken up by pastoralists, who have stocked it. In dealing with the pastoral resources of the western State, and particularly those on the route of the proposed line, it is only reasonable that I should quote from the report of Mr. Muir, who travelled over it upon camels at the instance of the Western Australian Government, and made a flying survey. He states—

I was led to believe, prior to starting this trip, that the country to be traversed consisted almost entirely of a desert—

Had he been resident in Victoria we should probably have said that he had been reading the Age— composed of sandhills and spinnifex flats. This impression proved, however, to be perfectly erroneous, unless a waterless tract of country, though well grassed and timbered, can be called a desert. Interspersed through this forest are numerous flats covered with grass, as well as with salt-bush and other fodder shrubs. The soil is of good quality, and the growth of grass and herbage luxuriant. At about 200 miles, rolling downs of lime-stone formation are met with, covered with a luxuriant growth of grass, and occasionally a salt-bush flat. This country is lightly timbered with myaporum, and presents a beautiful park-like appearance.

Honorable members should bear in mind that Mr. Muir occupies a responsible position, and that his estimates in the past have always proved absolutely authentic. Yet what has been pictured by the newspapers as a desert, he describes as country "presenting a beautiful park-like appearance." His report continues—

Close to the coast a narrow belt of mallee runs, and further inland small belts of myall and myaporum are met with. This country is also well grassed, and salt-bush and other feed bushes are plentiful. To the north, near the 31st parallel of latitude, the country is more open. In fact, from the South Australian border, for 250 miles in a westerly direction, it is one large open plain of limestone formation, fairly well grassed throughout. Taken as a whole, this stretch of country is one of the finest I have seen in Australia, and, with water—which doubtless could be obtained if properly prospected for—it is admirably adapted for grazing purposes, and will, without doubt, be taken up some day from end to end. At the time of our visit this tract of country must have been at its driest, as the settlers at Eyre and Eucla informed us that it was the worst season they had experienced for the last twenty years. From our observations, it was quite evident that there had been a long dry spell, extending over fully twelve months, I should think. Still the grass was sound and strong, growing for the most part to a height of twelve inches.

When a report of that description is presented by a gentleman, who certainly should be a reliable authority upon the matter, and whose reputation is at stake, I think that honorable members should attach more weight to it than to the rash statements published by newspapers which desire to cater for the lowest instincts of a few people in other portions of the Commonwealth. I believe that, if the facts were fairly presented to the people of Australia, they would unhesitatingly support this proposal. I would further point out that last year Western Australia possessed 3,000,000 sheep and 400,000 cattle. In addition to that, she produced about 1,000,000 bushels of wheat.

The State has also enormous possibilities for agriculture. There are about 10,000,000 acres open for selection, extending from Geraldton in the north to Esperance and Albany in the south, which contain some of the finest agricultural land to be found in any portion of Australia. I have travelled over a vast extent of that country, and its fertility cannot be questioned. When experienced settlers take up this land, Western Australia will become a very important agricultural State. I do not think that too much weight should be attached to the arguments of the honorable member for Moira on the question of defence. He urged that at the present time the eastern States have not large standing armies, which, in the event of Western Australia being seriously threatened, could be readily transported across the Continent. But the same remark, I would point out, would apply to any country in regard to any war which has ever taken place. At the opening of hostilities in South Africa, Australia did not possess a large number of troops which she could immediately place in the field. Nevertheless it was soon realized that if troops were required for patriotic purposes, they could very speedily be organized. I think it will be readily conceded that the defence of a country is to be measured by its strength at its weakest point. Personally, I am of opinion that, in the event of hostilities, the first State in Australia to be attacked would be that which possessed large resources in the shape of rich gold mines, which had not many men to defend them, and which possessed no means of obtaining assistance from its eastern neighbours. It will be seen that, under such circumstances, the western State would occupy a very precarious position indeed. Looking at the matter from a common-sense stand-point, I think that, in the interests of the defence of the Commonwealth, facilities should be provided for the transport of troops with the least possible delay. I would further point out that at the present time there is a large passenger traffic between Western Australia and the eastern States—I believe the official estimate sets it down at about 50,000 annually. If it were possible for people in the western State to travel to the east without being called upon to undergo the inconvenience and discomfort attaching to a sea trip, I venture to say that the number of passengers travelling to and fro would be considerably increased. There is always considerable uncertainty as to the hour of sailing, and that in itself constitutes an objection to the present means of communication. We must also remember that many people have a natural objection to travelling by sea. There is another aspect of this proposal which has an important bearing on Western Australia. It is well known that the Commonwealth is visited from time to time by a large number of European tourists and others who combine pleasure-seeking with business, and are always anxious to obtain information as to the opportunities for profitable investment which Australia affords. The people of Western Australia believe that if facilities were given to these visitors to leave the mail steamers at Fremantle and to travel thence by rail to all parts of the Commonwealth, they would spend at least a week at the metropolis and a week at the gold-fields before proceeding overland to the eastern States.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—How many oversea passengers leave the mail steamers at Adelaide and continue their journey to Sydney or Melbourne by railway?

Mr. FRAZER.—I have no figures before me that would enable me to reply to the honorable member's question; but I would remind him that to travellers from other parts of the world Adelaide does not offer as many attractions as does Western Australia. I therefore assume that any return which might be prepared on the subject named could not be taken as a fair indication of the number who, if this line were constructed, would leave the mail steamers at Fremantle and travel overland.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—My question was, how many people travelling by mail steamer—apart altogether from Western Australians—land at Adelaide and go on to Melbourne or Sydney by train?

Mr. FRAZER.—I was under no misapprehension as to the question put by the honorable and learned member.

Mr. GROOM.—But the honorable member cannot answer it.

Mr. FRAZER.—I have no data bearing on the question, but I think I have supplied a sufficient answer to it. I have heard many passengers on mail steamers express their determination to land at the first available opportunity, and I consequently conclude that a large number of travellers by the mail steamers bring their sea voyage to a termination on reaching Adelaide. The attitude taken up by Western Australia in regard to this question has been somewhat severely criticized by two honorable members who have addressed themselves to this question. The honorable and learned member for Parkes last night expressed the opinion that Western Australia should be called upon to pay for the cost of the preliminary survey. He urged that if the Government of that State wished to obtain information relative to the projected line they should be prepared to pay for its collection. But in the event of the Commonwealth constructing the line and working it, would the honorable and learned member be prepared to support a proposal to give Western Australia the larger proportion of the profits that might be obtained from it? That is an aspect of the matter which the honorable and learned member has not seriously considered. I believe that Western Australia is acting in a very generous way, and that there is no desire on the part of the representative men of that State that the Commonwealth should be called on to bear the whole burden should the line be constructed and prove less successful than we hope it will be. Mr. James, the late Premier of Western Australia, made what I consider was a fair offer to the late Prime Minister. He stated in a telegram dated 18th May last—

On condition that Commonwealth is allowed a free hand as to route and gauge of railway, this State will be prepared, for ten years after line constructed, to bear a share of any loss in excess of our contribution on a population basis. It would be premature to fix exact proportion we are prepared to pay at this stage; but I am confident it will be liberal, and abundantly satisfy the Federal Parliament of our sincerity in this connexion, and our belief that the work will soon be a directly paying one.

The tone of that message does not suggest any desire on the part of the representative public men of Western Australia to place the Commonwealth in a false position. I would point out further, that under the Enabling Act passed by the Western Australian Parliament, the Government of that State are pledged to an enormous undertaking. I refer to the lifting and relaying of the railway from Fremantle to Kalgoorlie, in order that it may correspond with the gauge adopted by the Commonwealth for the great national line. It must also be remembered that the alteration in the gauge of that line would render it different from the other State lines. In view of the undertaking given in the Enabling Act, I think we may safely assume that the Government of Western Australia are quite prepared to undertake their just responsibility in this matter. The attitude adopted by two honorable members who have spoken during this debate is worthy of some attention. The honorable member for Moira asserted that the cost of the survey must be seriously considered, and the same view was expressed by the honorable and learned member for Indi. In glancing over the pages of Hansard this morning, I was unable to discover any evidence that these honorable members had always been so ready to take exception to the proposed expenditure of a few thousand pounds. We urge that the building of this railway is a great national undertaking which should be entered upon by the Commonwealth, in order that the pledge given to Western Australia, prior to Federation, by a number of the leading public men of Australia, who advocated the Union, may be redeemed. But the honorable member for Moira, and the honorable and learned member for Indi object to the preliminary survey simply on the ground of the cost. When various other proposals—involving considerable expenditure—of a far less important character, have been submitted to the House they have not taken up that attitude. I find that they joined with other honorable members in voting a sum of £10,000 to enable the Duke and Duchess of York to be lavishly entertained during their visit to Australia in connexion with the opening of the Commonwealth Parliament.

Mr. CROUCH.—When they voted in that way the money had already been spent.

Mr. FRAZER.—That is immaterial to the point at issue. The money should certainly not have been spent in that way, and the fact that it was so expended did not relieve the Ministry of their responsibility to this House. We find, however, that these two arch-priests of the gospel of economy, while not prepared to support a comparatively small expenditure in connexion with an undertaking designed to cement the Commonwealth, did not hesitate to vote for the expenditure of a sum of £10,000, most of which was handed over to Victorian society. The greater part of that amount was expended, I suppose, in the purchase of champagne, and on decorations, in order that the Duke and Duchess of York might be lavishly entertained; but it was of no material benefit to any citizen of the Commonwealth.

Mr. LIDDELL.—Tone?

Mr. FRAZER.—That was it. If those honorable members were prepared to support a vote that was of no lasting or even temporary benefit to the people of the Commonwealth, surely they should not censure such a proposal as that now before the House, which involves the interests and the welfare of a vast number of people. I believe that the Committee will adopt a course that will enable the fullest investigation to be made and the most complete data to be obtained before we are asked seriously to determine whether the Commonwealth should construct this line. Its construction would be undoubtedly a momentous undertaking involving a very large expenditure, and I think that the feeling manifested during this debate shows that there is a desire on the part of honorable members to obtain the information necessary for our guidance. I hope that the division will show that a majority of the House is prepared to take into consideration the whole of the facts which have been presented in justification of the Government proposal, and that the ultimate result will be assent to a proposal, designed to secure the safety and the peace of the citizens of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—I may say at once that I intend to vote for the motion, but that I shall do so on the distinct understanding that I shall not bind myself in any shape or form to support the construction of the railway if the survey does not disclose some better possibilities than have, so far, been presented to our view. There is to be no implied contract. We have heard much of implied compacts, but I desire to make my position perfectly clear. I consider that the proposed undertaking will be rather a work of exploration than an actual railway survey. Since this question was first brought before us, a good deal of additional information has been presented, which throws some light on the character of the country through which the railway would pass. It cannot be denied that the line would run through some excellent grazing country, but the difficulty seems to be to secure an adequate water supply. I assume that the survey party would be provided with boring appliances, and would do its best to discover any underground supplies that might exist. The honorable member for Kalgoorlie read some extracts from a report by Mr. Muir, which I had previously seen, and which I think bear out the statements made to me by the right honorable member for Swan and others in regard to the grazing capacity of the country through which the projected line would run. The right honorable member for Swan tells us that in his early explorations he passed through some excellent grazing land along the southern line. I do not know to which of these routes Mr. Muir refers in his report; but I think that he deals with a line designed to go further north than this railway would run. There can be no question, however, that a large area of good grazing country would be traversed, although, as I have already remarked, there is a difficulty in regard to securing a water supply. Mr. Muir deals with difficulties in the way of boring and of tapping any sources of fresh water, but he is very indefinite in regard to the rainfall. He states that the average rainfall is from seven inches upwards per annum—a very low one—but the statement appears to be somewhat inconsistent with the paragraph in which he informs us that the route passes through an area in which there are periodical rains, some of them of a tropical nature.

Mr. POYNTON.—How could he possibly determine the rainfall there?

Mr. SKENE.—That difficulty occurred to me when I was reading the report, for I know that no one has lived in the part of the country referred to long enough to enable any reliable data as to the rainfall to be obtained. I feel also that a good deal might be said from the point of view that the gold-fields are likely to be permanent, and to carry a large population for many years to come.

Mr. FOWLER.—There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SKENE.—It is also to be remembered that where there is a long haulage, the rates for railway transport are proportionately cheaper than where the distances are short. Some years ago, when Mr. Speight was Commissioner for Railways in Victoria, I found that in this State we were paying as much for the transport of our wheat for a distance of 160 miles as was being paid in New South Wales for haulage for a distance of 300 or 400 miles, and that the case was similar in regard to fat stock. Mr. Speight told me that the reason for the difference was that the New South Wales Commissioners could afford to charge less for a long haulage than he could afford to charge for a short haulage. Then, again, although the country through which the proposed line will pass may not afford much traffic to the line, that will not matter much if a full train load is obtained at one end and carried right through to the other end. The honorable member for Wilmot has referred to the likelihood of water competition; but that competition is not likely to be so severe as it is in the eastern States, where the distances are shorter. At the present time goods intended for the gold-fields have to be placed on steamers in Melbourne, transferred to the train at Fremantle, and then conveyed some 400 miles by rail, whereas if the proposed railway were constructed, only one handling would be necessary, and the total railway journey would be only about 1,000 miles.

Mr. POYNTON.—That argument applies particularly to passenger traffic.

Mr. SKENE.—I do not think that the passenger traffic alone would be sufficient to justify the construction of the line, though no doubt the passenger fares would materially supplement its earnings.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There would also be the conveyance of mails and of stock.

Mr. BRUCE SMITH.—Does the honorable member think that stock would be carried over the line?

Mr. SKENE.—Stock are now travelled and conveyed by steamer from Kimberly to the gold-fields, and properties many hundreds of miles distant have become valuable because of the market which has been given by the gold-fields. In America stock are taken by train much longer distances than that under consideration.

Mr. FOWLER.—And they lose less condition in the trucks than they lose on a bad track.

Mr. SKENE.—No doubt, because they are taken care of, taken out of the trucks to be watered, and are not in the trucks for a very long period at a time. Possibly the construction of the Esperance line would create competition by water. I have not altered my opinion in regard to this matter. When speaking on the address-in-reply, I said that I was disposed to vote for a trial survey of the line, and the information which has since been obtained has confirmed me in the view that it would be a wise thing to have the survey made.

Mr. LIDDELL (Hunter).—It seems to me that there has been a great deal of discussion upon this motion which is not altogether necessary. We are not now being asked to decide whether £6,000,000 should be spent upon the construction of a Transcontinental Railway; all that we are asked to do is to vote a certain sum of money to enable a survey of the route of the proposed line to be made, so that we may know the nature of the country through which it would pass, and the prospect of the railway becoming a paying one. This is not a parochial or a provincial matter. The proposed railway is not to connect two points in a State; it is a continuation of one of the greatest highways of the world, the continuation of a highway which practically encircles the world. The object of the line is to unite the railway systems of the east with the railway systems of the west, to complete a magnificent chain which, when finished, will extend from Cairns on the north, round to Fremantle on the west. In a country like Australia, where there are very few large navigable rivers, no canals, and an almost unindented coastline, so that means of water carriage are few and inconvenient, it is necessary, in order to give opportunities for settlement and progress, to provide other means of communication. If we are to progress as we deserve to do, we must construct railways to give free intercourse amongst our people, and to carry goods readily from one part of the continent to another. This is one of the chief means by which we may increase our population. We have heard a great deal about the falling off of population; but we cannot expect our population to increase unless we provide facilities such as I speak of. I believe that the reason why Western Australia progressed so slowly for many years was, that she was almost entirely isolated from the other States; and when the proposed communication is given, she will no doubt progress very rapidly. Prior to Federation, New Zealand felt that, surrounded as she was by the seas, it would be better for her to stand alone; but Western Australia saw that it would be to her advantage to join the Union, and one of the inducements held out to the people of that State for coming into the Federation was, I believe, that the proposed line would eventually be constructed by the Commonwealth. Even if it is not constructed very shortly, the time is not far distant when it must be made, because it is an absolute necessity. Are we going to repudiate a bargain which was made with the people of Western Australia? The bargain made with the people of New South Wales in connexion with the Federal Capital has practically been repudiated, because a site has been chosen where it was never expected that the Seat of Government would be placed, but is this Parliament going to act similarly towards Western Australia?

Mr. CAMERON.—Who made the bargain with Western Australia? There was no bargain.

Mr. LIDDELL.—The construction of the proposed line was held out to the people of Western Australia as an inducement to join the Federation.

Mr. KELLY.—By whom? By the right honorable member for Swan.

Mr. LIDDELL.—If the right honorable member for Swan held it out as an inducement, he had, no doubt, good authority for doing so. When the survey has been made it will be necessary to inquire as to the benefits which would be obtained by the construction of the proposed line. One of the great advantages which I foresee from its construction is that it will tend towards the unification of the great British Empire, because it will bring us nearer to the mother country, by cutting off the long and unpleasant sea journey which those who now come from Europe to Australia are obliged to make in order to get to the eastern States. If we can do anything to draw closer the bonds of union, to tighten the crimson threads which unite us to the mother land, it is our duty to do it. The proposed railway would shorten the journey to Europe by some days, and would make it a much pleasanter one than it is now. Those who have travelled between the eastern States and Europe know that the most unpleasant part of the journey is that between Fremantle and Adelaide. In summer time cyclones sweep across the vast expanse of water which has to be traversed, while in winter time icy blasts come from the south, making the journey round the Leeuwin and across the Great Australian Bight a very unpleasant one to the average traveller, so that many who have not suffered from sea sickness in the earlier part of the voyage become ill there. I believe that every one who could avail himself of the overland journey would take it, in preference to the voyage by sea. The proposed railway would also give us a great many advantages in connexion with the carriage of our mails. Our letters would be delivered in shorter time than they are now, and thus trade and commerce with Europe, and between the eastern and western States of the Commonwealth, would be facilitated and accelerated. Whatever may have been the report of Major-General Hutton on the subject, I believe that the proposed railway would be of great advantage to us if we were at war with a foreign nation. We know how Russia has been pushing forward her railways. We have read how a former Czar took his ruler and drew a line on the map from St. Petersburg to Moscow, to indicate how he wanted a railway to run. The question of cost was of little importance to him. We see now how the Russians have carried their railways through Siberia, and across Manchuria, and we know the use to which they have been put for transport purposes during the war. The Dominion of Canada, by the construction of the Canadian-Pacific railway, and the United States, have both set us examples which we might well follow in this matter. When the railway which now runs from San Francisco to New York was in contemplation, no one cared much for the fact that for many miles it would have to traverse the desert. It was not required to pay foot by foot. What the people of the United States desired was to get quickly from one part of the Union to another. That railway runs for thousands of miles across barren, waterless, alkali plains, where from his rising to his setting the sun never throws the shadow of a human being on the soil. Therefore, although water may be scarce along the route of the proposed line, and the country to be traversed may not be all that we might desire, we must regard it as a highway for the conveyance of passengers and of goods. I think, too, that if the line is constructed on the 4 ft. 8½ in. gauge, which already obtains in New South Wales, that gauge will eventually become universal.

Mr. CAMERON.—Does the honorable member know what it would cost to make that gauge universal?

Mr. LIDDELL.—I have not gone into the question of cost, but the first cost should be the last. We know what inconvenience and expense the present breaks of gauge entail, and we have the assurance of the present Government of Western Australia that they would be prepared to alter their gauge to make it conform with that of the proposed railway. If the same gauge were in use in Western Australia, and in New South Wales, I do not think that it would be long before it was adopted in the other States. If the railway is constructed I hope that we shall have no trouble in connexion with refreshment rooms at various stages. The personal inconvenience to which we now have to submit when travelling upon the railways is considerable, and the health of travellers must be seriously affected owing to the conditions under which they have to take their meals. This is a matter of very great moment, and I trust that the cars will be so arranged that passengers will be able to dine as they travel. If the construction of the railway were entered upon a considerable amount of work would be provided for those of our citizens who are in urgent need of employment, and the money of the Commonwealth could not be spent to greater advantage. There are no great engineering difficulties to be overcome, because the right honorable member for Swan tells us that the country is level for the greater part of the way. We have heard that water is scarce, and that the rainfall amounts to only seven inches per annum. I consider that the rainfall is a minor consideration, because we know that plentiful supplies of water can be obtained by means of artesian bores. I should like to know the source of the opposition to the project. Is it not instigated to a very large extent by the shipping companies, who fear that their interests will be seriously affected by the diversion of traffic? I have no sympathy with those whose opposition to the railway is prompted by consideration for vested interests, and I entirely object to the introduction of log-rolling into this Parliament. We have had enough of that in the States Parliaments. Some objection probably comes from the magnates of Perth and Fremantle, who would prefer to see a railway constructed from Kalgoorlie to Esperance.

Mr. MAHON.—They do not wish to see that line constructed.

Mr. LIDDELL.—They certainly do not desire to see the connexion made between Kalgoorlie and Port Augusta, and they would prefer the other line as the lesser of two evils. I do not bind myself to vote for the construction of the railway, but I think that £20,000 would be well spent in making a survey, and in securing the information that is essential to a full consideration of the merits of the project. I shall, therefore, vote for the measure.

Mr. POYNTON (Grey).—I feel deeply interested in the proposal now before us, not because the railway would traverse a considerable portion of the electorate which I represent, but because I have, for many years past, advocated the construction of the line. As long ago as 1894, I submitted a motion in favor of the construction of reservoirs, and of putting down artesian bores along the line of route that would probably be followed by a line connecting Port Augusta with Kalgoorlie. I considered then that the time was not far distant when a railway would be constructed, and I thought we should pave the way for it as far as possible. Upon that occasion I was beaten by only one vote. Later on I obtained a return from the Railway Commissioner of South Australia, in which he gave an approximate estimate of the cost of constructing a railway from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie, and also of the probable annual expenditure and revenue. He was strongly in favour of the proposal that South Australia should construct a line to the Western Australian border if the Government of the latter State would agree to build a railway to meet it. At a later date I tabled a motion, based upon the recommendations in that report, to the effect that the line should be constructed. At this time Federation had practically been agreed to, and in view of that fact, and of the promises which were distinctly made by representative men in the Commonwealth to induce Western Australia to join the Federal Union, the proposal was withdrawn. I am very sorry that the South Australian Government have taken up an attitude of antagonism to the project. I have no hesitation in saying that they have been largely influenced in this matter by consideration for the vested interests of Port Adelaide, and that Mr. John Darling, who dominates the policy of the Government, is very largely responsible for the present situation. I am glad that honorable members are not disposed to indorse the attitude of the South Australian Government. I am not in a position to-day to say whether or not the line would pay. We may have our own ideas as to the desirableness of connecting the two States by railway; but we shall need more information before we can express any definite opinion as to the commercial prospects of the railway. We have been told that certain gentlemen from Western Australia have traversed the country from Kalgoorlie to the border. They have given us a description of the timber to be found there, and of the various edible bushes which contribute to make the country suitable for pastoral occupation. They have also stated that the rainfall amounts to about seven inches per annum and upwards. No man can be in a position to exactly state the rainfall over that area of country, because no one has lived there long enough to collect the necessary data; but the fact that gum trees are growing in a belt 100 miles long, and about 100 miles broad, is in itself an indication of a good rainfall over that particular portion of the area. Then again, we are told that well-grassed plains extend for almost the whole distance from Kalgoorlie to the border. In some instances the grass was dry, and in other cases green, and it was in places as high as twelve inches. These are also indications of a good rainfall. I have traversed, and know the character of, about 300 miles of the country from Port Augusta westward. In South Australia, we have passed through one of the worst droughts ever known, which has extended over a period of practically seven years, and the country to which I refer was the only part of the northern pastoral districts of South Australia from which the pastoralists were not driven out by the drought. That is another indication that the 300 miles in question possesses a more favorable climate than do many of the northern portions of South Australia. Personally, I am of opinion that it is desirable to construct this railway for the purpose of connecting the eastern States with Western Australia. I cannot see what Federal tie binds us to the western State if that State is to continue isolated. But altogether apart from that consideration, I claim that the Transcontinental Railway possesses all the possibilities of a remunerative undertaking. At the present time Kalgoorlie has a population of from 40,000 to 50,000. These people have to depend for their supplies upon all parts of the Continent. They have relations with every other State. If they desire to visit the eastern portion of Australia they first have to travel 400 miles to reach the coast. Then the shipping companies charge them about twice as much in fares as they would be called upon to pay if it were possible for them to travel by rail. That is the secret of some of the opposition to the present proposal. In my opinion, Kalgoorlie is destined to occupy much the same position in regard to Australia as Broken Hill occupies in regard to South Australia. It will provide an opening for all the perishable products of the other States. When we consider that between 50,000 and 60,000 persons annually journey between Western Australia and the eastern States, it is easy to imagine what number would travel if a railway were at their very door, and if they could cover the distance in half the time that is at present occupied, and at half the existing cost. I do not fear the result of information being obtained relative to this project. I do not think it would be proper to say to Western Australia, "You must incur the expenditure necessary to obtain a survey of the line proposed, and if we subsequently ascertain that it is likely to prove a remunerative work we will recoup you your outlay." That would be a very unfederal spirit to evince. But, apart from these considerations, I claim that the construction of the proposed railway opens up great possibilities from a mineral standpoint. In South Australia some 300 miles along the route which the line would traverse, there is a gold-field which has already produced thousands of ounces of the precious metal. I believe that this railway, if constructed, would prove a base from which prospectors would go out and make rich discoveries. I feel pleased with the tone that has characterized this debate, and I am confident that no honorable member who votes for the motion will have cause to regret it. After all, what does the proposed expenditure represent? The large sum of 1½d. per head. I am confident that no person in the Commonwealth will begrudge that expenditure to obtain information regarding a great national undertaking. If the report is not satisfactory I shall not advocate the construction of the line. Nevertheless, I believe that it will confirm the opinions of men who are familiar with the country which it would traverse. It is a singular circumstance that those who are not acquainted with that country are the loudest in their condemnation of the proposal. For example, last night the honorable member for Moira spoke about "miles and miles of sand hills." Yet to-day the honorable member for Kalgoorlie quoted the report of Mr. Muir, of the Lands Department of Western Australia, a thoroughly practical man, who gave quite a glowing description of the country. In South Australia, Mr. Wells, of the Survey Department, who was engaged exploring this territory for about six months, prepared plans of it for me, and his description of the land upon the South Australian side of the border tallies exactly with that given by Mr. Muir of the territory upon the Western Australian side. I trust that honorable members will support the motion.

Mr. R. EDWARDS (Oxley).—It is not my intention to speak at great length, but I do not think that I should be justified in giving a silent vote upon this question. The utterances of the right honorable member for Swan, and other representatives of Western Australia, would almost incline me to vote in favour of the proposed expenditure of £20,000 for the survey of this railway. I know how anxious they are to secure it. To-night, for the first time in the history of this Parliament, we shall probably witness the whole of the representatives of a State voting together.

Mr. FOWLER. — That shows how solid Western Australia is upon the question.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—In explaining the Ministerial policy the other day, the Prime Minister declared that, if the Government were allowed to reach recess, they would use it to cultivate cordial relations between the States and the central Governments. Evidently that feeling has already been created in Western Australia, for to-day we find every representative of that great State voicing the same opinion upon this question. I trust that during the remainder of the session they will support the Government as they are doing now. Personally, I have to bear in mind that I represent a portion of Queensland, and I must therefore consider the best interests of that State. Much as I should like to support the right honorable member for Swan, I feel obliged to vote against this motion. If the proposed railway is of so much importance to Western Australia, why cannot that State incur the expenditure necessary to obtain a survey of the route? Why cannot it satisfy this Parliament that the construction of the Transcontinental Railway is possible, and that the territory through which it would pass is not a barren and waterless waste? If it were to expend £20,000 upon its own account, I think that it would be able to make out a very good case indeed. Such an expenditure would show that its people had confidence in the undertaking. But apparently they are not prepared to risk £20,000 to satisfy themselves and this Parliament that the construction of the line is practicable. I will not venture to say how many millions sterling the proposed railway would cost, because it has been variously estimated at £4,000,000, £5,000,000, and £6,000,000, and upon each occasion the right honorable member for Swan has contradicted the estimate. It is undeniable, however, that the undertaking would involve an expenditure of some millions.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—How much does the sugar bonus cost?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—If Queensland were allowed to secede from the Federation she would be very glad to forego the sugar bonus. It has been urged by several speakers that there was an understanding between the Premiers of the various States that the Transcontinental Railway should be constructed. Possibly there was also an understanding that one of the first measures submitted to this Parliament should have for its object an interference with the great sugar industry of Queensland. During the last election campaign I was frequently asked whether I would support an expenditure of £20,000 upon obtaining a survey of the proposed railway from Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie. This was a live question in Queensland. I had no hesitation in declaring that I would not be a party to penalizing Queensland to that extent. The northern State has already been penalized sufficiently, and has received very little consideration at the hands of this Parliament.

Mr. WATKINS.—Queensland has received more consideration than has any other State.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—She has not received the slightest consideration. Indeed, the feeling in Queensland to-day is that if it were possible to do so that State would gladly withdraw from the Federation. This afternoon, the honorable member for Coolgardie stated that if this railway were not constructed it would create a feeling of antagonism throughout Western Australia, and that its people would use every means in their power to secede from the Federation. All I can say is that Queensland would be only too glad to join with that State with a view to gaining the same end.

Mr. WATKINS.—The electors do not show that by their votes.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Why does Western Australia desire special treatment? The Constitution provides that every State shall be treated alike by the Commonwealth. No preference is to be given.

Mr. SKENE.—No sugar bounties.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—There is to be no interference with States rights. The Constitution provides that there shall be no discrimination shown in dealing with the States, and yet we have now before us a proposal to give two States an advantage over the others.

Mr. WATKINS.—Why?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Why should we specially legislate for South Australia and Western Australia at the expense of the other States? Queensland will be called upon to pay something like £4,000 as her proportion of the £20,000 which it is proposed to spend in making a preliminary survey.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Western Australia has helped to pay for the sugar bonuses which benefit Queensland.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Whose fault is that?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is not the fault of Western Australia.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—Did Queensland ask that there should be any interference with the sugar industry of that State, that kanaka labour should be abolished, and bonuses given by the Commonwealth to enable white labour to be substituted?

Mr. FOWLER.—She did, through her representatives.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—The latest proposal is that the Chinese throughout the rest of the Commonwealth shall be sent to Queensland to engage in the sugar industry. A suggestion to that effect has repeatedly been made in the Victorian press. It is thought that if the Chinese were sent in this way to Queensland the white traders of other parts of the Commonwealth, and more particularly of Melbourne, would no longer be compelled to compete with them. Queensland is quite prepared to observe the laws passed by the Commonwealth Parliament, but if coloured labourers are to be employed in the sugar-fields of that State let them be kanakas. The people of Queensland are accustomed to the habits of the kanaka, and, although Chinese may be very suitable for some classes of work, they are not fitted for the sugar industry. In the interests of Queensland I shall be compelled to oppose the motion. The State of which I am a representative might very well appeal to this Parliament for a similar vote towards the cost of a preliminary survey for a proposed railway to Somerset, in the extreme north of the Gulf of Carpentaria. It has just as much right to make such a request to this House as Western Australia has to ask that the Commonwealth shall expend £20,000 in this way. But the people of that State would not dream of doing such a thing. All that they ask of this Parliament is fair treatment and consideration.

Mr. WATKINS.—Did they ask for the sugar bonus?

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I am not dealing with the sugar industry. I should not have mentioned the subject but for an interjection made by the honorable member for Newcastle, who must have a very sweet tooth. I regret that I cannot support the motion, but I do not think that the State from which I come could fairly be asked to contribute £4,000 towards the cost of the survey of a railway that will be of no advantage to it. It has already been penalized by the extension of the Vancouver contract for the carriage of oversea mails, and by the increase of the subsidy from £7,000 to £10,000 per annum, while it is to suffer still further by the refusal of the Commonwealth to provide in the contract that mail steamers shall make Brisbane a port of call. In the interests of Queensland, I feel constrained to oppose this motion, although I believe that it will be carried.

Mr. STORRER (Bass).—I desire, at the outset to disclaim the suggestion made by the honorable member for Hunter, that the opposition to the motion has emanated from the shipping companies. I have not been approached by any shipping company, or by any individual in regard to this proposal, and I intend to exercise my common sense in dealing with it, as I do with all other matters that come before the House. The honorable member gives the House scarcely any credit for the exercise of common sense. The statement made during the debate, that we are bound by an implied compact to provide for this preliminary survey has, to my mind, no foundation. We are bound by that which was done by the Convention in framing the Constitution Bill, which was accepted by the people. I was opposed to the Bill, but I intend, as a representative of the people, to faithfully carry out its provisions. I would remind the Committee that it contains no reference to this projected railway, and that we are not bound by any Conference of Premiers, which may have met, and have arrived at certain decisions, any more than we should be bound by any Conference of Premiers of the various States that might meet and make certain suggestions to this House. If a Conference of Premiers made certain recommendations, as the result of which Western Australia was led to accept Federation, I can only say that it is a matter for regret that such recommendations should have been made, when the Premiers concerned had no power to give effect to them. It has been stated by the right honorable member for Swan, that those who oppose this motion are adopting a dog-in-the-manger policy.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No. I quoted the statement made by some one else.

Mr. STORRER.—But the right honorable member interjected during the course of a speech made by another honorable member in opposition to the motion, "Is the honorable member going to adopt a dog-in-the-manger policy"?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No; I said that we were not going to be dogs-in-the-manger.

Mr. STORRER.—In common with others, I intend to oppose the spending of £20,000 in carrying out the proposed survey; but in doing so, we are not adopting a dog-in-the-manger policy. Even if the Commonwealth refuses to undertake the work, Western Australia will be at liberty to carry out the survey, so that the case is not at all on all-fours with the fable of the dog in the manger, who could not eat the hay itself, and would not allow the ox to eat it.

Mr. FOWLER.—Why does Tasmania come to the Federal Parliament for a subsidy of £7,000 a year for a mail service?

Mr. STORRER.—I might as well ask why the Western Australian Parliament does not subsidize the over-sea mail steamers for carrying her mails to England. It is only fair and reasonable that the subsidy to which the honorable member has referred should be paid; but that question is not now before the Committee. The right honorable member for Swan will not deny that he stated that if this railway were constructed, Western Australia might secure better representation. I do not think that that suggestion is at all complimentary to the present representatives of that State.

Mr. FOWLER.—He did not say that.

Mr. STORRER.—He said that it would extend the choice of the people, and would perhaps lead to better representatives being secured.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I said that the construction of the line would enlarge the choice of the people of Western Australia.

Mr. STORRER.—And that they would obtain better representatives. I do not intend to quarrel with the right honorable member in regard to the matter, but holding as I do that the present representation of Western Australia is very satisfactory, the argument that the making of this railway might eventually lead to a change being made constitutes one reason for my opposition to the motion. The right honorable member also said that land along the line of railway might be reserved for the Commonwealth, as it was not worth much. He is an authority on the value of land in the country through which the line would pass, and if his statement be correct, the Commonwealth would not be likely to be recouped in respect of an expenditure of £4,000,000 on the construction of the line by the revenue obtained from land so reserved.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member had better come over and see our country.

Mr. STORRER.—I do not think that the railway would benefit Western Australia to the extent that many of the people of that State imagine. Although there is a railway between Melbourne and Sydney all the goods interchanged by those cities are sent to and fro by steamers, and the railway is but slightly used except for passenger traffic. I admit that if I were going to Western Australia I should prefer to travel by rail rather than by steamer, but at present the Commonwealth is not in a position to incur the proposed expenditure. Queensland, South Australia, Victoria, and New South Wales have spent large sums in connecting their various capitals with the inter-State railway systems, and I think that the least Western Australia might be expected to do is to carry out this survey at its own cost, and to show, before we are asked to construct the line, that some benefit would be gained from it. When I offered myself for election I was asked whether I favoured the construction of the Transcontinental Railway, and I replied in the negative. I said that I was not in favour of the Commonwealth constructing one mile of railway until the whole of the railways and of the debts of the States had been taken over by the Federal Parliament. If we had entered into a unification, and the States' debts and the railways of the States had been taken over by the Commonwealth, we should not have been troubled by many of the difficulties that now confront us. As long as each State controls its own railway system, and the States' debts remain unconsolidated I am not in favour of a single mile of railway being constructed by the Commonwealth.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—If the railways of the States had been taken over by the Commonwealth would the honorable member have favoured this motion?

Mr. STORRER.—In that event the proposal to construct this line would have been taken into consideration with other propositions to build railways in different parts of the Commonwealth, and the railway would have been constructed had the scheme been shown to be a reasonable one. In any event, however, I should have to be convinced that it would be a payable undertaking, just as a member of a State Parliament requires to be convinced in regard to any projected railway in his own State, that it would be a profitable undertaking. If the people of Western Australia are so wealthy, and if the turnover of that State is as large as has been stated, they might very well carry out the survey at their own cost. If the people of Western Australia are not croakers they might very well build the line to their own satisfaction, and on a gauge in keeping with the remaining lines of the State. I do not wish to introduce to the notice of the Committee any of the difficulties under which the people of Tasmania labour by reason of action taken by the Commonwealth, but there are one or two matters to which I must refer. One reason given for the proposal to construct this line is that it is necessary for defence purposes. Tasmania entered the Federation, believing that it would secure a better system of defence than had previously existed there, but she has obtained not a superior but an inferior one. No provision has been made for a suitable steamer to carry troops to Tasmania from the mainland in the event of a threatened invasion; but we are asked to construct a railway to Western Australia in order that troops may be carried to that State for defence purposes. On the other hand, one-half of the old members of the Defence Forces in Tasmania have been dismissed and recruits have been substituted.

Mr. HENRY WILLIS.—Surely Tasmania has benefited by the larger naval squadron that has been provided since Federation was inaugurated?

Mr. STORRER.—As a matter of fact, Tasmania is worse off now than she was prior to Federation. The people of Launceston have been deprived even of the convenience which they previously enjoyed through the displaying of a flag at the Post Office to indicate that a steamer was entering the heads. A large number of honorable members have committed themselves to the principle that there should be no borrowing of money for Commonwealth purposes; but how is the proposed survey, and the subsequent construction of the railway, to be carried out, unless we borrow money? The States have found out that surveyors and experts often report upon a proposed line as cheap, and likely to be profitable, when it is really costly and unprofitable; and I think that that will be the case in connexion with this line. An honorable member asked last night, "Would you, by depriving the people of Western Australia of a railway, allow them to starve?" It would be very strange if the people of Western Australia were to starve because of the absence of this railway, seeing that the people of Great Britain, who have to get all their supplies from other countries, are wholly dependent upon sea carriage, and that the people of Tasmania are in that position too. The people of Western Australia have fared very well hitherto, and I am sure that if more vessels are required to provide them with food, they will be supplied. What I desire to see come about eventually is the taking over of all the railways by the Commonwealth. According to my reading of the Constitution, it will be an interference with State rights for the Commonwealth to undertake the proposed survey until the Parliament of South Australia has sanctioned it. A comparison has been made between the construction of the proposed line and the carrying out of Commonwealth works for the conservation of water; but I do not think that the former is nearly so urgent a matter as is the supplying of water to a drought-stricken district. Much has been said about doing justice to the States; but it would be an injustice to four of the States if the Commonwealth Parliament sanctioned the spending, not merely of £20,000 for the survey of the proposed line, but of the further sum of £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 required for its construction. I intend to oppose the motion, though, as we have had of late so many changes of Government, and so many parties have promised to support the proposal, I think it will be carried. If, however, honorable members voted in accordance with their individual opinions, I believe that it would be negatived.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I have a perfectly open mind upon this question. It is not one which has engaged the attention of my constituency to any extent, and I do not remember to have heard it referred to there; but personally I have given a great deal of consideration to it, and I view the proposal for the construction of this railway with a great deal of misgiving and distrust. Of course we are now being asked, not to sanction the construction of the line, but to vote a sum of money for a survey to obtain information in regard to its prospects. The information contained in the reports now before honorable members is certainly very meagre. Those reports give very little justification for the construction of the line, though they are admittedly based on the results of only a partial investigation of the country which it will traverse.

Mr. KELLY.—Does not the honorable member think that the States concerned should pay the cost of any survey that is made?

Mr. JOHNSON.—It seems to me a reasonable contention that unless it can be shown that the necessities of the Commonwealth, from commercial, defence, or other national points of view, demand such a railway, the States which will benefit most by the construction of the line should bear the cost of its survey.

Mr. FOWLER.—Will not the construction of the line be of benefit to the whole Commonwealth?

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is a question I cannot at present answer, and is one upon which I desire information myself. The chief question for us to consider is whether the proposal is being put forward as a national one, and has in view the serving of great national interests, or whether it is being made in the interests of land gamblers and speculators. That is a point upon which I wish to be satisfied before committing myself in regard to the matter. I should like to know whether at the present time the land through which the railway would pass is in the possession of the State, or whether it has been alienated, and has passed into the hands of private individuals.

Mr. FOWLER.—It is almost all Crown land.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Then I should like to know what steps are being taken to conserve the public interest by securing for the State whatever increment in value may be created by the construction of the railway, and the aggregation of population in its vicinity. I have seen so much land speculation, and so much expenditure of public money by States Parliaments in constructing unprofitable lines merely to put money into the pockets of private individuals, that I intend to watch very carefully all proposals for railway construction by the Commonwealth Parliament, and to try to as far as possible conserve to the public any increment of value which may attach to the public estate by such expenditure.

Mr. KELLY.—In this instance the land through which the railway will pass belongs to two States, which will get the increment of which the honorable member speaks. It will not go to the Commonwealth.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Not necessarily; some arrangement may perhaps be arrived at between the States concerned and the Commonwealth under which a certain proportion of the increment will be transferred to the Commonwealth. At any rate, the railway will be the property of the Commonwealth, and the Commonwealth Government before committing itself to any scheme of railway construction should conserve national interests in this connexion. The Engineers-in-Chief of the various States who reported on this proposal on 27th July, 1903, are rather favorable to the construction of the line, though their investigations led them to believe that for a number of years the railway would not be a paying one. They say—

New tracts of country would be opened up for pastoral settlement both in South Australian and Western Australian territory, the chief difficulty at present lying not so much in the want of fertility of the country, and the absence of water, as in its inaccessibility.

The same may be said as regards mineral development. Recent discoveries show that the country for 175 miles east of Kalgoorlie, which is auriferous, may turn out to be highly productive and a source of revenue to the railway. Tarcoola, and other mining centres in South Australia, if rendered more accessible, may come to enjoy prosperity after they have been more thoroughly and systematically prospected. The reports of the Government Geologist are not unfavorable.

We are of opinion that South Australia will gain by the construction of the railway. Not only will the railway revenue receive an impetus, and, as before indicated, opportunity for pastoral and mining development be afforded, but the State generally must be benefited by the increase of passengers and other traffic which will come with the railway.

That statement confirms my opinion that South Australia, which is apparently going to benefit largely from the construction of the proposed line, might reasonably have been asked to contribute something towards the cost of its survey. The Commissioners say that to the question as to "the advisability of constructing the proposed railway"—

We find it very difficult to give an answer, in view of the fact that the monetary loss will, for the first few years, be considerable. The revenue may prove to be higher than we have estimated, and the deficiency may tend to diminish from year to year more rapidly than has been assumed.

Then comes this summary—

Our answers to the questions put to us are, briefly, as follows:—

1. We estimate the probable expenditure in construction at £4,559,000.

2. The probable revenue which may be depended upon after construction is, in our opinion, £205,860. If the past progress in Western Australia is maintained so that the present population becomes doubled in ten years after completion, the revenue may also be taken as double, viz., £411,720.

I do not regard that as an excessive estimate. The Commissioners continue—

The revenue may also be taken as double, namely, £411,720. The probable annual expenditure in working and maintaining the line immediately after construction we estimate at £114,400, which, added to interest on the cost of construction, at 3½ per cent., £159,566, gives £273,966 for the total expenditure. After ten years, under the conditions stated, the working expenses may be taken as £210,000, and, in view of the necessary expenditure in improving works in the meantime, the interest on the enlarged capital will be £183,501, making a total of £393,501.

It will be seen that the estimated loss for the first ten years is £68,160 per annum, and after ten years the estimated annual profit is £18,219. In regard to the prospective loss, certain communications passed between the late Prime Minister and the Premier of Western Australia. On the 6th May the Prime Minister telegraphed to the Premier of Western Australia as follows:—

Re Western Australian Railway.—Representations made to me, feeling of members Federal Parliament towards proposal favours belief that opposition would be materially lessened if your Government indicate willingness to contribute stated proportion of loss, if any, during the first ten years. As matter under consideration of Cabinet, early reply desired.

The reply from the Premier of Western Australia was dated 18th May, and read as follows:—

On condition that Commonwealth is allowed a free hand as to route and gauge of railway, this State will be prepared for ten years after line constructed to bear a share of any loss in excess of our contribution on a population basis. It would be premature to fix exact proportion we are prepared to pay at this stage, but I am confident that it will be liberal, and satisfy the Federal Parliament of our sincerity in this connexion, and our belief that the work will soon be a directly paying one.

That is satisfactory, so far as it goes, but I think that we shall require a greater guarantee than is therein afforded, before we commit ourselves to the construction of the line—a guarantee on the lines I have already indicated in connexion with the future increment in the value of land adjacent to the railway. There is another aspect of this question, which I admit is deserving of serious consideration, and that is the bearing that the construction of the railway would have on the defences of the Commonwealth, and the protection of our interests in time of war. In that connexion, the General Officer Commanding the Military Forces, Major-General Hutton, was asked to furnish a report, from which I propose to read some extracts, in order to show the importance of the matter. Major-General Hutton, in his report, which is dated 14th May, 1903, says—

In reply to your minute of 30th March last requesting that I would submit for your consideration a minute upon the report of the Conference of Engineers-in-Chief upon the proposed Transcontinental Railway, I beg to observe as follows :—

1. The contemplated extension of railway communication between Kalgoorlie in West Australia and Port Augusta in South Australia is, from a strategical and military point of view, of unquestionable value. The isolation of Western Australia without direct land communication with the other five States of Australia will, in time of war, cause a general feeling of insecurity. Under the existing circumstances, Western Australia, for purposes of co-operative military assistance from the other States, is as far distant from direct means of reinforcement as New Zealand is from the Eastern States of Australia.

2. In order, however, to correctly view the present construction of the railway in question as an important factor in the defence of the Commonwealth it will be well to consider the special importance of Western Australia in the eyes of foreign powers, and the description of attack to which Australia is subject, and to meet which intercommunication between the States by land must be regarded as of paramount value.

The potential wealth of the gold-fields and the vast extent of valuable and unoccupied land in the territories of Western Australia render the acquisition of that portion of the Australian Continent a most valuable prize to foreign nations. The strategical situation, moreover, of Western Australia, dominating as it does the southern side of the Indian Ocean, and the converging trade routes from the West, must be considered as of the greatest importance to British and Australian interests.

These are very strong remarks, and coming from such an authority, are deserving of our most serious consideration. Nevertheless, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that Western Australia and South Australia will derive the greatest benefit from the construction of the railway, and I have always inclined to the opinion that those States should have been called upon to pay a large share of the cost of the proposed survey. But there is still another aspect of the question to be considered? The Prime Minister has assured us that at the Premiers' Conference, a certain understanding was arrived at between the representatives of the other States and Western Australia. No agreement was embodied in the Constitution, and no written bond was entered into, but an assurance was given by the Premiers of the States other than Western Australia, that they would support a proposal for the survey of the proposed line—I do not know that their promise extended to the actual construction of the line. If the Premiers who spoke for the people of the various States entered into a compact, I take it as binding on those States. They spoke as the representatives of their respective States. The fact that the compact was only of a verbal character, makes the obligation, if anything, the more binding upon us. It has been argued that other compacts, in which other States were concerned, have not been kept, and I know that a certain pledge was made to the people of New South Wales in connexion with the Tariff question, which certainly has not been fulfilled. But I do not think that fact would justify the people of New South Wales in setting aside the promise made to the people of Western Australia in regard to the survey of this railway.

Mr. CHANTER.—What was the pledge referred to by the honorable member, in the case of New South Wales?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am speaking of the promise made by Sir Edmund Barton to the effect that a protective Tariff would not be imposed, a tacit understanding to that effect having been arrived at. Although I do not personally approve of the compact made with regard to the survey of the route for the proposed railway, because I do not think it was a wise one, I feel bound, under the circumstances, to respect it. At the same time, I wish it to be understood that I do not regard my action as in any way binding me to vote for the construction of the proposed railway.

Mr. WATKINS (Newcastle).—I regret very much that this question is being regarded by certain honorable members from a State stand-point. I recognise that a railway, such as that projected, would be a thoroughly national work, and that its construction is a matter of Federal concern. Whilst I am not at present prepared to commit myself to support the construction of the line, I feel perfectly justified in voting for the proposal to spend £20,000 upon a survey. We may find, after the report is presented to us, that it would not be advisable for us to construct the railway, but I venture to say that no honorable member is at present in a position to say whether or not the railway would pay, or whether it would develop good country, or traverse what has been described as a desert. If we were contemplating the settlement of a large population upon the country adjacent to the proposed railway line, we should look for arable plains and river flats, which would be capable of growing all kinds of produce; but it must be recognised that, even though the country through which the line would pass may not be capable of growing a bushel of wheat, it may still prove one of the richest tracts in Australia. I believe that the resources of Australia are capable of much higher development, and I think we should do well to have a survey made, so that we may be in a better position to consider the possibilities before us in connexion with the proposed railway. Whilst I admit that at the present time we are not in a position to say whether the proposed railway should be constructed, I claim that the idea of obtaining a proper survey of the country which the line would traverse is an excellent one. It might perhaps be wise for the Prime Minister to suggest to the two States chiefly interested in the undertaking, that they should despatch, under the control of those charged with the duty of making the survey, a number of prospectors who could simultaneously examine the country for some miles upon either side of the route, with a view to discovering any auriferous wealth which may exist there. I intend to vote for the motion, in order that we may gain further information respecting the territory which the proposed line would traverse. It has been urged that this railway should be constructed by the two States, which are chiefly interested in the undertaking. To my mind, with the advent of Federation, the construction of transcontinental railways passed to the Commonwealth. I do not care what compact may have been entered into by the Premiers of the States when assembled in Conference. That does not influence me one iota. I do trust that the Committee will not regard this question from a State stand-point, as has been done by a couple of honorable members who have addressed themselves to it. For example, the honorable member for Oxley urged that Queensland had not been treated by the Commonwealth in the same liberal way as has Western Australia. Since I entered this Parliament I have endeavoured to view every question which has engaged our attention from a purely national stand-point, and I venture to say that if we come to examine the matter without bias, we shall unhesitatingly declare that under Federation Queensland has received her due.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—In what way?

Mr. WATKINS.—The people of that State appealed to this Parliament to insure for them what they were unable to achieve for themselves in their own State Legislature, namely, the maintenance of a white population, and adequate protection to the sugar-growers. I believe that the honorable member for Oxley himself voted for the payment of a bonus upon sugar produced exclusively by white labour. In that respect I think that Queensland has received very substantial benefits at the hands of this Parliament. I do not regard the construction of the proposed Transcontinental Railway as a State project in any sense of the word. If the line is to be built at all, it should be built for the benefit of the whole of Australia. At the present time we have not sufficient data to enable us to determine whether or not it ought to be constructed. My own opinion is that any coastal line connecting South Australia with Western Australia would represent an absolute waste of money. Any railway which will compete with the existing service by sea would be utterly useless. In my judgment a Transcontinental Railway ought to traverse the interior of Australia, and to open up the inland portions of the continent. Believing that, I suggest that there should be attached to any party which may be sent out to survey a route from Tarcoola in South Australia to Kalgoorlie in Western Australia, not only a couple of prospectors, but some such officer as Mr. Brown, the Government Geologist of South Australia, who is a practical man in every sense of the word. If that course be adopted, any expense which may be incurred in undertaking the proposed survey will not be entirely thrown away, even if the report be adverse to the construction of the line, because we shall at least ascertain the class of country which the proposed railway would traverse. I would further point out that an expenditure of £20,000 when distributed amongst the States, does not represent any more than each would be called upon to pay for the survey of an ordinary line of railway within its own borders. We have been told that the territory which the Transcontinental Railway would cross has already been prospected. I do not think that it has been prospected any more than Kalgoorlie or Coolgardie had been prospected before the memorable gold rush took place there. It is one thing for an individual to walk over the country and quite another for him to prospect it. For years before Broken Hill was discovered we know that the graziers in that locality were accustomed to use the galena obtained there as ornaments for their mantelpieces. They did not know that it contained silver.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON. — Sturt was water-bound at the Pinnacles for six months.

Mr. WATKINS.—We have yet to learn that there is not another Broken Hill in Australia, or that there is not a second Kalgoorlie or Coolgardie. If the proposed survey served no other purpose it would at least offer facilities for the discovery of other rich mineral resources, and in that way the Commonwealth would be amply repaid for the outlay. Considering the importance of this question from a Federal stand-point, and the view which honorable members take as to promises made in this regard to Western Australia, I say that no gigantic work of this description should be attempted by the Federal Parliament unless we have the fullest information at our disposal in relation to the project. It is because of this belief that I propose to vote for the motion, but practically on the condition that the Government will see that a thoroughly organized party is sent out, so that the character of the country may be properly ascertained. It is not sufficient for us to know that the land which would be traversed by the line consists of good agricultural country, or that it is suited to only one purpose. Let us know positively whether it does not present other great possibilities, which would support a railway of this description. I feel that if a party consisting of surveyors only were sent out, we should obtain from them a report very similar to that presented from time to time to States Parliaments for or against the building of various railways. It would deal only with the agricultural prospects of the country to be served, and other cognate subjects. Railway surveyors cannot be expected to have any knowledge of the mineral possibilities of the country to which I have referred. Whilst this survey is being made, it would be easy for members of the party to explore the country north and south of the projected route. In that way they would be able to furnish us with a general knowledge of the true character of the country through which the line would pass. I do not see that there is much force in the argument that the construction of this line is necessary for defence purposes.

Mr. MAHON.—It may become very important in that respect.

Mr. WATKINS.—That is so. It may be said that if we build such a line solely for defence purposes, it should not go so far south as is proposed. It might be more desirable to start from a point further north on the eastern side; but, in any event, if we spend money on the building of trans-continental railways, we should be careful that they do not run too close to the coastline. It should be our province to see that they penetrate more thoroughly into the interior, so that Australia may be developed in the true sense of the word. It is because I feel that the time has come when this Parliament should do something to develop the resources of Australia, that I am now prepared to support the making of this survey; but whether I shall vote for the construction of the line will depend on the nature of the report to be furnished by the surveyors.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—It was not my intention to speak at this stage, but I think it desirable to briefly deal with one or two points. When the Constitution Bill was before the people of New South Wales, I pointed out that the cost of the construction of a railway line of this character would probably be foisted on the eastern States. I suggested that it was probably due to a promise that this line would be constructed that the people of Western Australia had become favorable to the proposal that that State should enter the Federation. I did not know at the time that such a compact had been made; but it appears, from what has been said during this debate, that it was promised that the proposal should be brought before the Parliament, and that it should be pressed to construct the line. I intend to support the carrying out of the preliminary survey, but on the clear understanding that in doing so I shall not bind myself to vote for the construction of the railway. Unless the Bill necessary to provide for the making of this survey is to contain a stipulation that the States concerned shall reserve the land for some fifty or 100 miles on each side of the proposed route, so that speculators may not come in and derive all the benefits flowing from the construction of the railway, I shall not vote even for the survey. I wish to make it perfectly clear that I shall be no party to giving any private individual an undue advantage. Suppose that prospectors accompany the survey party, and discover a rich gold-field along the route; who is to derive the benefit from that discovery? Are we to construct the line merely for the advantage of a few speculators? Are we to spend the money of the people in this way, with the object of enriching a few private individuals? So far as I am concerned, we are not; I hold that any step taken by us in this direction should be so safeguarded as to preserve to the Commonwealth the benefit of the increased value given to the lands along the line.

Mr. WILSON.—The honorable member is a Socialist; he wishes to nationalize the lands.

Mr. LONSDALE.—There is nothing of Socialism in my composition. I hold that every man has a right to that which he earns or produces, and that no one is justified in depriving him of any part of it. I am equally firm in the belief that that which the State produces, by constructing railways or other public works, belongs to the whole of the people, and that no private individual has a right to derive the sole advantage. If this railway be constructed, with the result that the value of the land along the route is increased, the increment in value should belong to the Commonwealth, or to the States which construct it.

Mr. WATKINS.—Could not that be arranged?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I desire that provision shall be made in that direction. Irrigation works and railways have been constructed in Victoria, which have led to a few men becoming wealthy at the expense of the State; the poor have been taxed in order to enrich a few. I am not here to support anything of the kind, and I wish to make it perfectly clear that I shall vote for this survey upon the understanding that the Commonwealth will be protected.

Mr. WILSON.—The honorable member is now a protectionist?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I am a free-trader. A protectionist is a man who desires to give the capitalist something out of the pockets of the poor; but although I am not a protectionist I hold that we should protect our rights. It has been suggested that a private syndicate would construct this railway.

Suppose some syndicate were prepared to build the line, what concession would it demand? Would it not be given the land on either side of the railway? And surely if a private syndicate be entitled to the land along a line of railway which it constructs, the Federation should not be put in any worse position.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is no objection to that.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Such a reservation must be made. We must make it clear that no individual is to reap the fruits of that which is produced by the State, and that the Federation shall secure any increment in the value of the land along the route which may result from the construction of the line. I shall vote for the motion, but I do not say that even if the survey be made I shall support the construction of the railway.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON (Barker).—The honorable member for Newcastle has made two suggestions. The first, which I think is an excellent one, is that if the survey be carried out, prospecting operations should be conducted in connexion with it. That is indeed an admirable proposal. As to the second suggestion, made by the honorable member, I am more than a little doubtful. He urged that it would be well, in the interests of Australia, that the railway, if constructed, should not touch at Port Augusta, but should be carried very much further inland. If that suggestion be acted upon, I can only say that there will be no enthusiasm manifested by the people of South Australia in the construction of the railway.

Mr. MAHON.—There is none now.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—I intend to vote for the motion. I favour the carrying out of this survey; but I do not wish the Committee to be under the impression that this statement implies that I would approve of the immediate construction of the railway.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not even if the report of the surveyors be favorable?

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—In taking up this position, I believe that I am expressing the view of the majority of the people of South Australia. They are not hostile to the railway, but they feel that it is not a work about which there need be any special hurry. They hope and believe that in the country lying between Port Augusta and Kalgoorlie there is great mineral wealth; but that remains to be proved, and until we gain much more satisfactory information than we possess at the present time, the people of South Australia think we should go slowly. They hold that there is no justification for immediately plunging the Commonwealth into the tremendous expenditure which would be involved in the construction of the contemplated line. That is a reasonable attitude. There would be no justification in present circumstances for constructing the line. Even if the railway existed, the great bulk of produce and merchandise would be carried by steamer, because of the cheaper rates which the sea route affords. Suppose a railway now existed, there is no doubt that many persons in Western Australia, wishing to visit the eastern States, would travel by train; but very many others would travel by steamer, because, as in the case of cargo, that would afford a cheaper means of passing from Western Australia to the other States. The honorable member for Kalgoorlie stated to-day that if the railway were constructed, persons coming to Australia by the great ocean-going steamers would land at Fremantle, and travel overland to the eastern States. If the line were constructed, the experience of Fremantle would, in my opinion, be a repetition of that of Adelaide. Persons coming to Australia by the mail steamers, and intending to visit Western Australia, would, of course, land at Fremantle. It may be that many of them would continue their journeys to the eastern States by train, but there is no doubt that those travelling to Adelaide, Melbourne, and Sydney, would complete their voyages by mail steamer. Whilst I hold this view, I am ready, as I have said, to vote money for the survey, because I think it is most desirable that the fullest information should be obtained, and I believe that the time will come when such a railway as is now contemplated will be constructed.

Mr. CAMERON (Wilmot).—I intend to vote against this motion. In the first place I do not believe for one moment that 1,100 miles of country could be properly surveyed at a cost of £20,000. It is utter nonsense to say that it is possible to carry out this work for so small an outlay, and the statement that it could be done suggests ignorance on the part of those who make it. It seems to me very contemptible of the people of Western Australia and of South Australia to ask the people of the other States to bear a part in paying for something which will primarily tend to their individual benefit.

Mr. WILSON.—They look upon it as a national work.

Mr. CAMERON.—It is not a national work; it is simply a proposed survey. In support of that contention, I would point out that Mr. Jenkins, the Premier of South Australia, while perfectly willing to allow the people of the other States to find the money for the survey, declines to pass a Bill enabling the Commonwealth to construct the railway, until it has been made. If Western Australia and South Australia are as anxious as they pretend to be to have the line made, they should carry out the survey, and then say to the Federal Parliament, "Here is a survey, and proper estimates. We know what the line will cost to construct, and we offer you the land through which it will pass." They are putting the cart before the horse, and are asking the other States to pay for a work which they should do themselves. Although we may make this survey, we shall have no power to construct the line until the Parliaments of South Australia and Western Australia have passed enabling measures to allow of its construction. Therefore we may be throwing our money away for nothing. I protest against the carrying out of this work by the Commonwealth, and I shall vote against the motion.

Mr. CARPENTER (Fremantle).—I regret that the first speech made by the honorable member for Wilmot, after taking his place on the Opposition cross benches—

Mr. CAMERON.—I have always sat in Opposition. I am an independent.

Mr. CARPENTER.—At any rate, I regret that the first speech made by the honorable member since I have been sitting on the same side as he is is so unsympathetic towards Western Australia. Since I have had the honour of a seat in this Chamber I have felt a particular sympathy towards the representatives of Tasmania, because that State is situated similarly to Western Australia, though, if anything, its isolation is more complete, and, while it is possible to give overland communication to Western Australia, Tasmania must remain for ever shut off from the mainland by the sea. For this reason I regarded it as quite proper a few months ago for the representatives of the two States to join hands on a matter in which they were mutually interested. But while I regret that most of the representatives of Tasmania are opposed to the present proposal, I think that it would not be hard to persuade the Committee that the charge which they bring against the representatives of Western Australia of asking for a special concession would lie more at their own door, since the Commonwealth is paying £9,000 per annum to subsidize a Tasmanian mail service, and the amount is, I understand, to be increased to £13,000.

Mr. CAMERON.—But that amount is debited to Tasmania alone.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Tasmania does not pay the whole of it.

Mr. CAMERON.—Yes, it does. Victoria did pay £1,000, but now Tasmania pays the whole sum.

Mr. CARPENTER.—If the honorable member can produce sufficient evidence of that, I shall be glad to accept his denial; but at the present time I understand that Tasmania does not pay the whole of that subsidy. I was particularly glad to have the assurance of the honorable member for Barker in reference to the attitude of the people of South Australia with regard to this proposal. If there is one thing which has caused me pain in connexion with it, it is the supposed attitude of the people of that State towards the project. I had the honour to be a member of the South Australian Parliament when this subject was first discussed. I distinctly remember that when the draft Constitution Bill was before the people of South Australia, two very strong arguments were used by its supporters to induce the people of that State to accept it. One was that South Australia would be able to hand over to the Commonwealth the Northern Territory, whose administration costs £100,000 a year, and the other was that they would thereby obtain railway communication with Western Australia.

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not think that the making of the proposed railway was used as an argument for the acceptance of the draft Constitution, though the opening of markets in Western Australia and elsewhere was.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I do not say that the honorable and learned member used the railway argument, but others did, and those who are acquainted with the Federal movement know that there was a distinct understanding that the railway should be built very shortly after Federation. The right honorable member for Swan has been criticised for not having had that compact put into the Constitution; but we know that one of his characteristics is that he is frank and open, and trusts people. I believe that when he obtained the assurance of the Premiers of the other States that the railway should be made, he was content to abide by it. He entered into an honorable agreement, and I am not going to say that the other parties to that agreement will not honorably keep it. But the enthusiasm aroused on behalf of Federation died away, and, as a natural consequence, a reaction set in, which in South Australia took the form of a feeling against the proposed railway, because it had been suggested that, instead of going to Port Augusta, it might be taken right across to Sydney.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Who suggested that?

Mr. CARPENTER.—I do not say that it was suggested by any Government officially, but it was suggested. A rumour to that effect was in existence. The result was that a feeling of antagonism to the proposal grew up in South Australia. I have always said that that antagonism is merely temporary, and when I visited the State a fortnight ago, and spoke to several persons on the subject, I was glad to find that the attitude of the present Premier does not represent the prevailing views on the subject.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—He does not oppose the proposed survey.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I am speaking of the larger project—the construction of the line. So far as I can ascertain, the people of South Australia are not averse to the construction of the line. They do not suppose that injury will result to their State from its construction.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—They wish to have that proved.

Mr. CARPENTER.—If there is not sufficient evidence of the fact already, I am convinced that further inquiry will supply it. I cannot understand how opposition to the project grew up in South Australia. It has always been thought that that State would be the chief gainer by the construction of the line, and I am not sure that that is not so. At any rate, the Committee can afford to treat very lightly, indeed, the supposed antagonism of the State to this project. I believe that when we come to face the question of the construction of the line, it will have no more ardent supporters than the representatives of South Australia.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—When it has been proved that it will be a reproductive work.

Mr. CARPENTER.—If South Australia had never constructed a line until it had been proved likely to be reproductive, her present magnificent railway system would not exist. While I was a member of the South Australian Parliament, a motion was introduced affirming the desirability of constructing a railway from Port Augusta to Tarcoola, as a section of a Transcontinental Railway, but as the State, like most of the other States, was not very flush of money at the time, it was said, "Why should we spend money in making a section of a great national railway which the Commonwealth intends to carry out?" The feeling that the Federal Government would one day construct the line did more than anything else to prevent the motion from being carried. The honorable member for Moira last night, referring to the promise of the late Premier of Western Australia, Mr. Walter James, to treat the Federal Government very liberally in sharing any loss that might accrue from the construction and working of the line, said that it had not been repeated by the present Premier, and that we did not know that he would consider himself bound by the promise of his predecessor.

Mr. KENNEDY.—My statement related to the experience through which we are at present passing with the Premier of South Australia.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I am quite prepared to grant that, in view of the fact that in some cases one Premier will not keep the promise made by his predecessor, the honorable member's criticism was justified. In order to set the matter at rest I decided, after consulting with some of my colleagues, to send a telegram to Mr. Daglish, the present Premier of Western Australia, pointing out that we were open to that criticism. I have recently received the following reply:—

I have wired Government an indorsement of my predecessor's telegram to Mr. Watson re Trans-Australian Railway.

That, I hope, will remove any fear that the present Government of Western Australia does not fully indorse the promise made by its predecessors in office. I desire to reply to some of the statements which have been made with regard to the absence of water along the route of the proposed line. Several quotations have been made from reports, principally with the object of showing that the whole of the country between Port Augusta and Kalgoorlie is a waterless waste. Some few weeks ago I brought under the notice of the then Prime Minister a report that had been received from Mr. Muir, a gentleman who was sent out by the Western Australian Government to examine the country along the proposed route. I pointed out that in addition to the fact that Mr. Muir stated that he had passed through 10,000,000 acres of good pastoral country, he reported that he had put down two artesian bores. One had struck water fit for human consumption, whilst the other was yielding 70,000 gallons daily of water suitable for stock purposes. Therefore, it is only fair to state that there is every indication that upon further prospecting a supply of artesian water will be found, sufficient to enable the country adjacent to the proposed line to be profitably occupied by pastoralists. At present we have at Kalgoorlie an abundant supply of fresh water, and I believe that water could be conveyed by gravitation for almost any distance along the proposed railway. Therefore, the water difficulty is not a very serious one, and there is no reason why it should be held up to induce honorable members to oppose the proposal for a survey. The suggestion made by the honorable member for Newcastle that the surveying party should partake of the character of an expedition for the purposes of general inquiry and exploration must commend itself to every member of the Committee. I believe that the Western Australian Government would be only too glad to avail themselves of an opportunity to attach one or two good prospectors to an expedition of that kind. The trouble hitherto in connexion with prospecting parties has been due to the absence of some responsible head, and I am sure that if a capable man were intrusted with the control of the survey party, the money devoted to prospecting would be well spent. I shall certainly do my utmost to secure the adoption of the suggestion of the honorable member. We know that for 200 miles to the eastward of Kalgoorlie the country is auriferous, and there is no reason why we should not find another Kalgoorlie, near the eastern border of the State. If we should discover another goldfield of that description, the Commonwealth would no doubt be prepared to construct the proposed line almost without the asking. I think that it is due to the honorable Walter James, the late Premier of Western Australia, who has thrown himself into this movement with very great energy.

and to whom we are indebted for very much of the information contained in the pamphlet from which honorable members have so extensively quoted, that we should express our thanks to him. He has given us a great deal of information about the State, and several honorable members have assured me that they, until they perused the pamphlet, had no true idea of Western Australia or its trade possibilities. I mention this as a matter of bare justice. Before I conclude, may I say that the people of Western Australia have never doubted that the Commonwealth Parliament would, sooner or later, construct the proposed line. They have been a little surprised at the opposition—or the supposed opposition—of South Australia, but I believe that will shortly be removed. When the first step is taken, as I believe it will be shortly, towards the carrying out of this great work, the people of Western Australia will begin to believe that the Federation which they were induced to join is, after all, going to prove to their advantage. I am not suggesting that they joined the Union with any selfish motive. If they did so, they have certainly been disappointed. The Treasurer, at the time of the last election, stated that so far as Federation had gone, Western Australia had not derived one pennyworth of benefit from it. I do not think that that could be said of any other State. We are not speaking selfishly when we ask that some consideration should be extended to our portion of the Continent, and that some evidence should be afforded that Federation will bring advantage to those who need it most. I am very glad indeed that the proposal has been received in such a friendly spirit, and I hope that before long, not only will the survey be completed, but that the construction of the line itself will also be commenced.

Mr. CAMERON (Wilmot).—I desire to correct a mistake made by the honorable member for Fremantle. He said that Tasmania benefited to the extent of £9,000 per annum owing to the other States paying a large portion of the cable subsidy. I interjected at the time that his statement was incorrect. Had the statement been true, the representatives of Tasmania might have been regarded as taking up a selfish attitude in opposing the proposed survey. I would point out, however, that Tasmania has always had to bear her own burdens. The Estimates for 1902-3 and 1904-5 show that Tasmania has received no assistance from the other States in regard to the cable subsidy, and that she is debited, year after year, with the full amount of her liability in that regard.

Mr. CARPENTER.—My figures were official.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—That is for the book-keeping period.

Mr. CAMERON.—It will be time enough when the bookkeeping provisions of the Constitution cease to operate to talk about making the proposed survey. Tasmania has not received any assistance from the other States, and so long as she has to bear her own burdens, it will be grossly unfair to ask her to contribute towards an expenditure such as that now contemplated.

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—I should like to explain why, at the present juncture, at all events, I am forced to vote against the proposed expenditure of £20,000 upon a survey for the proposed Transcontinental Railway. I think that, if we agreed to spend £20,000 or £30,000 in the manner described, it could not be said that there had not been some recognition given to the desire of Western Australia. By sanctioning this expenditure we should to some extent prejudice our judgment as to whether or not the railway should be constructed. We should take the first step in the direction in which the people of Western Australia desire us to proceed, and raise anticipations that might operate as an obstacle to the exercise of a free choice when we were called upon to consider the claims of the railway itself. The reports which are before us indicate that the country through which the line would pass is not of such a character as to raise very sanguine hopes that an expenditure of several millions of pounds upon a railway would prove profitable. When I first entered the South Australian Parliament, in 1887, I received a letter from a gentleman who had travelled over a considerable portion of the country that would be traversed by the proposed line. As there was some suggestion at the time that a railway should be constructed to Eucla, he asked me to strongly oppose the idea, because the country was the most hopeless that he had ever passed through, although he had explored a considerable portion of the territory lying between Port Augusta and Kalgoorlie, and also to the northward towards Port Darwin. With regard to the proposal to spend £5,000,000 upon the construction of the railway, I think that those of us who object to the Commonwealth borrowing ought to hesitate before we encourage the idea of incurring such an outlay. Surely there is not the slightest hope that, within the next ten or fifteen years, this Parliament will be prepared to spend such a large sum of money upon a railway which would pass over 1,000 miles of the most hopeless country in Australia. We have not yet decided what is to be the Australian standard gauge. No doubt we should adopt the 4ft. 8½in. gauge, but that question has not yet been settled. In 1888 or 1889, I induced the South Australian Legislative Assembly to pass a motion to the effect that the Governments of the States should be requested to decide upon the standard gauge to be adopted for the Commonwealth. Victoria was then disinclined to come to any decision upon the point, because she did not wish to surrender her 5ft 3in. gauge. New South Wales was willing that the matter should be considered by the Railway Commissioners, but Mr. Mathieson did not see his way even to enter into a conference on the subject. I do not think that we should entertain any idea of constructing 1,100 miles of railway upon the 4ft. 8½in. gauge until we know that that gauge is to be adopted as the standard for all Australia. It would be just as well if the Government took this matter in hand, and asked the States Governments to decide at once upon a standard gauge, so that any railway stock that may be ordered may be suitable for use when a uniform gauge is established. If we agreed to the proposal for the construction of the Transcontinental Railway, we should have to establish a Department of Railways. The new line would be controlled for 1,100 miles by the Federal Railway Department, whilst portions of the South Australian sections would be controlled by the authorities of that State, and the line from Fremantle to Kalgoorlie would be under the railway authorities of Western Australia. That is a state of affairs the possibility of which we should contemplate. It seems to me, therefore, that we might wisely defer projects of this sort until it has been decided that the Commonwealth shall take over the whole of the railways. Then we shall have power to unify their gauges, and to consolidate their management. Reference has been made to the correspondence upon this question which passed between two ex-Premiers of South Australia, namely, the present right honorable member for Adelaide and Mr. Speaker, and the Government of Western Australia. I certainly think that if either of those gentlemen were Premier of South Australia to-day he would be under a moral obligation to submit a Bill to its Parliament with a view to testing its feeling upon the question of granting permission to the Commonwealth to construct the suggested line through South Australian territory. I am sorry that that undertaking was given, but I know something of the circumstances, because I had a good deal to do with the correspondence which passed between the members of the Convention and several prominent public men in Western Australia, in reference to the adoption of the Constitution. To a great extent I had charge of the campaign in Western Australia in favour of the adoption of the Federal Constitution, and I know that some Perth people openly stated that, under Federation, South Australia would never consent to the construction of this line. I am also aware that in some quarters there a strong disinclination existed to enter the Federal union. Indeed, the Executive of the day was disinclined even to submit the Bill to the electors, and there was a strong suspicion abroad that this bogey regarding the disinclination of South Australia to consent to the construction of the suggested line was being held up to frighten the electors from voting in favour of union. Several letters were written to me, asking me to test the opinion of the present right honorable member for Adelaide and Mr. Speaker upon the point, and to ascertain if South Australia would be likely to block the construction of the line. The right honorable member for Adelaide, Mr. Speaker, and I, having tested the feeling of the people of that State, I wrote some letters, which appeared in the Western Australian newspapers, and which, I believe, had the effect of decreasing the opposition—which may or may not have been genuine—evidenced in some quarters against the Federal Constitution. We are aware that there was a strong disinclination on the part of the Western Australian Government to accede to the general desire of the people of that State, and to the almost unanimous desire of the residents of the goldfields, that the question of the adoption of the Constitution should be submitted to the electors.

Mr. MAHON.—The honorable and learned member admits that Western Australia was lured into Federation under false pretences.

Mr. GLYNN.—I do not believe that Western Australia was speaking as a unit then. I know that some of her public men stated that, unless they got a guarantee from South Australia, prior to the adoption of the Constitution, that the railway would be constructed, it would probably never become a reality. It was asserted, however, that that was not the genuine feeling of the people—that there was no anxiety that a guarantee should be given.

Mr. MAHON.—It is a pity that we did not get the guarantee, all the same.

Mr. GLYNN.—Guarantee or no guarantee, there was a moral obligation on the part of the right honorable member for Adelaide, and upon Mr. Speaker, to see that the voice of South Australia was expressed upon the point by its Parliament. I do not know that the present Premier of that State, Mr. Jenkins, ought not to test the feeling of the people there by submitting a Bill to the State Parliament. But there are difficulties in the way, and I will tell the honorable member for Coolgardie one of them.

Mr. MAHON.—The Port Darwin railway.

Mr. GLYNN.—That may operate as an objection, although I do not think that it does. Why, I ask, did we insert in the Constitution a provision setting out that the construction of any Transcontinental Railway by the Commonwealth should be subject to the consent of the States through which it would pass?

Mr. MAHON.—That provision does not apply solely to the construction of the transcontinental line?

Mr. GLYNN.—It was inserted to enable a State to say "Yes" or "No" to the construction of a line along a route which might prejudicially affect its interests. That is the obstacle which presents itself to our acquiring the consent of the South Australian Parliament to the construction of this line. Naturally, its Legislature desires to know the exact route which it will follow. Personally, if I had the opportunity, I would submit a Bill asking for the consent of that Parliament to the construction of the line, owing to the inducements which were held out to Western Australia by the right honorable member for Adelaide and Mr. Speaker, when they filled respectively the position of Premier of South Australia. Moreover, if the will of Australia were expressed in the Commonwealth Parliament, I hold that no State ought, if the route were a proper one, to dissent from the construction of this line. It is possible that it can be built even without the consent of South Australia. In America, inter-State lines can be constructed by Congress without the consent of the States. It has been held by some that the provision in our Constitution merely means that we cannot construct a purely State line without the consent of the State interested; that the Commonwealth has power not only to construct an inter-State line, but, with the consent of the State concerned, a State line. That deduction is based upon the assumption that eventually the construction of all lines will be vested in the Commonwealth Parliament. That is the opinion expressed by Professor Harrison Moore, in his work on the Constitution of Australia. I know that our power in this respect is doubtful, but I do not for a moment assume it is certain, that we could not construct a Transcontinental Railway without the consent of South Australia, especially in view of the opinion of such an eminent jurist as Professor Harrison Moore. At the same time, I do not think that the expenditure proposed is at present justifiable, and as it may be construed into an expression of opinion in favour of the line, I shall certainly oppose it.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I trust that this motion will not be regarded as an expression of opinion in favour of the proposed Transcontinental Railway. The whole purpose of the survey is to obtain sufficient data to enable us to determine whether or not the line should be constructed.

Mr. FOWLER.—In the experience of the honorable and learned member, does a railway invariably follow a survey?

Mr. CONROY.—I believe that in New South Wales about a couple of thousand miles have been surveyed, across which no railways are ever likely to be constructed. If I am asked to deal with this question from economic considerations only, I should say that there is not sufficient evidence before me to enable me to decide whether the proposed railway should be undertaken or not. The motion is intended to assist honorable members to arrive at an impartial opinion as to what ought to be done. But I will go further, and say that the expenditure of a very small sum of money, such as is proposed, ought cheerfully to be sanctioned, when we reflect that by our refusal to grant it, the people of Western Australia will feel they are not receiving that consideration to which they are entitled. It appears that before they joined the Federation, representations were made to them that this line would be constructed. In order to allay any feeling of irritation in that great State, we ought, therefore, to consent to the expenditure proposed. In dealing with the question of a Transcontinental Railway, I claim that we ought to have regard to something more than its purely economic aspect—we should regard it from a political and moral stand-point. We should view it politically, as bringing the States into closer relationship with one another, and morally as carrying out an implied promise. Although, economically speaking, it might be shown that just at present the construction of such a line would not be warranted by the immediate returns, there might be other advantages which would accrue from its construction, and which would outweigh the disadvantages. At the present time, however, we are merely asked to vote a sum of money to enable a survey of this line to be made. When we are called upon to determine whether or not the railway shall be constructed, we shall be able to weigh the economic advantages or disadvantages which would accrue from such an undertaking, and to consider them in connexion with the political gains to be derived from bringing the other side of the Continent into still closer communication with the eastern States.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth).—There is no doubt that a good deal of discussion upon this subject has been somewhat wide of the mark, inasmuch as we have heard considerable talk relating to the construction of the Transcontinental Railway rather than to the immediate survey of a route. At the same time, I recognise that we cannot, in reason, entirely exclude from a debate of this kind the question of the advisability or otherwise of constructing the suggested railway. I think it is necessary that a prima facie case should be established in favour of the construction of the line, even before a survey is undertaken. While I make that statement I admit that a survey does not necessarily bind this Parliament to build the railway. We have heard a great deal about the paucity of information regarding this project, and of the biased nature of the information which has been supplied to this Parliament by the representatives of Western Australia. I am quite willing to admit that the data furnished may not have been as ample as is necessary, and I am even prepared to concede that some of us may be biased in favour of this project. If that be so, I contend there is a still greater necessity for this Parliament to satisfy itself by an impartial inquiry as to whether the statements of the Western Australian representatives are accurate or otherwise. We could not ask this Parliament to adopt the motion if the construction of the railway appeared upon, the face of it to be an utterly wild-cat scheme. We must submit some evidence to justify the expenditure of this money. I think it has been shown that, in many respects, Western Australia has a claim upon the Federal Parliament for consideration. I do not say that she has any claim for special consideration, because it seems to me that the principle upon which we propose to act has been adopted in some of the legislation which we have already passed. It is said that the live question associated with the Federal campaign throughout Australia was the cry for a White Australia. I agree with that view; but, in making Australia white, we rendered a remarkably good service to Queensland—a service which the State itself could not have carried out so effectively. Western Australia is in this position: that she contended in connexion with the Federal campaign, that Federation meant to her not so much the question of a White Australia as the question of an Australia of any kind. Without this railway there is no Federation in any true sense of the word for Western Australia. She is isolated from the rest of the Commonwealth to as great an extent as is New Zealand at the present time. Even from the sentimental consideration, Western Australia is entitled to plead her cause on the floor of this House, with all the earnestness of which her representatives are capable.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Would the honorable member support the expenditure of £5,000,000 on a sentimental consideration?

Mr. FOWLER.—Not on a sentimental consideration alone, but I contend that the sentimental consideration which brought Western Australia into the Federation is one that should not be lightly ignored by the Federal Parliament. It is argued that the proposed railway would particularly benefit the western State. As a representative of the capital of Western Australia, I say without hesitation that the direct effect of the construction of this railway on the business interests of my electorate would be decidedly injurious. There are large numbers of persons in Perth and Fremantle, consisting chiefly of business people, who do not desire the railway. They enjoy a very pleasant monopoly of the trade of the gold-fields, all of which has to pass through their hands, and they realize that if the Transcontinental Railway were constructed, a material part of that trade would pass into the hands of merchants in the eastern States, and particularly of South Australia. To the gold-fields, the railway would undoubtedly be an advantage, because the present roundabout journey which has to be covered by goods and passengers would thus be rendered unnecessary. We are told that few passengers would travel by the overland route. I take it that nearly every person who wished to go to the eastern States from the gold-fields of Western Australia would undoubtedly travel by the direct overland route, because the total expenditure so incurred would be less than that to which those who use the existing roundabout means of communication are put. Time is wasted on the sea route, and hotel and other expenses are incurred that would be avoided by travelling on the Transcontinental line.

· Mr. PAGE.—If that be so, the steamers engaging in the trade between Fremantle and the eastern States will reduce their fares.

Mr. FOWLER.—It is very necessary that they should do so, because they are much higher than they should be. If the railway brings rates down to a normal level, it will even in that respect do some good. I listened with some surprise to the speech made by the honorable and learned member for Angas. I am unable to follow the honorable and learned member in the attitude which he takes up. He wishes us to understand that in some way or other, South Australia, while interested in the scheme, is yet afraid to touch it. It is to be regretted that this attitude of hesitation on the part of that State was so carefully concealed from Western Australia when she was being urged to enter the Federation. We had the most earnest promises of support and sympathy from the statesmen and the leading newspapers in South Australia, and, so far as I have been able to learn, not one warning voice was raised, as the honorable and learned member for Angas to-night suggested, with regard to the hesitation of South Australia to sanction the construction of this railway.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—But the line then was to be on the 3ft. 6in. gauge, and it was never proposed to take it to Sydney.

Mr. FOWLER.—There were no definite proposals then any more than there are at the present time; the wish was that the Federal Parliament should consider, as soon as possible, the construction of the line. The particular route to be traversed was to be left in abeyance until the Parliament actually dealt with the subject. I do not know of any difficulty which arose in regard to details, or that they were considered at a time probably so remote from the date when the railway would be constructed. I speak as one having some knowledge of the relations of South Australia with Western Australia at the time of the Federal campaign. I took a considerable share in the whole of that prolonged and arduous struggle in the western State, and towards the close of it was secretary for the Federal Executive of Western Australia; but it comes to me as a surprise to hear the honorable and learned member for Angas referring to difficulties which were never suggested to those interested in the Federal campaign in Western Australia. We have heard, on several occasions, of the attitude which was taken up by the right honorable member for Adelaide. Time and again he sent Western Australia the most emphatic messages indicating his enthusiastic support of the proposal now before us; but I do not intend to read those messages. Then again, we have the position taken up by Mr. Speaker, who was then Premier of South Australia, and who, in a letter with which I think most honorable members are now familiar, pledged the Government of that State to undertake the introduction of the necessary legislation to enable the railway to be constructed by the Federal Parliament. In addition to that, Senator Symon, in a letter addressed to the Hon. Walter James, on 27th June, 1900, and published in the Western Australian press, wrote as follows:—

Federation must inevitably give to Western Australia at a very early date the Transcontinental Railway line upon which your and our hearts are set. That will be one outward and visible link to join Western Australia with the rest of the Federating Colonies. In my belief, the acceptance of the Commonwealth Bill by Western Australia will mean the speedy inauguration of that work.

In glancing, almost at random, over the files of South Australian newspapers, I have come across some interesting statements. In the South Australian Register, of 20th February, 1889, we find the following comment on the action of Sir John Forrest, in holding out railway communication with the eastern States as an inducement to the western State to enter the Federation—

Regular communication by rail is an indispensable condition of complete federation, and this is one of the reasons which make it important that the whole Continent, and not a part of it, should be, from the first, included in the Commonwealth.

I have also an extract from an article published in the Adelaide Advertiser on 2nd August, 1900, immediately after the triumphant vote cast in favour of Federation by the people of Western Australia. In commenting on that vote the Advertiser wrote—

We have been unable to deny the justice of objections to some provisions of the national charter that particularly affect our neighbour on the West. . . . The omission of any definite pledge of a transcontinental railway connecting east and west has been undoubtedly a trial of faith. The Commonwealth is, in duty bound, to reward the confidence displayed in its sense of justice by according to Western Australia considerate, and even generous, treatment, and so shaping its policy as to justify abundantly her people's patriotic choice.

In view of these and a great many other public utterances and press statements, I fail to understand the attitude of the honorable and learned member for Angas, who now declares that there was some considerable hesitation on the part of the State of which he is a representative, and that some warning of it was given to Western Australia. Had that been so, I am perfectly certain that Western Australia would not have been in such a hurry to enter the Federation. As I have already said, the one material factor was the promised construction of this railway, enabling the sentimental consideration to which I have referred to take practical form. We have been asked why Western Australia does not build this railway for herself, seeing that she is so anxious to have it constructed. I wonder if the honorable member, who put that question, meant that Western Australia should run a line of railway into the middle of the desert, and leave it there; or did he think that, notwithstanding its present attitude, we were likely to obtain the permission of South Australia to run a railway in our own particular way through its territory? The suggestion that Western Australia should construct this line is absurd, and need scarcely be argued. This scheme will be of some benefit to Western Australia, but it will be equally beneficial to the eastern States. I do not know of any State that will not reap some advantage in the matter of communication with Europe. It will be of advantage to the people of Sydney to have their letters going backwards and forwards at several days' less interval than at present. Queensland will obtain a similar advantage.

Mr. TUDOR.—The saving would not be as much as two days.

Mr. KENNEDY.—If the object is to save time in the conveyance of letters to Europe, the line should go north.

Mr. FOWLER.—A much quicker delivery could be given along the proposed route than along any other route which is possible at the present time. A portion of a report by Major-General Hutton was read by the honorable member for Moira, but he omitted what to my mind was the most important part of it, and made it appear that the General Officer Commanding is unfavourable to the proposal. This is what Major-General Hutton wrote—

The contemplated extension of railway communication between Kalgoorlie in West Australia and Port Augusta in South Australia is, from a strategical and military point of view, of unquestionable value. The isolation of Western Australia without direct land communication with the other five States of Australia will, in time of war, cause a general feeling of insecurity. Under the existing circumstances, Western Australia, for purposes of co-operative military assistance from the other States, is as far distant from direct means of reinforcement as New Zealand is from the Eastern States of Australia.

In order, however, to correctly view the present construction of the railway in question as an important factor in the defence of the Commonwealth it will be well to consider the special importance of Western Australia in the eyes of foreign powers, and the description of attack to which Australia is subject, and to meet which intercommunication between the States by land must be regarded as of paramount value.

The potential wealth of the gold-fields and the vast extent of valuable and unoccupied land in the territories of Western Australia render the acquisition of that portion of the Australian Continent a most valuable prize to foreign nations.

A week or two ago I received from Western Australia a newspaper, containing an article with the somewhat sensational heading—

Spying out the land. Foreigners in Australia. The writer shows what has been happening in Western Australia, because of the free and easy British way in which foreigners are allowed to look about, and to do as they like, so long as they do not break the laws of the country—

Two years ago a German war vessel came here. The officers were shown everything, but the information they were given was not enough, so they sought it themselves. Every day that cruiser was at Fremantle boat parties were sent out exploring. One day they "did" the coast as far as Rockingham, examining the beach carefully, observing suitable landing places, taking bearings, soundings, and spying out the land generally. Next day the coast-line in the opposite direction was surveyed, and, to cap all, they then came into the Swan River, and were seen by dozens of people. One of these, an official high up in the Lands Department, actually saw them in Freshwater Bay taking bearings, sounding the channel, and sketching the river and the surrounding country. Nothing was said, and they departed with sufficient detailed information to be worked into useful war maps in Berlin.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—Could they not buy charts which would contain all that information?

Mr. FOWLER.—No, I do not think that it is available. The writer also mentioned the fact that two gentlemen have lately visited Western Australia, inquiring into our methods of land settlement and agriculture, and that they were discovered by the officers of the Department of Agriculture to have very little knowledge of the subject on which they professed to be experts, and were regarded by those with whom they came into contact as gentlemen who had some other important business on hand, which was to inquire into the resources of the country, and to make themselves acquainted with the conditions to be met with by an invading force. Those statements indicate the importance of Western Australia to the Commonwealth from a defence point of view. That State has the largest production of gold, and its territory comprises one-third of the whole continent. It is capable of supporting a tremendous population, and every month more land which is suitable for occupation is being discovered. During the last year or so millions of acres similar in character to the Darling Downs have been found in the north-west, in what was alleged to be desert country, and although much of Western Australia is regarded by some people as worthless, envious eyes are being cast upon it by foreign Powers. In conclusion, I would say that no honorable member who votes for a survey of the line need think that the people of Western Australia will regard him as pledged to vote for its construction. All we want this Parliament to do is to inquire carefully into the whole question. We admit that more inquiry is necessary, and if that inquiry turns out unfavorable, we shall be satisfied to wait until circumstances justify the carrying out of the work. It is remarkable, however, that nearly every honorable member who has visited Western Australia recognises the need for this railway. We had several visitors there some time ago, all of whom said that they had not before even imagined the potentialities of the State to be what they are. I do not think that the motion is likely to be defeated, but if it is, we shall only have to induce a few more honorable members to visit the State in order to secure later on an overwhelming majority. In spite of some display of provincialism, I hope that the true Federal spirit, which has been so much in evidence in this Parliament, will to-night operate in a way which will gladden the hearts of the people of Western Australia, and encourage them to remain faithful to the Federation which they entered in the hope that their interest would be safeguarded. That hope I, for one, continue to entertain.

Mr. McWILLIAMS (Franklin).—I am sorry that I cannot support the motion, because I know how earnest the representatives of Western Australia are in regard to this matter, and I have a great deal of sympathy with them. But I agree with the honorable member for Bass that the proper course for Western Australia to take is to make this survey, and, having proved that the line can be constructed, that it would pass through good land, and that a railway, if made, would pay something like working expenses and interest on cost of construction, they would be able to present a much better case to the House. No doubt the people of Western Australia have to some extent been misled in regard to this matter, though not by the Federal authorities. If the Federal Parliament sets itself to carry into effect all the fairy tales which were told in the States in support of Federation prior to the referendum being taken, it will have a very extensive order to fill. In Tasmania all sorts of ridiculous statements were made as to the results of Federation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Commonwealth has to pay for an improved steamship communication with Tasmania.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—I am reminded by the right honorable member for Swan that the Federal Government, by giving a larger mail subsidy, has improved the communication between Melbourne and Tasmania; but I, for one, never advocated the granting of that subsidy, nor am I prepared to say that I would have advocated it had I been a member of this House when it was proposed. Most of the States are at present financially embarrassed, and some of the States Parliaments are imposing heavy direct taxation to make up the balance lost to the State Treasurers through Federation. This is, therefore, not the time to ask States which have made great sacrifices for Federation, to pay for a railway from which they will get no direct benefit. To my mind, the matter is purely a State one, and, seeing that the main arteries of communication in Queensland, New South Wales, Victoria, and a great part of South Australia have been constructed at the expense of the States concerned, it would be absurd to dove-tail in a small length of Commonwealth line.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not a small length.

Mr. McWILLIAMS.—The length is far too big. I believe that the proposed railway would confer enormous advantage upon Western Australia and South Australia, and as Tasmania, Queensland, New South Wales, and Victoria have built their railways out of State funds, Western Australia and South Australia ought to accept the responsibility of building their own. If members like myself, who do not intend to vote for the construction of the railway, consented to the survey, we should mislead the people of the Western State, and perhaps lead people to purchase land along the proposed route. If we do not intend to construct the railway, the money spent upon the survey will be practically thrown away. We have no money to spare for such a purpose at present. I believe that at the end of the current financial year the States will receive very little more than the amount which we are compelled under the Constitution to return to them. When once we reach the end of our tether, so far as the money available out of the Customs revenue is concerned, we shall have to face the imposition of direct taxation upon the people of the Commonwealth, and I am not prepared to consider any such proposals at present. I hope, further, that the Commonwealth will not be under the necessity of entering upon a policy of borrowing for many years to come. I should not be willing to borrow money, except for some very urgent and essential work, from which the Commonwealth would receive a very large direct or indirect benefit. Under these circumstances, I regret that I shall have to vote against the proposal.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—I think that the subject has now been pretty well discussed from both points of view. The honorable members representing Western Australia, whilst they have naturally shown a great deal of earnestness in addressing their arguments to the Committee, have adduced very weighty reasons why we should accept this proposal. I have so often expressed my views in favour of this project that I do not propose to detain the Committee on the present occasion. I simply wish to say that, although I have taken up this Bill as the third in the line of succession, I have done so with the sincere desire to see this work become an accomplished fact. Of course, we must not disguise from ourselves the obvious truth that a number of honorable members who are voting with us on this occasion, reserve to themselves the right to review their position if the result of this survey is discouraging to the project. I think that no honorable member can quarrel with them for taking up that attitude, because it is a perfectly fair one to assume. I hope that this preliminary step will be taken, and I think that there is a great deal of value in the suggestion of the honorable member for Newcastle that this survey should be the occasion also for some geological inquiry, and some sort of prospecting as to the mineral resources of the enormous tract of country affected. We know that, while it is not very difficult to discover whether or not soil is suitable for agriculture, the richest discoveries of mineral wealth have been made in the most unlovely and most unpromising localities. We have many instances of that. We need only remember such mines as those at Broken Hill and White Cliffs in New South Wales, and also some of the mines in Western Australia. In the most barren wastes may lurk untold wealth, and this piercing of the Continent, even by means of a survey, may lead to the most valuable discoveries, and bring to the Commonwealth a very large return. To my mind, one of the most pleasant features of this proposal is that it is at least an attempt to make some sort of recognition of what was an absolutely certain understanding—so far as the men in authority in that day could enter into one. My friend, the right honorable member for Swan, pressed this matter upon the Premiers, and he might have pressed it upon them much more pointedly than he did. He might easily, I believe, have made the construction of the railway a condition of the attachment of Western Australia to the Federal union. But instead of that, he trusted to assurances which, I confess, do not bind honorable members here. I should be very sorry to say that they did bind honorable members, except to the extent that the men in authority who represented the States became parties to a great national compact such as this undoubtedly is. I think every honorable member desires, so far as he conscientiously can, to give effect to such an understanding.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Every honorable member should adhere to his own policy, anyhow.

Mr. REID.—I have always felt, in regard to this matter, a very strong obligation. As I say, it must not be pushed too far. As the honorable member for Barker has said, we cannot spend millions upon sentiment; but I base my support of this project upon the practical ground that I believe it will turn out to be a really great, useful, national work. As the honorable member for Fremantle has suggested, I received a very short time ago a telegram from the Premier of Western Australia, which confirms the statement made by his predecessor in the telegram of the 18th May last, to the effect that Western Australia will be prepared for ten years after the line is constructed to bear its share of any loss in excess of the contribution that would be due from that State upon a population basis. Therefore, the present Premier of Western Australia continues the undertaking that was given by his predecessor, and I think that we must all admit that the great and progressive population over in Western Australia have shown a desire to back their opinions by making a considerable sacrifice. Under these circumstances, I sincerely trust that the Committee will agree to the motion.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I expected that the Prime Minister would give us some outline of the promises that were made by himself and others at the Federal Conventions, and during the Federal campaign. The right honorable member for Swan states that he was clearly given to understand by the Premiers of the other States that if Western Australia consented to enter the Federation the Transcontinental Railway line would be constructed. The Prime Minister has indicated that some promise of that kind was given, and that he feels under an obligation to carry it out. The debate has indicated to me that the anti-Billites did not overstate the case when they represented that the Federal movement was being engineered by a few men who were running it upon a system of barter; that each State was being invited to come into the Federation, not in any broad spirit of union or brotherhood, but with a view to derive some special benefit that was promised by those who were at the head of the movement. The right honorable member for Swan has indicated how strongly he was impressed by the promises then made, and he stated that if an undertaking had not been given that the proposed railway would be built, Western Australia would never have entered the Union. Now the Prime Minister tells us that if the right honorable member for Swan had desired the Premiers of the other States to enter into a distinct compact, they would probably have acceded to his request. I quite believe that they would have gone to any length in order to bring about the Federation, that they would have given Western Australia all that she desired, and that they would have proceeded even further than they did, in order to meet any objections on the part of Queensland.

Sir LANGDON BONYTHON.—The South Australian promise was made subject to the approval of Parliament.

Mr. MAHON.—There was not a word about that in the communications sent by Sir Frederick Holder and the right honorable member for Adelaide.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The right honorable member for Adelaide has been represented as having pleaded with Western Australia to join the Federation, and as having given a distinct assurance that the railway would be built. It is also alleged that the Prime Minister made a promise of a similar character. It would probably be difficult to ascertain how many persons were out with fishing lines endeavouring to hook Western Australia into the Federation. No doubt the right honorable member for Swan would require a very distinct promise upon the subject, and he has stated that if the proposed railway is not built, Western Australia will reconsider its position so far as the Commonwealth is concerned. Personally, I think that that State is deriving more benefits from Federation than were ever anticipated by the strongest advocates of the movement. I listened very carefully to the right honorable member for Swan, whom I regard as a good judge, of country, but he failed to give us any assurance that the territory through which the line would pass would be of a character calculated to provide traffic for a railway, or likely to prove capable of any appreciable development. Certainly, there is no prospect of the railway paying the interest on the cost of its construction. Furthermore, we have no information as to the extent to which water will be available along the proposed route. I have listened to the debate very attentively, and I unhesitatingly affirm that no representative of Western Australia has submitted any evidence to show that the country through which the projected line would pass possesses any productive value. No attempt has been made to prove that it possesses a reasonable rainfall, or that it can be artificially supplied with water. I do not propose to detain the Committee at any greater length. Boiled down, the position seems to be, "Is the railway a necessity?" As far as development is concerned, I do not think that it is a necessity. From a defence stand-point, however—quite apart from the compact which it is urged was entered into with Western Australia prior to the accomplishment of Federation—I feel bound to support the proposed expenditure of £20,000. I recognise that a stitch in time saves nine, and, seeing that in years to come we are likely to be threatened with difficulties which will puzzle the most astute statesmen, I claim that we should at least put our house in order. The defence of Australia cannot be effectually undertaken under conditions as they exist to-day. It is necessary to connect Western Australia with the eastern States in order to guarantee a proper line of defence for this continent in the future. From that stand-point I shall support the motion, without committing myself in any way to advocate the construction of the railway should the report of the surveyor be adverse to it. I think that the suggestion which has been thrown out by the honorable member for Newcastle is an admirable one. If any evidence were forthcoming as to the existence of mineral wealth along the route of the suggested railway, it might secure for that undertaking an acquiescence which would not otherwise be given.

Question—That the motion be agreed to—put. The Committee divided.

Question so resolved in the affirmative.
Resolution reported and adopted.

Ordered—

That Mr. Dugald Thomson do prepare a bill to bring in the Bill.

Bill presented and read a first time.

PAPUA (BRITISH NEW GUINEA) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Prime Minister).—I move—

That the Bill be now read a second time.

This measure has been before the present Parliament and the late Parliament for a very long time, and I shall be very glad if we can dispose of it as soon as possible. On the 12th November, 1901, the late Parliament resolved to accept the control of this Territory, and the measure which is now under consideration was introduced in consequence of the approval then declared by the House. Its provisions were discussed upon a former occasion. It passed through Committee, and was reported to the House. Its clauses are therefore thoroughly familiar to the honorable members, and I shall consequently content myself with submitting the motion in favour of its second reading.

Question resolved in the affirmative.
Bill read a second time.

In Committee:

Clauses 1 to 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 (Office of Lieutenant-Governor).

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—We have now reached the machinery provisions of the Bill. Although the measure was dealt with in the last Parliament, we have to remember that there are several members of the House to whom it is new, and that on the last occasion the information at our disposal was somewhat limited. That being so, I think it would be advisable for the Government to postpone the consideration of this and the succeeding clauses of this part of the Bill until the next day of sitting, so that we may have an opportunity to consider whether any amendments are necessary.

Mr. REID.—I should like to say to my honorable friend, that, so far as I can see, there is no possible objection to these clauses. Although they are important, in one sense, they are absolutely unavoidable. We must have a Lieutenant-Governor of the Territory, but this clause does not involve the question of his salary. That matter is dealt with in another part of the Bill. This is a form of machinery similar to that adopted in dealing with territories of all kinds in the British Empire. There is nothing new in it. It has been tested for many years in the administration of Crown Colonies, and it is really very important that we should proceed with business. When we reach any clause which honorable members consider to be open to discussion, or to present any difficulty, I shall be happy to postpone it if requested to do so. We may just as well deal with these clauses, to which, I am sure, there will be no objection.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—There are a number of clauses in this part of the Bill to which I do not take exception, but when we reach the clause dealing with the Executive Council and its powers—

Mr. REID.—I shall be prepared to postpone that clause.

Mr. BROWN.—There is also a clause dealing with the question of land tenure—

Mr. REID.—I shall be prepared to postpone that or any other clause, the consideration of which honorable members express a desire to defer.

Mr. MAUGER (Melbourne Ports).—I intend to propose a new clause of very great importance, with regard to the prohibition of intoxicants and opium, and I trust that the Prime Minister will consent to its consideration being deferred until to-morrow.

Mr. REID.—It cannot be dealt with at this stage.

The CHAIRMAN.—A proposed new clause cannot be dealt with until the Committee has disposed of the clauses in the Bill.

Mr. MAUGER.—I am aware of that.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 to 16 agreed to.

Clause 17 (Appointment of officers).

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—It has been pointed out by a number of residents of British New Guinea that the appointment of honorary magistrates in the Territory has not been so satisfactory as it might have been. Those who know the country well state that many of the diggers have been unable to secure the appointment of magistrates whom they consider worthy of selection and that the rule which in this respect usually prevails on the mainland, has not been followed. Very strong representations have been made to myself and other honorable members that the honorary magistracy of the Territory has not been recruited in the most desirable way. The clause now before us would enable the Lieutenant-Governor to continue the practice which has prevailed in the Territory, and which does not meet with the approval of the white settlers, especially of the gold diggers. I suggest that if a man is nominated, at a large meeting of diggers, for appointment to the magistracy, that fact should be a strong recommendation to the Lieutenant-Governor. There should be no select class appointed to this office—an office which is very important in a country where so few honorary magistrates are to be found. It has been alleged, however, that appointments to the magistracy have been made solely from a class which is practically a privileged class. I am sure that we have no desire to see that practice continued, and as the complaint which I make comes from a source that I believe to be entirely reliable, I trust that it will receive consideration.

Mr. REID.—I promise the honorable member that I shall bring the remarks made by him under the notice of the present Administrator, and that I shall obtain a report from him. I think that would be the most effective way to give effect to that which the honorable member desires.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 18 and 19 agreed to.

Clause 20 (Power to grant land).

Mr. REID.—This clause was inserted in the Bill, as introduced by the Barton Government, by the decision of an enormous majority of the House, and I do not propose to suggest that it be altered. As the Territory to which this Bill will apply is so new, I think that no harm will be done, certainly for some time to come, in giving effect to this clause.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 21 and 22 agreed to.

Clause 23 (Meetings of Executive Council).

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—I wish to secure some information in regard to this clause. It appears to me that it would give too wide a power to the Lieutenant-Governor. He is to constitute practically the whole Administration. He will have power to appoint all the officers, to classify them as to seniority, and to dismiss them at his own sweet will. I do not think that is a power which we should grant, more especially having regard to the history of government in some Crown Colonies.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is proposed to give the Lieutenant-Governor power to suspend, not to dismiss any officer.

Mr. KENNEDY.—He is to be both prosecutor and judge. I should like the Prime Minister to consider the desirability of postponing this clause. It was subjected to some discussion when the Bill was before us on a previous occasion, and I think that, although no definite action was taken, some very strong opinions were expressed in regard to the powers proposed to be conferred on the Lieutenant-Governor.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Its provisions are similar to those which prevail in relation to other Crown Colonies.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Clauses 21 and 22, which have been dealt with, are, perhaps, the most important. It seems to me that this series of clauses should have been postponed.

Mr. REID.—Clauses 21 and 22 have already been passed, but I am prepared to postpone clause 23.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan).—I fail to see why this clause should be postponed. It covers a practice which is followed in every State in the Commonwealth, as well as in the Commonwealth itself. My only objection to this part of the Bill is that it relates to matters which should be dealt with, not in the measure itself, but by regulations. The Letters Patent and the Royal Instructions to Governors deal with all these matters. We propose to provide in the Bill itself that there shall be meetings of the Executive Council, and that a certain person shall preside at those meetings, while various other matters that are really governed by the instructions issued by the Crown to all Governors in the British Dominions, are also provided for. The clause embodies nothing that is new, and I cannot, therefore, see any reason for postponing it.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—I think that the whole of these clauses should be postponed, so that there may be a fair discussion of them. It is not right to those who are developing New Guinea that we should rush the Bill through as we are doing.

Mr. McCAY.—All these clauses were passed by the last Parliament.

Mr. McDONALD.—I admit that; but since then further information has been obtained. I think that the Executive Council has been a blot on the Administration of New Guinea. Evidence which has been forthcoming during the last few months shows how lax the administration under the old system has been, and it is proposed to perpetuate it by appointing to the Executive Council officers who are practically interested in covering up the abuses which have taken place.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is a similar provision in the Constitution of every Crown Colony.

Mr. McDONALD.—That is no reason why we should apply it to New Guinea. I have come into contact with a good many of those who are helping to develop the country. Most of those who go there come back with their health shattered, and are of little use afterwards.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member is not speaking of the members of the Executive Council, I hope.

Mr. McDONALD.—I am speaking of those who make it possible for the Government officials to draw big salaries in administering the Territory. At the present time the miners who are developing the country have no "say" in its management.

The CHAIRMAN.—The question is whether the clause shall be postponed, and the Prime Minister has agreed to its postponement.

Mr. McDONALD.—I desire to obtain from the Prime Minister the assurance that the clauses dealing with the Executive Council will be recommitted, since they were rushed through at such a rate that no one could follow what was being done. The honorable member for Moira is to be congratulated for giving us an opportunity to think about what we are doing. In my opinion, those who are engaged in developing New Guinea should be represented on the Executive Council, and, I think, therefore, that the method of appointing that Council should be altered. Will the Prime Minister give an opportunity for the recommitment of the clauses to which I refer?

Mr. REID.—Certainly.

Mr. McDONALD.—Will he agree to the recommitment of clauses 21 and 22?

Mr. REID.—Certainly.

Clause postponed.

Clauses 24 and 25 agreed to.

Clause 26—

The Lieutenant-Governor only shall be entitled to submit questions to the Executive Council for advice or decision; but if the Lieutenant-Governor declines to submit any question to the Council when requested in writing by any member so to do, that member may require that his written request, together with the answer of the Lieutenant-Governor thereto, be recorded on the minutes.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—I wish to know what the Prime Minister thinks of the wording of this clause.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What is provided in the clause is a rule in connexion with the government of every Crown Colony.

Mr. FISHER.—New Guinea, under the Administration of the Commonwealth, will not be a Crown Colony. We should, therefore, see that things are done as we wish them to be done. It has been alleged—I do not know with what truth—that the records of some of the judicial decisions arrived at in New Guinea, which are of great importance to certain persons, cannot be found. Therefore, I ask, what is the use of requiring the Lieutenant-Governor to record his answer to a written request, if the records are to be subsequently lost? If the Prime Minister is able to tell me that the records of judicial transactions have hitherto been kept, I shall be very glad to hear it. I should like his assurance that they have been properly kept and safely housed.

The CHAIRMAN.—We are dealing now with the recording of the answers of the Lieutenant-Governor to questions submitted in writing by any member of the Executive Council, not with judicial records.

Mr. FISHER.—May I point out that the highest court of appeal is in some cases the Executive Council?

The CHAIRMAN.—The keeping of minutes of the proceedings of meetings of the Executive Council is provided for in clause 25, which we have passed.

Mr. FISHER.—Cases involving capital punishment must come before the Executive Council, and therefore the decisions of that body will at times be the decisions of a Court. It is alleged that certain judicial records have been lost, and I wish to know from the Prime Minister whether that statement is correct. A case involving capital punishment must come before the Council, and the Lieutenant-Governor might decline to submit to the Council a question in regard to it. The answer to the request for the submission of a question must be recorded in the minutes, and would be virtually a judicial record. Would the Prime Minister be surprised to know that there are at present in Australia men who have been twice charged in New Guinea with murder, and with other crimes, who are, nevertheless, respectable individuals? It is alleged, however, that the records of the judicial proceedings in their cases cannot be found, so that it is impossible for them to be used to prove that they are not guilty. In dealing with a Territory so far removed from the Seat of Government as New Guinea is, we should take every precaution, and I ask the Prime Minister to see that attention is paid to this matter.

Mr. REID.—The minutes referred to in the clause would not be judicial minutes. In reply to what the honorable member has said about the destruction of records, I would point out that we are now beginning a new state of things, and that the confusion which has existed in the past will not continue. I cannot be responsible for what has occurred in the past, but we shall have control over the future administration of the Territory, and so long as the new minutes are properly kept I think that all that is necessary will be done.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Will the Prime Minister allow any clauses to which honorable members take exception to be recommitted?

Mr. REID.—Certainly. I have no desire to push the Bill through too rapidly. I will give every facility for recommitment to any honorable member who, on reconsideration, sees any need for asking for it.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 27 (Lieutenant-Governor may act in opposition to advice?)

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—This clause provides that if the Lieutenant-Governor acts in opposition to the advice of the Executive Council he shall forthwith report the matter to the Minister. Should he not rather report to the Governor-General?

Mr. GLYNN (Angas).—If the appointments were by letters patent, the proper course would be for the Lieutenant-Governor to report to the Governor-General; but as the appointment will be made under Statute, the proper person to report to will be the Minister.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 28 (Legislative Council).

Mr. KENNEDY (Moir).—I understand that there is likely to be a considerable discussion on this clause, and I desire before its consideration is postponed, to indicate the nature of an amendment I propose to move. The clause at present provides that the Legislative Council shall consist of the Lieutenant-Governor and the members of the Executive Council, together with such non-official members as the Governor-General appoints. I desire to move an amendment, which will have the effect of making the Council partly elective. Instead of the non-official members being appointed by the Governor-General, I propose that they shall be elected by the white residents of the Territory.

Mr. REID.—I shall endeavour to obtain more or less correct information as to the number of white persons in British New Guinea, and as to how they are distributed over the Territory. They might be so scattered that it would be difficult to bring into operation a provision such as the honorable member suggests. However, I shall endeavour to ascertain whether it is practicable to carry out his idea.

Clause postponed.

Clause 29—

The presence of at least three members of the Legislative Council (including the Lieutenant-Governor or the member presiding) shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the Council for the exercise of its powers.

Mr. G. B. EDWARDS (South Sydney).—I move—

That the word "three" be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "one-third of the."

The clause as it stands would doubtless prove sufficient to meet the present circumstances, but it makes no provision for the expansion of the Legislative Council the appointment of non-official members. The Council might consist of six members of the Executive Council, and twelve other members, making a total of eighteen, and in such a case a quorum of three would not be sufficiently large.

Mr. REID.—I do not object to the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 30 to 35 agreed to.

Clause 36 postponed.

Clauses 37 to 39 agreed to.

Clause 40 postponed.

Clauses 41 to 47 agreed to.

Clause 48—

There shall be payable in every year out of the revenues of the Territory, which to that extent are hereby appropriated accordingly, the sum of £1,250 for the salary of the Lieutenant-Governor, and the sum of £1,000 for the salary of the Chief Judicial Officer of the Territory.

Mr. CONROY (Werriwa).—I do not think that the salaries set down for the Lieutenant-Governor and the chief judicial officer of the Territory are sufficiently large. The administrative duties which will fall to both these officers will be of a different character, and as the climate is very unhealthy, I do not think that we can expect men of high qualifications to accept the positions unless we are prepared to pay them substantial salaries.

Mr. CROUCH.—Did not an Acting District Court Judge in New South Wales accept an appointment as Administrator of New Guinea?

Mr. CONROY.—Yes, but Acting Judge Murray happened to be a man of an adventurous spirit, and I do not think that our selection should be limited in connexion with appointments of this kind. The salaries provided for in the clause are very small when we compare them with those which are earned by professional men, bank managers, and others holding similar responsible positions. Under the circumstances, I ask the Committee to consider whether we are paying a salary which is commensurate with the dignity of the office. I submit that we are not. In our craze for economy we are practising a false economy. Of course, if we intend to provide for the payment of a pension in case of retirement as the result of illness, that fact might reasonably be taken into consideration in fixing the salaries of these officers; but in the absence of such a provision, I should like to see the amount raised to not less than £2,000 per annum for the Lieutenant-Governor and £1,500 for the Chief Judicial Officer.

Mr. REID.—I would point out that the position of Chief Judicial Officer was recently filled at the salary named in the Bill, and that there were a very large number of competent applicants for it—men of great ability, who were thoroughly fitted to discharge the duties of the office. The present appointment was made at £1,000 per annum. In the face of a test of that character in the open market, I hold that we are not called upon to increase the salary. Of course there may be some allowances made in connexion with the appointment, and probably these will make up the difference. The Bill simply fixes the salary which is to be paid, and I could not see my way clear to increase an amount which has been fixed so deliberately.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I wish to draw attention to the fact that this clause contains the first reference in the Bill to the Chief Judicial Officer. In the case of a Crown Colony, that position is almost equal to the office of Lieutenant-Governor. Consequently it is only right that the position should be defined by Parliament. The Bill contains no reference to the appointment of the Chief Judicial Officer, or to his taking the oaths of office. The schedule simply refers to the oath of allegiance and service by the Lieutenant-Governor. The Chief Judicial Officer is not called upon to take a proper oath, such as should be provided to maintain the dignity of his office, and to keep him independent of the Executive power—a very necessary thing in a Crown Colony. I should like the Prime Minister to consider this matter.

Mr. REID.—I shall do so.

ADJOURNMENT.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS.

Motion (by Mr. REID) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro).—As I understand that the Prime Minister has already consented to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the question of old-age pensions, I desire to ask him whether he can see his way clear to give the motion dealing with that matter precedence upon the business-paper to-morrow, so that we may get to work without delay.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—I shall be only too happy to do so, to the extent of any power that I have in the matter.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.27 p.m.

Senate.

Thursday, 15 September, 1904.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Senator DOBSON.—I beg to ask the Attorney-General, without notice, first, whether Ministers have satisfied themselves by expert evidence that £20,000 is a sufficient sum to provide for a proper survey of the proposed transcontinental railway route; second, is it the intention of the survey party to obtain evidence as to the character of the country which the proposed railway will traverse, and if so will that evidence be obtained by the surveyors or by an officer specially appointed to accompany them; and, third, in view of the information which will be obtained by the two States interested, ought not those States, in the opinion of the Minister, to bear a portion of the cost?

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — I scarcely think the honorable and learned senator can expect me to answer his questions off-hand, and, therefore, I ask him to give notice of them.

MILITARY FORCES: GENERAL OFFICER COMMANDING.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I move—

That there be laid on the table of this Senate copies of the minute or minutes stated to have been written by the late Minister of State for Defence, Senator Dawson, reflecting upon the conduct of the General Officer Commanding the Military Forces of the Commonwealth, together with any replies thereto.

The motion of which I originally gave notice asked for the production of the minutes—

... "stated in the press to have been written by the Minister of State for Defence, reflecting upon any alleged unsatisfactory insubordinate conduct of the General Officer Commanding the Military Forces of the Commonwealth."

I ask the Senate to allow me to alter the terms of the motion, which, in the first place, was prepared rather hurriedly with a newspaper statement at my elbow.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—What are the reasons for the motion?

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—It is not usual to give reasons for a motion of this kind.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—It is usual unless the motion is formal.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I think the terms of the motion sufficiently indicate the reason for its submission. I might add, perhaps, that certain alleged documents have appeared in the press, and it is desirable, in a matter of importance as affecting the public interests, that there should be no garbled representation of correspondence. As part of the correspondence has been made public it is only fair that the whole should be produced.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia—Attorney-General). — Honorable senators will agree with me that it would be scarcely fair, either to the Senate or to the General Officer Commanding, that the motion should be passed in the terms proposed. Senator Neild has very properly—if he will allow me to say so—modified the terms in which the motion first appeared on the notice-paper, terms which, indirectly at any rate, committed the Senate to an opinion on the conduct of an officer before being placed in possession of material on which to base a judgment. But while the motion, as now submitted, reduces the objection on that score, it is scarcely fair to ask the Senate to express an opinion about some memorandum which is unknown to the general body of senators, so far as concerns its effect in reflecting—a term which conveys an injurious imputation—on the General Officer Commanding, until we have an opportunity to know its contents. The usual course might, I think, very well have been adopted; and with a view to assisting Senator Neild, I suggest that the motion should simply ask for the production of a document which can be identified by its date, without conveying any imputation, or committing the Senate to any opinion. The amendment I am about to submit was, I understand, communicated to Senator Neild by Senator Drake. I have not read the memorandum referred to, and, therefore, I am not in a position to say whether or not it reflects on the General Officer Commanding. If my amendment be adopted, any other papers connected with the matter can be laid upon the table, if the Senate desires. I move—

The the words "reflecting upon the conduct of" be left out, with a view to insert in lieu thereof the words "upon leaving office, dated 18th August, 1904, in relation to."

The inference as to any reflection is one which we may or may not draw, but certainly it is an inference we ought not to place on the records of the Senate, until we have had an opportunity to see the document. I am sure that neither the late Minister of Defence nor any honorable senator would desire to say that a document reflects upon any one until it is shown that it does so reflect.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—The statement is only that such a document is alleged to have been written.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—But the motion indirectly places it on the records of the Senate that there is a document which is alleged to reflect on the General Officer Commanding. We ought to be ready to condemn when condemnation is necessary, but slow to convey, even indirectly, an imputation in respect to any officer, until we have had an opportunity to consider whether or not the allegation is borne out. The Government have no objection to lay this document and the reply upon the table.

Senator DAWSON (Queensland).—I have absolutely no objection to every document to which I, as Minister, put my signature, or any reply sent by the General Officer Commanding, being laid upon the table of the Senate for the inspection of honorable senators. I understand, however, that what Senator Neild wants is not only the particular memorandum which was published in the press, but other minutes which passed between the General Officer Commanding and myself during my term of office.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—Hear, hear!

Senator DAWSON.—If that be so, the amendment of the Attorney-General will not meet the case.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—The other documents may be asked for afterwards.

Senator DAWSON.—The memorandum, I may say, is a kind of valedictory document. The practice of leaving such memoranda was initiated by Sir John Forrest, and followed by Mr. Chapman. I fell in with the idea, with the difference that I stated what I believed to be the absolute truth.

Senator BEST.—Therefore the others did not!

Senator DAWSON.—I certainly do not think they did.

The PRESIDENT.—I do not think the honorable senator ought to say that Ministers of the Crown say what is not true.

Senator DAWSON.—Well, I say that, knowing the relations which existed between one branch of the Defence Department and the other, and having the opportunity to read those valedictory memoranda, I came to the determination that I would not write one similar. I am prepared to defend the memorandum I left behind. It has appeared in the press, but only one newspaper published the full text, and I shall be very pleased indeed to see the document laid upon the table of the Senate for the perusal of honorable senators. There are other documents which Senator Neild, if he chooses, can move for one at a time, but that course would only prolong the agony. Personally, I have not the slightest objection to the whole of the correspondence being laid on the table.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I suggest that the amendment be altered to provide for the production of all the correspondence between the late Minister of Defence and the General Officer Commanding concerning Major Lenehan, the pistol pattern, the secret code, and the relations of the late Minister of Defence with the Department. Those documents would be very interesting to the Senate, and instructive to the public, judging by the portions which have already appeared in the daily press.

Senator DAWSON.—In an emasculated form.

Senator HIGGS.—As Senator Dawson observes, the documents have been published in an emasculated form, and in order to avoid waste of time, I suggest that the amendment be altered in the direction indicated. Will the Attorney-General accept the suggested addition of words?

The PRESIDENT.—I think the suggestion amounts to more than the addition of words, and that it would be necessary for the Attorney-General to withdraw his amendment.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia—Attorney-General).—I should be very glad if Senator Higgs would give me an opportunity to consider his suggestion, and not press me to accept it at this moment. My opinion is that we ought to pass the motion as proposed to be amended, and on a subsequent occasion, move for the production of other papers, if that be desired. That, as I say, will give me an opportunity to consider these matters, of which, of course, I know nothing, because they were not indicated when the motion was submitted.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—I should be quite willing to withdraw my motion in favour of the amendment suggested by Senator Higgs.

Senator HIGGS (Queensland).—I fall in with the suggestion of the Attorney-General, on the understanding that the honorable and learned senator feels quite assured that he will have sufficient time to go into these matters.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD (New South Wales).—I desire to say that I at once accept the amendment moved by the Attorney-General, because I see that the honorable and learned senator has taken an exception to the motion which others might take. I still think that what I intended might be covered by the word "stated," and the motion might be read in that way.

Senator DAWSON.—In any case the motion might mean a reflection on my part.

Senator Lt.-Col. NEILD.—When the Attorney-General places such an interpretation on the motion, I recognise at once that it may be read in more ways than one. As it is my desire to move for the production of the papers, and not to attempt in doing so to pass any reflection upon the Minister or General Officer Commanding, I am prepared to accept the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Question, as amended, resolved in the affirmative.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

WANT OF CONFIDENCE MOTION.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON (South Australia—Attorney-General).—I have at this moment received an official intimation that notice of a motion of want of confidence in the Administration of which I have the honour to be a member has been tabled in the House of Representatives. In view of that circumstance, and in accordance with the precedent established by the Senate in 1901—

Senator DAWSON.—And all parliamentary practice.

Senator HIGGS.—Why should we pay any attention to the proceedings of the House of Representatives when they pay no attention to ours?

Senator BEST.—To conserve our own dignity.

Senator HIGGS.—We have passed motions of want of confidence in the Government before to-day, of which no notice has been taken by the House of Representatives.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—Giving due weight to what my honorable friend Senator Higgs has said, I move—

That the Senate at its rising adjourn until Wednesday, 28th September.

Senator GIVENS (Queensland).—I have always taken exception to these frequent adjournments of the Senate. I take special exception to an adjournment on this occasion, because, even if it be undesirable to go on with Government business, the leader of the Government in the Senate might have delayed his motion until private members' business had been considered this afternoon. We have had many adjournments while waiting for business to come from the House of Representatives, and now, when we have plenty of business before us, we should go on with it.

Senator GUTHRIE. — We cannot go on without the Government.

Senator GIVENS.—We could very soon get another in place of it. The fact remains that we have now been about six months in session, and that we have practically done no work.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON. — Hear, hear.

Senator GIVENS. — The proposed adjournment is not likely to make our record any better. Many honorable senators have come a very long way to attend to public business, and these frequent adjournments are entirely unfair to them. I enter my protest, and shall push it to the length of calling for a division on the motion.

Question put. The Senate divided.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 15 September, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CAMERON.—I desire, with the permission of the House, to make a personal explanation. My reason for doing so is that I do not wish that any vote which I may give upon a future occasion shall be taken to have been affected by the attitude of the Argus towards me. In a leading article that newspaper states that my appearance on the Opposition side of the Chamber would have caused intense interest had it not been for the fact that it was known that my personal disappointment because I was not included in the present Administration had been very great. To prove that that statement is absolutely incorrect, I should like to lay a few plain facts before the House. I saw the then leader of the Opposition, the right honorable member for East Sydney, on the day after the Deakin Government were defeated, and had a little conversation with him.

Mr. CROUCH.—What was the conversation?

Mr. CAMERON.—It is not necessary to repeat it.

Mr. REID.—I rise to order. I ask whether the honorable member will be in order, in correcting some statement which has appeared in a newspaper, in entering upon a narrative about other matters.

Mr. PAGE.—Of what is the right honorable member afraid?

Mr. REID.—I am not afraid of anything.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Wilmot has stated that he desires to make a personal explanation, and so long as he confines himself to that he will be in order. If I find that, as the right honorable gentleman suggests that he may do, he is wandering into matters which are irrelevant, I shall call his attention to the fact.

Mr. CAMERON.—I have not the slightest intention to refer to any irrelevant matter; I merely wish to say that the result of that interview was satisfactory to me. Shortly afterwards a manifesto appeared over the names of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, and the right honorable member for East Sydney, and as it did not quite correspond with what I understood to be the arrangement, it aroused certain feelings in my mind. However, the right honorable member for East Sydney was not sent for by His Excellency the Governor-General on that occasion. Time passed, and the Arbitration and Conciliation Bill was further considered. Every honorable member knows that I have from start to finish been intensely opposed to that measure, and that I have voted against it upon every possible occasion, believing that in doing so I was acting in the best interests of the public. I acted in that way some three weeks ago. The vote was taken on a Friday, and the honorable member for Bland afterwards announced his intention to resign. On the following day, at two o'clock, before the right honorable member for East Sydney had been sent for, I wrote a letter to him, declaring my intention to take the part of an independent member.

Mr. REID.—Quite so.

Mr. CAMERON.—It is no fault of mine that that letter was not placed at once in his hands. I gave it to the honorable member for Macquarie, who will bear out my statement. That was done before the right honorable gentleman had been sent for, when he could by no possibility have formed his Cabinet, and I think refutes the statement of the Argus that I have been animated by a feeling of personal annoyance at not having been included in the Ministry.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Surely the honorable member does not take the newspapers seriously!

Mr. CAMERON.—I do take newspaper statements seriously, especially, when they appear in a journal which circulates throughout the length and breadth of Australia, and are republished in other newspapers, particularly in those of my own State. I do not think that I, or any other honorable member, should be supposed to be actuated by motives of petty jealousy in the votes which we gave. However I may vote in the future, I shall vote as conscientiously as I have done in the past. I think that the right honorable member for East Sydney and the honorable member for Macquarie will bear me out in what I have said.

Mr. REID.—Hear, hear!

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Hear, hear!

Mr. CAMERON.—I may perhaps be permitted to read the following letter, since it is not marked private:—

Dear Mr. Cameron,

Your letter of 13th inst. I got this day. I quite understand your position is an independent one.

Yours sincerely,

G. H. REID.

I think that that letter, together with my statement, refutes the statement of the Argus, and must convey to the minds of my fellow members the belief that, however my vote may be cast, I shall not be actuated by interested motives.

Mr. CROUCH.—I wish to ask the Prime Minister, without notice, in reference to the statement just made, that immediately after the defeat of the Deakin Government he had an interview —

Mr. SPEAKER.—While personal explanations are allowed, it is expressly required by the Standing Orders that they shall not be debated.

Mr. CROUCH.—I do not propose to debate the personal explanation. I was merely going to ask a question, and, in explanation, to state certain facts.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable and learned member proceeds to ask such a question as he has now announced to be his intention to put to the Prime Minister, he will, by doing so, practically be debating the personal explanation made by the honorable member for Wilmot.

Mr. CROUCH.—I will ask the Prime Minister whether it is true that, immediately after the defeat of the Deakin Government, he had an interview with the honorable member for Wilmot, in which he expressed his satisfaction at the defeat of the Deakin Government?

Mr. REID.—I really do not wish to give a flat denial to the question asked by the honorable member. All I can say is that I have not the remotest recollection of what he has suggested.

SPECIAL ADJOURNMENT.

WANT OF CONFIDENCE MOTION:
KALGOORLIE TO PORT AUGUSTA RAILWAY SURVEY BILL.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, I will move—

That the present Administration does not possess the confidence of this House.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—I am so completely surprised by the announcement that the Government do not possess the confidence of the Opposition that, with concurrence, I will move—

That the House, at its rising, adjourn until Tuesday next.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan).—I need hardly say that I am very surprised at the action taken at this time by the leader of the Opposition. I have, of course, no wish or right to object to a want of confidence motion being submitted by him, but I have a right to express my objection to such action being taken to-day. I have a right to express my great regret that the honorable gentleman, after all the trouble that we have all taken in regard to a measure of great importance to the State which I represent—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I point out to the right honorable member that the question before the House is—

That the House, at its rising, adjourn until Tuesday next.

The only question that is open for discussion is whether or not that motion shall be carried. The no-confidence motion itself, of which notice has been given, will appear upon the notice-paper later on, but it will not be competent to discuss the general question on the motion now before the House.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Do I understand that I am not at liberty to discuss the question whether it is advisable for the House to adjourn until Tuesday?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The right honorable member can discuss that and only that.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am going to give my reasons why I think it is very inopportune for the House to adjourn at this time. All parties have taken a great deal of trouble in regard to the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill. That measure has reached such a stage that a few hours more would have been sufficient to finish our work in this House. I have no doubt that it could have been completed between now and the usual time for adjourning to-night.

Mr. MAHON.—What about the honorable member for Moira?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have not consulted any one, but seeing that the majority in favour of the measure last night was so large, I have no doubt that a very few hours would have been sufficient to complete the Bill in this House.

Mr. MAHON.—Some of the right honorable member's friends in the corner intended to prevent that.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There are only one or two honorable members on this side of the House who have spoken strongly against the measure.

Mr. MAHON.—They have done so twice before.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am speaking in the interests of Western Australia, and I do not think that I should be interrupted by members from that State. The measure was just about to be disposed of finally by this House. A very few hours' work would have attained the object that the people and the representatives of Western Australia have desired so long, and for which they have worked so arduously. What is the reason for this hurry? Surely we might have disposed of the Bill, to which I have alluded, before the honorable member for Bland gave notice of his adverse motion, as we did in the case of the Arbitration Bill? If, of course, the debate upon the Bill were likely to occupy a week or two, political exigencies might demand that the no-confidence motion should be proceeded with. But, seeing that it was not likely that long speeches would be made, we could have finished the work to-day or to-morrow at latest, and the measure that is so important and so urgently desired in the interests of Western Australia, of the Commonwealth, and Federation itself, would have been disposed of, so far as this House is concerned. Is it fair or reasonable that this measure should be cast aside, and its progress set back for months probably, and especially when there is no urgent reason whatever for doing so?

Mr. FRAZER.—It must be in the forefront of the programme of any Government.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But we might have had the Bill passed, and the survey commenced, before the measure is likely to reach its present stage again. I think that the other Western Australian members must be of the same opinion as I am.

Mr. McDONALD.—Why did the right honorable member allow the question to remain so long in abeyance, while he was a Minister?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—One cannot get all one wants in a day. We have had very up-hill work in regard to this matter, and now that we are just upon succeeding, as far as the House of Representatives is concerned, the work is to be put back, and for no reason that I can see—because notice of the motion which the honorable member for Bland has just read might as well have been given to-morrow, or even next week. We might just as well have finished our work on the Bill before adjourning.

Mr. GROOM.—That would not have carried the matter any further.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We could have disposed of the Bill in this House, and it would have gone to the Senate, in the same way as has been done with the Arbitration Bill.

Mr. GROOM.—Would the Senate have proceeded with it, while a no-confidence motion was being discussed?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Will they proceed with the Arbitration Bill? Is it fair to Western Australia that this precipitate action should be taken? Why was this notice of motion given to-day instead of to-morrow, or even next week? I should like some one to answer that question. Unless the intention was to delay the passing of the measure—and, in view of the large majority by which the resolution was passed last night, I cannot believe that that was the motive—I am at a loss to account for the action of the leader of the Opposition. I can only say again that I very much regret the action which has been taken, because I conceive that it is unjustifiable, and absolutely opposed to the interests of the State I represent. A large majority of honorable members have declared themselves in favour of the proposed survey. The Bill was not likely to be the subject of any further great controversy, because honorable members had already given their decision, and we should have disposed of it in a few hours. I am certain that the people of Western Australia will be greatly disappointed at the result, and I can only express my astonishment that my honorable friends of the Labour Party, who have worked so hard, and are so much in sympathy with the proposal, should have allowed the present action to be taken. The effect of our adjourning from to-day until Tuesday may have the effect of postponing the passing of the Bill for months, and will be regarded as most unfriendly by the people of the western State.

Mr. CARPENTER (Fremantle).—Whilst joining with the right honorable member for Swan in his expression of regret that anything should have occurred at this particular stage to prevent the passing of the Bill to which he has referred, I think it is only fair to remind him of what occurred last night. I am sure that the right honorable gentleman will agree with me that in seeking to place the blame for delay upon the shoulders of the Labour Party he is doing them a grave injustice.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I blame them for their precipitate action in giving notice of a want of confidence motion at this stage.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Just before the division occurred last night—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable member not to refer to a previous debate. The only question that can be debated now is whether we shall adjourn from to-day until Tuesday next. In any case, it would not be competent for the honorable member to refer to some debate that had taken place on a former occasion.

Mr. CARPENTER.—If you, sir, rule that I cannot directly refer to what occurred at our last sitting, I should like to state generally that the blame for the delay in the passing of the measure referred to by the right honorable member for Swan rests entirely upon honorable members on the Government side of the House. When it was proposed, after the division last night, to put the Bill through all its stages—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is not in order in referring to last night's debate.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I hardly know how I can otherwise reply to the remarks of the right honorable member for Swan.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member will have his opportunity in connexion with the motion for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. CARPENTER.—At this stage I merely desire to say that the action of the leader of the Opposition, in giving notice of motion at this stage, was due entirely to the attitude assumed by honorable members opposite, who are opposed to the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill. It was not the fault of honorable members on this side that the notice of motion was not withheld in order to allow the Bill to be passed. Some honorable members opposite threatened to block the Bill if it were brought forward. Moreover, the measure was given only the second place on the notice-paper, Supply being placed first in the order of business. Therefore, it was evidently not the intention of the Government to permit the Bill to take first place in the consideration of honorable members.

Mr. WATSON.—The order of business, so far as Supply is concerned, is regulated by the Standing Orders.

Mr. CARPENTER.—As matters stand, the probability is that a number of speeches would have been made in regard to grievances, and that these would have prevented the Bill from being discussed to-day. Therefore, the charge of blocking the Bill cannot be justly laid at the door of honorable members on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—It seems to me that this protest by the right honorable member for Swan sounds somewhat hollow, coming as it does from an honorable gentleman who allowed three years to pass whilst he himself was in office without taking any definite steps to push through the Bill to which he has referred.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I brought it to the position which it now occupies.

Mr. WATSON.—With all respect to the right honorable gentleman, I do not think he did. He certainly advocated the construction of the railway upon every occasion upon which opportunity offered, but beyond advocacy the right honorable gentleman did little or nothing to bring the matter to a head in Parliament.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—At any rate, the honorable member is now blocking the measure.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think the right honorable gentleman has put in some splendid work lately.

Mr. WATSON.—The complaint levelled by the right honorable member against the Opposition for taking the straightforward course of testing the question whether the Government possess the confidence of the House comes curiously from the right honorable gentleman, who, we understand, wished to take action in regard to the last Administration on the first day that they met the House. He said then that action should be taken to test their position.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That was because the late Ministry had not a majority.

Mr. WATSON.—If the late Government had not possessed a majority, action would have been taken by those who have longer heads than has the right honorable gentleman.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I wished to give the late Government a fair chance.

Mr. WATSON.—I admit the importance of the question that has been referred to. I have myself urged the desirability of passing the measure, and I think the action

I took when in office afforded some proof of my bona fides in the matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member is spoiling it all to-day.

Mr. WATSON.—We shall come to that presently. Whenever one moves in the direction of a no-confidence motion, it is inevitable that some matters of public business must be interfered with. It is impossible to move such a motion at any period without dislocating some of the public business that may be in hand.

Mr. WILKS.—Why has the honorable member given notice of motion to-day instead of to-morrow?

Mr. WATSON.—For this reason: I was so anxious to meet the view put forward by the right honorable member for Swan, that I did not make up my mind as to the precise moment at which I should give notice of motion until I had exhausted every opportunity to ascertain the views of those honorable members who were opposed to the Bill. I spent a good deal of time this morning in endeavouring to ascertain their views, and I sent word to the right honorable gentleman himself before ten o'clock to-day, asking him to ascertain how far the opponents of the measure were willing to let it go without any serious debate, resting on the vote given last night as their excuse for abstaining from anything like stone-walling tactics.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Where is the necessity for giving notice of motion to-day?

Mr. WATSON.—If the right honorable gentleman will restrain his impatience he will probably find out why I chose to take action to-day rather than to-morrow. Unfortunately, I was not able to communicate with the honorable member who has made himself most prominent in his opposition to the measure.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He has gone home.

Mr. WATSON.—If I had been assured of that, I might have adopted a different course. I was not aware where the honorable member could be found, but I spoke to one or two other honorable members, who did not seem inclined to waive their rights in the matter. Then, again—as has already been pointed out—the discussion of grievances and of private members' business would have occupied the House until half-past 6 o'clock this evening. I understand that there is quite a crop of grievances to be ventilated. Therefore, if any two or three honorable members had cared to talk out the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill, they could easily have accomplished their design. Regarding the reasons which induced me to give notice of motion to-day, instead of to-morrow, I wish to say that I was aware that a large number of honorable members were leaving for the other capitals this afternoon, and I feared that if I deferred action until to-morrow, it might have been impossible to obtain a quorum, and in that way the discussion of the question of want of confidence in the Government upon Tuesday next would not have been possible.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Could not the honorable member have deferred giving notice of the motion until this evening?

Mr. WATSON.—Not very well. However, even with this motion in the way, there is no probability that the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill will meet with any further serious delay in its passage through this House. There is a majority behind that measure, and if those who are opposed to it will, to some extent, forego their right of speech, it should not take long to dispose of it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the Commonwealth collapse if that Bill be not passed?

Mr. WATSON.—No; but the matter having been advanced to a certain stage, it is only reasonable that it should be pushed to a conclusion, and I have no wish to stand in the way of that being accomplished.

Mr. MALONEY (Melbourne).—The action of the Prime Minister is in accordance with the history of Parliaments.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Oh!

Mr. MALONEY.—I will ask the right honorable member for Swan, who interjects, to remain silent for a moment. I intend to challenge him, with a view to ascertain if he has the courage of his opinions. Whether the right honorable member, who has had considerable parliamentary experience in Western Australia, entertains a different idea from mine in regard to carrying on the Government of the country, I do not know. I dare say there is a bit of the iconoclast in me as well as in the right honorable member. If he presses his objection to a division I shall vote with him. At the same time I doubt whether he will do so. I regard his action this afternoon as a little exhibition of fireworks, which is intended for advertisement purposes. Seeing that I voted for the motion relating to the survey of the Transcontinental Railway, and abstained from speaking upon it, in order to expedite its adoption, I have a right to strongly resent his action this afternoon.

Mr. SALMON (Laanecoorie).—I entirely differ from the right honorable member for Swan upon this matter. I think that the country will owe a debt of gratitude to the honorable member for Bland for affording honorable members an opportunity of further considering the survey of the projected Transcontinental Railway. I am aware that at the present juncture it is impossible for me to debate that question, but I sincerely hope that the interval which will be allowed for further consideration will induce several honorable members to change the views which they now entertain. Owing to my position as Chairman of Committees I was debarred from speaking upon the motion under discussion yesterday, but I hope to have an opportunity of fully expressing my opinions upon the second reading of the Bill. I trust that when that time arrives a very much better appreciation of the difficulties which the Commonwealth is at present undergoing will be exhibited by honorable members, who, for some unaccountable reason, seem to have suddenly altered their expressed opinions upon a question which very vitally affects the well-being of Australia.

Mr. McDONALD (Kennedy).—It is quite evident that the last speaker is preparing for an election. Personally I think that the right honorable member for Swan should have taken exception to the action of the Prime Minister, who submitted the motion relating to the special adjournment, rather than to that of the honorable member for Bland. I rise chiefly to point out that it is idle for him to attempt to blame the Opposition for delaying the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill. Even if the honorable member for Bland had deferred giving notice of his motion until to-morrow, we should have been no further forward.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think that we should.

Mr. McDONALD.—I will show that we should not. Had the notice of motion been given to-morrow, we should presumably have passed the Bill through this House in the interim. Under ordinary circumstances it would then have been forwarded to the Senate, where it would have been made an Order of the Day for Tuesday next. But the moment that notice was given of a motion of want of confidence in the Government, there would have been no discussion of other business, either in this House or in the Senate. As far as I am aware the right honorable member for Swan has no reasonable ground for complaint, unless he is prepared to declare that the honorable member for Bland had no right to give notice of his motion for several weeks—until after the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill had been disposed of.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS: PORT AUGUSTA TO KALGOORLIE RAILWAY SURVEY BILL.

Motion (by Mr. REID) proposed—

That the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I wish to obtain a reply from the Prime Minister to a question which has appeared upon the business paper for about a month. It was placed there prior to the three weeks' adjournment which recently occurred.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable and learned member cannot anticipate discussion upon a notice of motion which appears upon the business paper.

Mr. CROUCH.—It is not a notice of motion, but a question.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable and learned member cannot anticipate that.

Mr. CROUCH.—I am very sorry that the Minister has found it necessary to repeatedly postpone answers to certain questions. I understand that it is the policy of the Government to treat its protectionist minority fairly. That was what was alleged when the present Administration was formed.

Mr. REID.—We shall have enough of this sort of talk next week. What is the use of firing a squib?

Mr. CROUCH.—The Prime Minister evidently prepared his manifesto in a jocular spirit. When I say that I understand the Prime Minister has made a bargain with his protectionist minority, he immediately goes into convulsions of humour. It is just as well that the Government's protectionist minority should see the fun of the position, and recognise how humorous is the suggestion that the Prime Minister would keep any promise made by him in this respect. In view of the development likely to take place next week, I should like the Prime Minister to say, before the House adjourns, whether it is his intention to see that in the administration of the Departments local employment—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! The honorable and learned member is attempting, by a side wind, to evade the instruction which I gave him a few moments ago. He must not directly or indirectly anticipate business which is on the notice-paper.

Mr. CROUCH. — I do not know that I am seeking to obtain any information by a side wind. I make that statement in all seriousness.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable and learned member must either submit to the direction of the Chair, or I must call on some other honorable member. He cannot set the Standing Orders at defiance.

Mr. CROUCH.—Very well, sir. It seems that I am not to be allowed to say anything on this subject. I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he regards as a joke the statement which I made—that he promised to endeavour to keep faith with his protectionist minority.

Mr. REID.—No.

Mr. CROUCH. — I also wish to know whether he intends to carry out the proposals contained in his manifesto to the people of Australia that he would see that the legislation already passed by a former protectionist Ministry remained in force, and that the Government would continue to administer the Departments on the lines adopted by their predecessors.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister for External Affairs).—I merely wish to say that I did not laugh at the serious matter to which the honorable and learned member referred. I quite agree that the subject is—

Mr. CARPENTER.—I rise to a point of order. If the Prime Minister speaks at this stage he will close the debate, and thus render it impossible for me to refer to a matter which I rose a few minutes ago to put before the House.

Mr. REID.—I beg the honorable member's pardon. I thought the debate had finished. I do not wish to close his mouth.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The Prime Minister has risen, and has commenced his reply—

Mr. REID.—I did not intend to prevent discussion, and, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to give way to the honorable member.

Mr. SPEAKER.—That being so, no doubt the House will permit the honorable member for Fremantle to speak.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. CARPENTER (Fremantle).—I did not know that the Prime Minister was about to close the debate, but I think he will recognise that I am entitled to complete my remarks on the subject which I brought forward on the motion for special adjournment, but which, under the Standing Orders, I was unable to discuss. I was pointing out that just prior to the division which took place last night on the motion for an appropriation in connexion with the preliminary survey for the Transcontinental Railway, I suggested to the right honorable member for Swan that if the Bill relating to that matter were ready, the House would probably agree, as honorable members appeared to be so unanimously in favour of the motion, to pass it through all its stages that night.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is so.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The right honorable member consulted the Minister in charge of the Bill—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—As well as some other honorable members on this side of the House.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Quite so. He consulted them in order to learn whether they would agree to the adoption of the course which I suggested.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They said they would not.

Mr. CARPENTER.—A distinct threat was made by the honorable member for Moira that if the House were asked to pass the Bill through all its stages that evening we might expect a debate extending over at least two days. He threatened that he would read various reports, and do his best to obstruct the passage of the Bill. After consultation, I and some of my fellow representatives of Western Australia this morning saw the leader of the Opposition, and inquired whether, notwithstanding this threat, it was not worth while making another attempt to persuade honorable members opposite to allow the Bill to pass through all its stages this afternoon, and to postpone the notice of motion of want of confidence until to-morrow. The leader of the Opposition at once said that if he could persuade Government supporters to adopt that course he would willingly postpone his notice of motion.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—What about the honorable member's leader, the honorable and learned member for Indi?

Mr. CARPENTER.—I am speaking of what happened.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—But why does the honorable member endeavour to throw all the blame on Government supporters? What about his own leader, the honorable and learned member for Indi?

Mr. ROBINSON.—He is not a leader, but a sub-leader—a paragraph.

Mr. HUME COOK.—He will prove a rather awkward "paragraph" for honorable members opposite.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! The honorable member for Fremantle is addressing the House, and I must ask honorable members to give him an opportunity to conclude his remarks. These loud interjections across the chamber, and the conversations which are taking place in a loud voice, render it almost impossible for the honorable member to proceed.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I was simply relating what took place this morning outside the chamber. The leader of the Opposition assured us that he would do his best to persuade Government supporters to agree to the passing of the Bill this evening, and that if that arrangement could be made, the notice of motion to which I have referred would be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Whom did he see?

Mr. CARPENTER.—I do not know how many the honorable member interviewed, but he subsequently informed me that he found it impossible to induce the supporters of the Government to agree to the passing of the Bill to-day.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He did not see any one on this side of the House.

Mr. CARPENTER.—It would have been useless for him to interview the honorable member for Parramatta. I make this statement to show that the charge which has been levelled against members of the Labour Party and of the Opposition generally, that they are obstructing the passing of the Bill in question, is without foundation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why all this unreasonable hurry to press a motion of want of confidence?

Mr. CARPENTER.—We have done our utmost, both in the House and outside of it, to facilitate the passing of the Bill. The reason that it is not being discussed and dealt with to-day is that honorable members sitting behind the Government refuse to allow that course to be followed.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—In view of what we have done that is a very unfair statement for the honorable member to make.

Mr. MAHON.—It is perfectly correct.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan).—I trust that it will not be thought that when I referred to the obstruction of the Bill dealing with the preliminary survey for the Transcontinental Railway by the motion of the leader of the Labour Party I desired to reflect on the three representatives of Western Australia who are members of the Opposition. Nothing was further from my thoughts than to suggest that they were willing parties to delaying that measure, for I know that they have always been earnest advocates of the railway. What I wished to convey was that it was their duty to have brought more influence to bear to prevent the notice of motion of want of confidence being given before that Bill had been dealt with.

Mr. CARPENTER.—But the right honorable member referred to us.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I said that I was surprised that honorable members representing Western Australia should have consented to the course taken by the leader of the Opposition, and I reiterate, in the strongest manner, that opinion. With regard to the opposition shown by honorable members sitting in the Government corner to the motion relating to the Transcontinental Railway survey, I would remind the House that the Government cannot interfere with the free expression of the views of their supporters. The Bill dealing with the survey could not have been passed through all its stages last night without the suspension of the Standing Orders. That was impossible.

Mr. MAHON.—I think it was quite possible.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think it would have been possible to pass the Bill through all its stages last night. But, in any event, it is surely desirable that such a Bill should be passed even at the risk of delaying for one or two days a motion adverse to the Government. The Government have been doing very good work. I do not believe that at any time during the present session greater expedition has been shown in dealing with measures than we have witnessed during the last few days.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is the trouble.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Why the passing of the Port Augusta to Kalgoorlie Railway Survey Bill should be postponed and ignored, when the postponement of the notice of the motion of want of confidence for probably one day would have passed the Bill, is difficult to understand. I wish to refer to a remark made, not only to-day by the leader of the Opposition, and other members of the Labour Party, but by members of the Labour Party sitting in another place, while visiting Western Australia, to the effect that I was for three years a member of the Barton and Deakin Governments, and did nothing to push forward this measure. Any one who repeats that statement grossly misrepresents my action, because no one can honestly say that I have not done all that I could to advance the project.

Mr. PAGE.—What did the right honorable member do to advance the project?

Mr. McDONALD.—The right honorable member remained in the Government after they had refused to bring the measure forward.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Should I have advanced it had I left the Government?

Mr. McDONALD.—Yes.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not agree with the honorable member.

Mr. WILKS.—The Watson Government were in office four months without doing anything in the matter.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I kept the fire burning, and the result is shown by the vote which was given last night. It would have been impossible to obtain such a vote at a much earlier period in the history of the Commonwealth. The honorable member for Coolgardie, who, with the other representatives of Western Australia, has done all he could to have the project advanced as far as it was yesterday, was four months in office without getting it further advanced than when he took office.

Mr. MAHON.—The Watson Government carried it as far in four months as the Government in which the right honorable member was a Minister did in three years.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—During the three years I was in office, I got the project carried as far as the point at which it was yesterday. It was advanced another stage then. The Government in which the honorable member was a Minister did not advance it a single step.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The right honorable gentleman would not let us.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am not blaming honorable members. I desire to thank them, not to blame them; but when they say that I did nothing they are very ungenerous, and are trying to injure me politically in the estimation of the people of my own State. But they cannot do it. It would take some one more powerful than the leader of the Opposition to injure me there. Still it comes with a bad grace from him to misrepresent my actions in this matter. Any representative of Western Australia who says that during the three years in which I was in office I did nothing, has a very poor knowledge of my exertions and of the trouble which I took in the matter. Do honorable members think that the Government was committed to the project, so that every speech of the Governor-General contained a reference to it, without any one urging the matter forward, and without any arguments or facts being brought to bear in regard to it? If so, they have very little knowledge of what took place. The remark of the leader of the Opposition is as incorrect as it was uncalled for; but it is only in keeping with what has been already said by members of the Labour Party who desire to misrepresent me before the people of the western State. It has been said before, and the interjection of the member for Coolgardie might lead one to think that he holds the same view. Hitherto I was always of the opinion that he and I, and the other representatives of Western Australia, had been working together as vigorously as we could to push forward this project. My complaint is that, as the House was doing good work in passing important measures, and had nearly passed this Bill, this motion, which means a delay for an indefinite time, and perhaps other things—

Mr. PAGE.—That is what the right honorable member is afraid of.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member does not know me if he thinks that. I advise the honorable member to look after himself, which will probably give him quite enough to do without troubling about me. The House has been doing good work during the last few days, and it was a mistake to interrupt business by giving notice of a motion of which notice might have been given equally well one or two days later. The effect will be that the people of Western Australia will believe that there is some ulterior motive; and the facts before us certainly make it appear that there is something behind this action of honorable members opposite. There is no reason whatever why the motion should not have been deferred for a day or two, so that we might have disposed of the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill, the Papua Bill, and some other measures, in the same way as the mover was careful to dispose of the Arbitration Bill, before hurriedly launching his no-confidence motion.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—I regret that the right honorable member for Swan found it necessary at this stage of the proceedings to indulge in what I must, even though in a charitable mood, describe as rather a theatrical display.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not at all; it was genuine.

Mr. MAHON.—No doubt the right honorable member had a genuine purpose to serve, but he had no justification for the remarks which he made. He rather misrepresented what was said by the honorable member for Bland, who, in defending his party's action in connexion with the measure to which reference has been made, charged the right honorable member with himself having done nothing practical to forward it. He did not say that the right honorable gentleman had not done valuable work in the House, and in the country, in advocating the construction of the railway, but that for all practical purposes the project had not been advanced a step after the right honorable member had been in office for three years. It was not until a motion of want of confidence had been accepted—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It had not been accepted. It had not been moved.

Mr. MAHON.—The honorable member for North Sydney refused to allow the Committee stage to be taken, because a motion of want of confidence had been moved.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It had not been moved.

Mr. MAHON.—I refer the right honorable member to Hansard. There was virtually a motion of want of confidence before the House at the time. What the honorable member for Bland said was that the right honorable member had not, during the three years that he was in the Ministry, brought the project for the construction of the Transcontinental Railway to a successful issue. The right honorable member was not just to the honorable member for Bland in saying that he had done nothing in the matter during the four months that he was in office. As a matter of fact, the first really practicable step taken in connexion with it was his proposal to the Premier of Western Australia, that that State should pay more than her per capita share of the loss during the first ten years. In that action, he went a long way in furthering this proposition, and to reconcile Parliament to its acceptance.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am very glad if he did that.

Mr. MAHON.—I do not think that the right honorable member really intended to be quite so unreasonable as he seemed to be, and I do regret very much that he should, at this stage, have taken the opportunity to cast reflections upon members of this party, and also to put his colleagues from Western Australia in a false light before the people of that State. I feel sure that, upon reconsideration, he will regret having done so. As far as this matter is concerned, I can corroborate every word that was said by the honorable member for Fremantle, in regard to the efforts made during the day, to induce the Government supporters in the corner to abandon their opposition.

Mr. MCCAY.—What about honorable members on the Opposition side?

Mr. MAHON.—There was no one in the Opposition corner who was inclined to stone-wall the Bill.

Mr. MCCAY.—What about the honorable and learned member for Indi?

Mr. MAHON.—The honorable and learned member for Indi said very little about it.

Mr. MCCAY.—He opposed the survey.

Mr. MAHON.—Did he make a three-hours' speech like the honorable member for Moira, who was plainly "stone-walling" the measure?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—This comes from being bound hand and foot to the Labour Party!

Mr. MAHON.—I say that every effort was made by the honorable member for Bland, and by the Western Australian members, to induce the Government supporters to abandon their opposition to the Bill. Having done our best in that direction, we were not going to interpose a barrier to the motion of which the honorable member for Bland has given notice.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the honorable member had told the leader of the Opposition that he would not support him in his action his wishes would have been consulted.

Mr. MAHON.—I am afraid that my ideal of loyalty to my leader and to my colleagues must be different from that cherished by the right honorable member for Swan. I can assure the House that we did everything possible to induce the Government supporters, and other honorable members who were opposed to the Bill, to allow it to go through to-day, and I am perfectly satisfied with the course taken by the honorable member for Bland, which has my full approval and indorsement.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—I merely wish to make one remark in reply to the honorable and learned member for Corio. He complained that I neglected to answer a question for a month. The statement is wildly inaccurate, as usual.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The right honorable member ought not to say "as usual."

Mr. REID.—I say "as usual." Surely I can have my own opinion on the subject.

Mr. HUME COOK.—It is not fair to say that the honorable and learned member for Corio was "wildly inaccurate."

Mr. REID.—The fastidious conscience of the honorable member who has interjected is an annoyance to himself as well as to every one else. With reference to the statement of the honorable and learned member for Corio, I should like to point out that the question to which he refers was put down for the 7th September. Through some mischance, the question was not brought under my attention until the morning of the 7th. Until that moment I had not the remotest idea that such a question was upon the paper. When the House met on the 7th, I asked the honorable and learned member to postpone his question for a week. He did so, and it appears on the paper for to-day. I have the answer in my hand, and intended to read it; but, as every honorable member with any parliamentary experience is aware, the moment a notice of motion such as that of the leader of the Opposition is given it becomes impossible even to put such questions. Consequently, I was debarred by nothing for which I was responsible from answering the question to which the honorable and learned member has referred. I wish to say that when I smiled at what the honorable and learned member said I was not smiling at the urgent necessity for the revision of the Tariff, which is now the object of interest to the Opposition, but I was smiling at the attempt to drag a rather stale red herring across the trail. I also wish to say that since the motion of which notice has been given is one which will afford every honorable member the fullest opportunity to deal with every subject of interest, the desire to commence these observations so soon as to-day is evidence of a morbid appetite.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 3.36 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Tuesday, 20 September, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PAPERS.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON laid upon the table the following papers:—

Amendment of Regulations under the Public Service Act, Nos. 104, 144, 168, and 169.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I desire to make a personal explanation. During the meeting of the House on Thursday last I drew attention to the action of the Prime Minister in not answering a question of which I had given notice, and I regret to say that the right honorable gentleman, speaking in reply on the motion for the adjournment, and in my absence from the chamber, so that I had no opportunity to defend myself, told honorable members that I had been "wildly inaccurate as usual," and that I had not given notice of the question, although, as a matter of fact, that question has been on the notice-paper for nearly a month, and occupies the first place among the notices of questions on the business-paper for to-day.

Mr. REID.—What I said was that the question had not been brought under my notice until the day when the House met after the recent three weeks' adjournment, that is until the 7th September.

Mr. CROUCH.—I was not present when the Prime Minister made the statement to which I take exception, so that I may not be correct in saying that the Prime Minister made the statement which I have attributed to him, but it is the statement which occurs in Hansard, and in the reports of the two metropolitan newspapers. That the impression that the right honorable gentleman stated that I was "wildly inaccurate as usual," was conveyed to members of the House, is proved by the fact that the honorable member for Bourke thought it necessary, in my absence, to defend my reputation. On the 18th August last, I gave notice of my intention to ask the Prime Minister the following question:—

(1) Whether he proposes to carry out the policy that in all Government contracts preference shall be given to local manufactures and products?

(2) Whether he will cause to be inserted in all Government contracts a condition that goods which can be reasonably manufactured in Australia should have a preference over similar articles manufactured outside.

On the 19th August copies of that question were distributed to the members of the Ministry and of the House, and to the press, and on the 20th it was published in the newspapers. On the 7th September the Postmaster-General came to me, and informed me that the Prime Minister was not ready to answer it. He therefore asked me if I would postpone it.

Mr. REID.—That is quite right. Having seen the notice of the question on the 7th, the day upon which the House re-assembled, I asked the Postmaster-General to request the honorable and learned member to postpone it, as I had not had time to prepare an answer to it.

Mr. CROUCH.—Unfortunately, the Hansard and newspaper reports state that the Prime Minister said that he did not see the question until the 8th September. In reply to the request of the Postmaster-General, I said that the Prime Minister had had three weeks in which to prepare an answer, and that, as I had previously asked the question without notice, I thought he should be ready to answer it then. The Prime Minister said that on the 8th September I consented to its postponement, but on that day I was at the Geelong Agricultural Show, and did not enter the chamber until late in the evening, so that I could not have consented to its postponement then. On the 15th, when I asked for a reply to the question, I stated that it had "appeared upon the business-paper for about a month," but the House was nevertheless afterwards informed by the Prime Minister, in my absence, that I had been "wildly inaccurate," that I had asked it on the 8th, and had then consented to its postponement. I think that that was a very unfair statement to make. Six weeks ago I asked the Prime Minister, who was then leader of the Opposition, the same question. He made a laughing reply, but did not answer it. I do not understand why he has not answered it. Although he has said that I was "wildly inaccurate, as usual," I have shown that in this case I was not inaccurate. Whatever has been charged against me, I have not been charged with being an artful dodger.

MOTION OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I move—

That the present Administration does not possess the confidence of this House.

As is usual in such cases, perhaps, the Opposition has been charged with delaying public business by giving notice of this motion, and I admit that a certain amount of delay must inevitably ensue from its discussion. But on almost every occasion when a new Administration has assumed office, it has been the right and legitimate practice for the Opposition, unless the fact that the Government was supported by a large majority had been clearly made known by some such process as a general election, or as the result of a vote in the House, to ascertain by the readiest means what its position really was. When the Administration of which I was at the head came into power a few months ago, the present Prime Minister, who was then leader of the Opposition, stated in this Chamber, on the night that we first met the House, that he would take the earliest opportunity to test our position, and he on several occasions repeated that statement in various parts of the country, and especially at Kyneton and at Waragul. On almost every occasion when he spoke in public he breathed fire and defiance against us.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—He only breathed it, though.

Mr. WATSON.—I admit that his threatened motion of want of confidence did not materialize; but he recognised that it was a proper thing to ask the House whether the then Government did or did not possess the confidence of its members. Curiously enough, however, the newspapers which are criticising the present Opposition for delaying the discussion of matters of public importance, then used every argument that I brought to bear to force the right honorable gentleman to take similar action against us. The Sydney Daily Telegraph said that it was a disgrace to the right honorable gentleman, and to those associated with him, that they had allowed weeks to elapse without challenging the position of the then Government. Now that newspaper has suddenly become converted to the belief that the pressing need of the country is "settled Government," and that therefore no attempt should be made to interfere with the occupation of the Treasury benches by honorable gentlemen opposite. I contend that we have a right to ascertain what is the position of parties in this Chamber. The programme of the Government has been put before us, and it is a matter for our consideration whether it is to be held sufficient, both in regard to that portion which is to be carried out in the present session, and in regard to the remaining items which are to be carried into effect as part of the future policy of the Government. The Prime Minister, when speaking in Sydney, did not specifically complain of the action of the Opposition in challenging his position, but stated that there was nothing in the Government programme that called for opposition. So far as the Government programme relates to this session, so far as the actual list of Bills that are to be brought forward and pushed through, are concerned, I admit that there is nothing that calls for opposition on our part. Why? Because the right honorable gentleman and his colleagues have been at every pains to select absolutely non-contentious measures for this session.

Mr. GROOM.—Measures taken from the programmes of previous Governments.

Mr. WATSON.—Exactly. There is absolutely nothing to which exception can be taken. Of course, if a Government is prepared to do only those things which are certain to be approved by a large majority of the people, very little exception can be taken to its immediate programme. It is questionable, however, whether the country will benefit from a mark-time arrangement of that sort.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member used to advocate one step at a time.

Mr. WATSON.—So far as any large measure of public importance is concerned no step is proposed by the present Government.

Mr. ISAACS.—Unless it be a step backwards.

Mr. WATSON.—I shall deal with that aspect of the question presently. I think that there is a possibility of a considerable step backwards being taken by the present Government in relation to some of the legislation we have passed. At present, however, I am speaking of the immediate programme which the Government have laid before the country, that they have deigned to outline for the consideration of the electors, and I say that it is such as to call for very little remark, and that it certainly will not constitute one step in advance, even if the whole of it be carried out. Take the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. With the exception of the amendment adopted at the instance of the Minister of Defence, the Government have accepted the whole of the amendments proposed by the late Government.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is the Bill of the late Government, with the exception referred to.

Mr. WATSON.—I admit that with that exception it is our Bill, but, as I have already stated, I regard that amendment as sufficient to vitiate the whole measure, so far as the prospect of its successful working is concerned. The Government have been content to take on trust the proposal that the railway servants of the States shall be included within the scope of the measure. That objectionable feature, from the stand-point of honorable members opposite has been ignored in their anxiety to get the measure out of the road. So far as that specific matter is concerned I have no objection to urge, but I will pass on to the other proposals. The Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill is a distinctly non-party measure—one upon which the leading members of all parties are agreed so far as the survey is concerned. Then, again, the Electoral Bill is a non-party measure, containing nothing of importance in the way of detail. The Papua Bill, the Fraudulent Trade Marks Bill, and the Trade Marks Bill proper are all measures of very little importance from the political point of view.

Mr. JOHNSON.—They are necessary measures.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes, but they have no important bearing from the point of view of controversial politics. Then, again, the Manufactures Encouragement Bill is to be treated as an open question. I am quite prepared to admit that it would have been altogether unreasonable to expect the Government to come down with a programme for this session as long as your arm. In such a case they might have been challenged upon the real hope of carrying out their programme. I do contend, however, that in view of the fact that we are nearing the end of the session, this House and the country—and more particularly the country—had a right to expect a declaration from the Government with regard to the course they intended to follow next session.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Oh, no. That is quite a new idea.

Mr. WATSON.—Is the country not to be taken into the confidence of the Government? Are the electors to be regarded as having no interest in the legislation that is to engage our attention? Is the country to be satisfied when the Ministry says, Micawber like, "Wait until something turns up, and then we shall be prepared to place our programme before you."

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member is prepared to mark time until the next Parliament, according to the alliance programme.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member will find that some very large questions are dealt with in the alliance programme.

Mr. MCCAY.—They are treated as open questions.

Mr. WATSON.—There are many important questions that are not left open. Our programme is not characterized by that mean spiritedness that displays itself in a readiness to defer in everything to the interests of those who are not specially charged with the administration of the affairs of the Commonwealth. So far as any allusion is made to large measures by the Government, it is indicated that they are prepared to defer to the wishes of the States Governments. That seems to be the keynote of the whole policy that the Government are putting forward. They are not standing on the constitutional powers handed over to the Federal Government. They are not declaring, "We are prepared to carry these things through if we can obtain the co-operation of the States Governments. If we can so adjust the proposals as to work harmoniously with the States authorities we are prepared to do so; but in any case we intend to push them through." They make no such statement, but in regard to the High Commissioner Bill, the old-age pensions question, and even in regard to that pet idea of the Minister of Trade and Customs—the encouragement of agriculture—they are doing nothing and are proposing nothing except to consult the States Governments. I say that that is not the position for Ministers in charge of the affairs of Australia to take up. As I have indicated, I have every desire that harmonious relations should exist between the States and the Federal authorities; but there should be a straightforward declaration of policy from the gentleman in charge of the Government as responsible Ministers as to their own ideas, and how far they are going to ask Parliament to give effect to them at the earliest opportunity. Take, for instance, the High Commissioner Bill. From my point of view there is very grave objection indeed to the continued postponement of that particular measure. When speaking on Thursday week, I alluded to the difficulties through which Australia had had to pass because of the absence from London of some person who could speak with authority as to the meaning, intention, and scope of the legislation passed by this Parliament.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There is nothing spoiling on that account.

Mr. WATSON.—With all due respect to the honorable member, I think that a good deal is spoiling. The Commonwealth is being misunderstood, and is being misrepresented, and I think that this is doing a great deal of harm indeed to the people of Australia, and that it will later on materially affect their interests. The Prime Minister a little while ago stated that in the estimation of people in the United Kingdom Australia was practically barred to immigrants because of the laws we had passed, and I say that such a view could not obtain if the people of England thoroughly understood the legislation which we have adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Perhaps they understand it only too well.

Mr. WATSON.—If the honorable member appeals to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat upon that point he will find that he is mistaken. He will discover that there is no possibility, except by twisting the absolute intention of Parliament out of its proper channel, of preventing any person free from shackles who desires to settle here from coming to Australia. There is every desire on the part of all parties to encourage those people to come here, and to assist them after their arrival. However, altogether apart from the question of diplomatic representations in the heart of the Empire, we have merely to look at what has been accomplished in Canada—even during the last year or so—by its High Commissioner to realize how far our producers could be assisted by having resident in London, with an adequate staff, an officer charged with a proper sense of his responsibilities. I ask the Minister of Trade and Customs whether he is satisfied to sanction another year or so of delay in regard to the High Commissionership when he reflects upon the manner in which the Canadian High Commissioner has increased the demand for Canadian products in London, by reason of the steps which he has taken to place them before the people and to familiarize everybody with their quality and price?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Have they any State Agents-General there?

Mr. WATSON.—No.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is the programme of the present Minister of Trade and Customs.

Mr. WATSON.—Is it? If so, the honorable member is deeper in the secret than is the country, because I do not take it that the Minister of Trade and Customs has professed himself at all satisfied with the work which the State Agents-General are performing. I do not believe that any one will contend that it is possible for a number of gentlemen, however energetic and able they may be, to render exactly the same service as could be rendered by one well-equipped central office working upon a detailed plan for the benefit of all Australia. I do not think the Minister will urge that for a moment. To my mind it is a serious thing, from the stand-point of our producers, that we should continue to neglect the magnificent market offered by the mother country, which imports annually £230,000,000 worth of foodstuffs, of which Australia contributes only a little more than £3,000,000 worth, by indefinitely delaying the appointment of a High Commissioner, because, forsooth, "it is necessary to consult the States Governments." While the last Administration was in office, I took steps, I admit, to consult the States Governments as to how far they would be willing—if a High Commissioner were appointed—to take advantage of the facilities which his office would offer in conjunction with the various State Agencies, and further, I inquired whether they were prepared to allow the High Commissioner to take charge of the various operations connected with the States debts. But whilst asking for an expression of their views, and intimating an anxiety to meet them in every possible way, I was not unwise enough to contemplate delaying for a moment the introduction of the High Commissioner Bill, or the appointment of the gentleman who should fill that position. Therefore, I feel that the Government have taken a wrong step in deferring the consideration of this most important question. Then, there is another matter to which I desire to direct attention—I refer to old-age pensions. Here, again, the Government are apparently prepared to allow the whole possibility of obtaining Federal old-age pensions to rest with the States Governments.

Mr. McCAY.—What does the alliance programme mean upon that point?

Mr. WATSON.—It means exactly what it states, namely, that we should get an old-age pension scheme, which will be fair alike to the States and individuals—but we shall get it. It does not mean that we intend to consult the States about it, and then defer to their decision as to whether or not we are to have such a scheme. It means that we shall attempt to arrive at an understanding with them, but that failing that we shall still go for an old-age pension scheme. Are we to confess that the Commonwealth is, so financially decrepit that it cannot undertake to provide for its aged poor, or that the provisions of the Constitution are not sufficiently elastic to allow of the whole of the old people of Australia being taken under the care of the Commonwealth? I, for one, say that, even in those States where old-age pensions are granted to-day—in Victoria and New South Wales—the existing administration, while it is, perhaps, all that is possible under a State Act, is not satisfactory from the stand-point of those who believe in the principle of old-age pensions. We know that many of the most deserving Australian pioneers, by reason of the very fact that they went from one State to another, helping to develop their resources—as the gold miners in the old days followed the rush from Bendigo to Lambing Flat, and from Lambing Flat perhaps went to Queensland—are largely debarred from participating in the advantages which old-age pensions should offer to them. Yet, according to the dictum of the Government, we are to be content, in the case of New South Wales and Victoria, to allow that condition of things to continue, whilst, so far as the other States are concerned, we have no indication that the Government will make any sustained effort to secure pensions for the aged poor, if the States Governments cannot see their way to agree to the proposal.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The Government almost entirely forgot to mention the matter.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes. It is peculiar that, in regard to this matter, we received the Ministerial statement of policy by instalments. The Prime Minister outlined a portion of his programme in this House. That was supplemented on the same day, so far as the question of old-age pensions was concerned, by the statement of the Attorney-General in another place, and on the following day it was still further supplemented by the other responsible gentleman in the Ministry, the Minister of Trade and Customs. It is rather unusual that we should receive a statement of policy by instalments in that fashion. Of course, if it were a good policy, it would not matter. I merely comment upon it as being an unusual proceeding. I contend, therefore, that it is not sufficient for those who favour the payment of old-age pensions to be told that if the States are agreeable, effect will be given to such a scheme. What is the alternative? That we should wait, I am given to understand, until the expiration of the Braddon section of the Constitution. That is rather longer than I hope to wait before seeing such a scheme in existence. If we are to judge by the attitude taken up by the States Treasurers when in conference with the present Treasurer a little while ago, there is no prospect whatever of the States Governments agreeing to become responsible for an old-age pension scheme. I hope it is not so; but if we are to accept as a criterion the statements which they made a few months ago, there is very little prospect indeed of obtaining from that source any adequate scheme of old-age pensions. Having taken a brief glance at what the Government propose to do, we have to consider what they have omitted from their programme. I repeat that we look in vain for any indication of policy which offers hope to the community. Whilst those measures of which I have spoken are of importance in themselves, still they are only details. They do not largely affect the welfare of the people of Australia. The matters which the Government intend to press through during the current session are, comparatively speaking, of little importance, and we have the most eloquent silence as to their intentions in other respects. Take, for instance, the pressing question of irrigation and water conservation. The Prime Minister has made no reference to the intentions of the Government in that regard. He gave no indication of how far the Ministry are prepared to assist the States to come to an agreement, or to take action in the event of the States being willing to allow the Federal authorities to assume control of that question. There is no indication whatever as to the intentions of the Government in that connexion. I do not think that anybody to-day can overrate the importance of water conservation and efficient irrigation so far as the people of Australia are concerned. I am not here to put forward anything in the nature of a policy, but I did expect—

Mr. REID.—Give the people some hope.

Mr. WATSON.—So far as I am concerned, when the late Government was in office, we submitted a policy, I admit, of comparatively small importance for the present session. We included in our statement of policy for the present session a very definite pronouncement on the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, and in regard to some contentious clauses in that measure, while in our policy for next session we included proposals of such vast importance that they brought down upon us the anathemas of all those who were opposed to the legislation that we had been putting forward.

Mr. McCAY.—But those planks are not to be found in the alliance programme.

Mr. WATSON.—Some of them are. Old-age pensions were certainly included in our programme for next session. The alliance programme does not necessarily cover all the proposals that will be put before the country if an opportunity offers; there may be further agreement with respect to other matters. It deals merely with the preliminary proposals to which we have agreed, and the responsibility does not rest upon our shoulders at the present moment to take steps to inform the people as to the course we propose to take. My complaint to-day is against the Government, and I assert that we look in vain for any expression of their intentions, once the present session has closed, with regard to any important or far-reaching proposal.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The Opposition have not given the Government an opportunity to express their intentions in regard to next session.

Mr. HUME COOK.—They will have an opportunity to-day.

Mr. WATSON.—They had ample opportunity to do so a fortnight ago; and in view of the complaint that has been made against them, they will probably be willing to take advantage of the further opportunity which this motion offers. The question arises whether the Government have any policy, or whether the settlement of a policy awaits the long-deferred caucus meeting of the members of the Ministerial Party.

Mr. JOHNSON.—We do not hold caucus meetings.

Mr. WATSON.—I understand that there is a difficulty in regard to certain matters, and that the only chance of their adjustment rests in the party coming to an arrangement in caucus. It is certainly rather interesting to speculate as to the results of that meeting, and as to whether, as the outcome of it, we shall be able to look forward to anything in the nature of a declaration of policy upon the larger and more important questions to which I have referred.

Mr. WILSON.—Some of us would like to know what those questions are.

Mr. WATSON.—I refer to the matters which have been omitted from the Government programme. The Prime Minister stated at Warragul, a little while ago, that it was his intention to challenge the position of the Watson Government, and to compel every man to define his position. The necessity to compel every honorable member to define his position still exists. We have had from the Prime Minister a declaration of open war against, not only the Opposition, comprising members of the Labour Party, but every honorable member who dares to sympathize with the objects which animate that party, and the general principles which underlie their programme.

Mr. KENNEDY.—That is not so.

Mr. WATSON.—Only a few weeks ago the Prime Minister said that the war into which he and his party had that night entered against the Labour Party must be carried to a conclusion. Is it to be expected, therefore, that the right honorable gentleman and his colleagues, having proclaimed that warfare had commenced, we shall stand aside and allow them to use the machinery of Government to defeat, whether by legislation or by administration, the very objects which we had in view in entering this Parliament? I for one cannot conceive how any unprejudiced person could expect us to take up such a position. The Prime Minister states that the Labour Party represent a class; but the Minister of Trade and Customs goes a good deal further, and asserts that we represent only the section of a class. I am prepared to admit that the first revolt against the domination of those who were peculiarly class representatives—those who had looked to the interests of only a class, and that one the moneyed class—the first note of rebellion against the domination of that class of politicians certainly came from only the section of a class. At its inception it came from the manual labourer and the artisan.

Mr. WEBSTER.—From those who suffered.

Mr. WATSON.—From those who had suffered most from the injustice of legislation which preceded the advent of the Labour Party into Parliament. But the Labour movement had scarcely taken shape—it had not been promulgated for more than a month or two—before there flocked to its standard men representing every section of the community, save those which had something to lose by the disturbance of the existing system. We are told that we have no right to arrogate to ourselves the term “Labour Party.” It is because there is no broader term than the words “Labour Party” that we seek to describe ourselves in that way. It is because our platform shows a regard for the interests of all sections of the community that we are justified in calling ourselves the Labour Party. I challenge those who contend that we are representatives of only a class or the section of a class to point to one proposal in the platform of the Federal Labour Party, or in that of any of the Labour Parties of the States Parliaments, which is in the interest only of, a class or of a section of a class.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Preference for unionists.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member suggests that preference for unionists is a proposal to which he objects. The granting of preference to unionists, however, would not have infringed, in the slightest degree, the rights of any person employed in any industry. It would certainly have allowed the organization upon which the whole superstructure of compulsory arbitration is built to fulfil the mission set out for them by those who first conceived the principle. Beyond that, it would have done nothing. I am convinced that many of those who object to preference to unionists do not understand the theory upon which compulsory arbitration is based. If they did they would not be found in opposition to it.

Mr. POYNTON.—It is provided for in the Bill as it stands.

Mr. WATSON.—Of course it is in the Bill.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It was meekly accepted.

Mr. WATSON.—Let me deal with the programme of the Federal Labour Party. The first plank in the platform is the maintenance of a white Australia. What is there in that proposal that is peculiarly helpful to a class? Surely it is the concern of the whole community that Australia should be kept free from the contamination which follows in the train of an influx of coloured peoples. Surely it is not a matter in which the workmen of Australia are alone interested. I submit that the whole of the people of Australia have a vital and direct interest in legislation dealing with that question.

Mr. SALMON.—But the question is not one of which the Labour Party has a monopoly.

Mr. WATSON.—I am free to admit that that is so; but the honorable member must recollect that that which I am seeking to do at the present moment is to disprove the assertion that the members of the Labour Party are here as the representatives of a class, and I am dealing with the items in our programme in support of my contention. Another plank in our platform is that of compulsory arbitration. Would any honorable member contend that compulsory arbitration is in the interests of manual labourers alone?

Mr. WEBSTER.—No one who understands it would do so.

Mr. WATSON.—Certainly not. Any one who has the faintest recollection of that which has frequently occurred in Australia—of the immense loss which has followed from strikes—will at least admit that the whole community has the keenest interest in the settlement of industrial troubles. Then we also make provision for old-age pensions. It may be said that here at last is something in our programme in which the workers are peculiarly interested. I admit that in the main such a proposal is likely to affect those who have to rely on manual labour for their daily bread. The manual labourer and the artisan, as conditions are throughout the world, have but little opportunity indeed to provide against old age. But there are many in this competitive world of ours who imagine themselves to be free from all possibility of want in the evening of their lives, but who, because of some untoward event, find to their surprise, that even they have to ask for an old-age pension. We find in New South Wales to-day that a very large percentage—all things considered—of those who are receiving pensions, are people who never did a stroke of manual labour in their lives, who were never artisans, but who occupied positions which one would have imagined would have preserved them against the possibility of having to come on the State in their old age. I say again that there is nothing peculiar to labouring people in this old-age pensions proposal. Then we have the nationalization of monopolies. I cannot see that the workers have any more to gain in that respect than have the rest of the community. That is to say, those who are ordinarily looked upon as the labouring class have no greater interest than the rest of the community have in nationalizing monopolies.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Than those who retail tobacco, for instance.

Mr. WATSON.—Those who retail tobacco to-day are suffering from the operations of a monopolistic combine. They are suffering worse than the ordinary man in the street, because so far the combination has confined its kind attentions to the retailer. It has got rid of a number of commercial travellers, and it has raised the price of tobacco to the retailer, who has to be content with a smaller profit; and in some cases the combination has cut him down to such an extent that there is not anything approaching a livelihood in the distribution of the product.

Mr. KELLY.—If the honorable member is so certain of these facts, why refer the question of establishing a Government tobacco monopoly to a Royal Commission?

Mr. WATSON.—The fact that I am certain, and require no further convincing, does not preclude an element of doubt in the minds of some other people. I am so certain of the strength of my position that I am prepared to allow it to rest on the investigations of such a body as the honorable member has mentioned.

Mr. SALMON.—Is the honorable member sure with regard to the raising of the price?

Mr. WATSON.—Yes, quite sure. The price has been raised to the retailer. There is no doubt at all. Next, we have the proposal for a citizen defence force. Every member of the community has an equal interest in the defence of Australia, but, so far as property is concerned, the class whom we are so persistently alleged to represent peculiarly, have no particular interest in the defence of the country. Those who have most to lose do not, generally speaking, belong to what are ordinarily known as the labouring classes. So that I contend that in seeking for an efficient defence for Australia, and in demonstrating—as the Labour Party did during the last Parliament time and again—that we were prepared to vote any reasonable sum for expenditure on armaments and munitions of war, we were taking an action which was not in the interests of the section of a class that we are alleged to represent, but in the interests of the whole people of Australia. Another plank in our platform is that of the restriction of public borrowing. Can it be said that that is an evidence of anxiety to push the interests of a class? Who would gain most from the expenditure of borrowed money? If we were inclined to be extravagant, and to overlook the interests of the community as a whole, what would be more popular than to engage in an extravagant expenditure of money that is easily got, and which it would remain for "the other person" to repay? Surely it is a patriotic object on the part of the Labour Party to seek to educate the ordinary worker outside to have some regard, not only for his own interests, but for the interests of those who follow us, who would otherwise be asked to pay more than their fair share, as has been the case in connexion with the borrowing policy on which the States have been engaged. I contend that that policy is of a most patriotic character, and that no allegation of class consideration will lie against us in regard to it. I do not wish to enter at length into other points, but I may remark that the Navigation Bill also is of interest to all Australia. The suggested Commonwealth bank of deposit and issue cannot be said to be of interest to the class of manual labourers only.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Who have nothing to deposit.

Mr. WATSON.—Who certainly have no large sums to deposit, and have no particular concern as to what the rate of interest is. Again, the proposal to establish a life and fire assurance department is really of interest to all sections of the community. There is no particular reference to workmen as apart from other sections of the community in the proposal to simplify and cheapen the patent law. In short, I contend, in regard to the programme of the Federal Labour Party, and equally in regard to the programmes of the Labour Parties of the States, that I have shown sufficient to prove that no object purely sectional can be urged in respect of them. The proposals of the State Labour Party of New South Wales include measures—and include only those measures—that are for the interest of the whole community directly or indirectly. And so I hurl back the accusation at those gentlemen who accuse us of being here to represent class interests, and say that it is not the Labour Party that supports class interests but those gentlemen who are determined to uphold the existing order of things where class interests have already acquired a supremacy with which it is not desired, by some, at any rate, that we should interfere. Another question of difference between the present Government and ourselves is as to what we are told is Socialism.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Everything is Socialism now-a-days.

Mr. WATSON.—Everything that is proposed by the "other fellow" is Socialism. Everything that will benefit the "other fellow" is Socialism. But when a proposal is brought forward that will benefit, at the expense of the State, or with the assistance of the State, the farmers, for instance, who are so ably represented by the Minister of Trade and Customs, then we hear nothing of this cry about Socialism. The Prime Minister made a declaration about Socialism which, so far as I have been able to glean, is rather cryptic. He stated the other evening, in the House—

I place side by side with the ideal of using to the furthest extent the national power to promote the national good, the ideal of leaving every human being in a free country as free in the exercise of his individual rights and in the carrying on of his individual enterprise, as is consistent with the legitimate use of the national power for national ends.

What does it mean? There is not one member of the Labour Party who cannot subscribe to that proposition. Every one of us believes in allowing as much liberty to the individual as is consistent with the conservation of national ends. Not one iota do we differ from the general proposition that the right honorable gentleman puts forward. But he appears to have gone a great deal further in the statement he has been putting before the country—before, for instance, the farmers at Kyneton. There he declared an anti-socialistic crusade—that was to be the mission in life to which he would devote himself. The right honorable gentleman has been distinguished by a steady adhesion to the principles of free-trade for many years; and, finding that those principles are not exactly in popular favour at the present time, he now proposes to devote the rest of his political career to fighting Socialism. It would be interesting to know just where the limitations are in respect of his policy. When will the national ends refuse to be served? How soon will he draw the line between the interests of the nation and individual freedom of action? It is a truism that it should hardly be necessary to repeat that every form and attribute of government is an interference in some degree with the liberty of the individual. We cannot have government at all without impinging in some manner on the right of an individual to do as he likes. And, therefore, it is idle to talk about the "liberty of the subject"—about the desirability of allowing free play to the individualistic enterprise of each person. We know exactly where private enterprise will take people if we allow free scope, so far as the law is concerned. We know what advantage private enterprise took of the poor, the needy, the weak, and the young in the older land of England one hundred years ago or more. We know what advantage private enterprise is taking in the Southern States of America of the children in factories where there is no factory legislation. We know what private enterprise has accomplished in the way of sweating in this fair city of Melbourne, and the neighbouring city of Sydney, within the last few years, when there was freedom from any interference with the right of the individual to conduct his enterprise in his own way. It is absolutely essential that we should curb the greedy disposition which seems to come to so many of us. I do not say that any of us are so free from the possibility of falling into temptation that it would be safe to allow us to go without some curb or some direction on behalf of the community as to what our conduct in life is to be. It is utter moonshine to talk about allowing freedom to the individualistic enterprise of the people. As I have said, it is rather interesting to attempt to ascertain exactly what the propositions of the right honorable gentleman are in this regard.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Bland keeps explaining what those proposals are.

Mr. WATSON.—I do not pretend to do that—it is beyond my power. I am not sufficient of a seer to accomplish anything of that description. But we had a statement from the honorable member for Echuca which seems to explain the proposal. I was commenting last Thursday week on this aspect of affairs, and the honorable member for Echuca then stated that, in regard to the Prime Minister's speech at Kyneton, "the farmers knew what he meant." What did the Prime Minister mean? Is there some esoteric interpretation that is known only to the initiated? And, if so, what is that interpretation? Is it proposed by the right honorable gentleman, as indicated by the Postmaster-General the other day at Numurkah, that socialistic concessions are to be made to one class of the community only? Is that the proposal that is coming from the present Government? Are they to resist sternly every idea of the extension of socialistic enterprise—every idea of expanding the functions of government—except when the proposal is in the interests of the farmers or some other particular section of the community? The farmers at Kyneton, we are told, understood what the Prime Minister meant? Did they understand that the right honorable gentleman would offer no opposition to the socialistic proposals which were being put before the country at that particular conference?

Mr. HIGGINS.—The Prime Minister has said that he himself has no fault to find with the theory of Socialism.

Mr. REID.—I am afraid the legal interpretation of my actual words by the honorable and learned member is not quite correct.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I can give chapter and verse.

Mr. WATSON.—At Kyneton, where the Prime Minister spoke so eloquently about the evils of Socialism, we find the farmers in conference passing a resolution to form a political organization. Political organizations seem to be duplicating themselves everywhere. The farmers founded one at Kyneton, and the ex-Prime Minister, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, formed another at the latter place, and I dare say that, as a result of the coalition, it will be necessary to found yet another in order to give expression to the aims of this two-party Government. But at the Kyneton conference, the farmers not only decided to form an organization—called, I think, the Farmers and Producers' League—but declared that its main feature in all cases should be its opposition to socialistic candidates. Then, having done that much, they proceeded to ask the State Government for a Manure Protection Bill, so that private enterprise might not rob them, or be allowed to rob them, as they allege they have been robbed in the past. The conference also asked for reduced grain freights, and for wire netting on deferred payment. If the farmers do not believe in Socialism, why should they not provide their own wire netting? If every man is to stand on his own feet and rely on his own enterprise—if we are not to be "coddled by a paternal Government"—why do not the farmers find their own wire netting? The Kyneton conference also asked for a bonus on foxes' scalps, starving stock rates, cold storage for produce, agricultural colleges, grants for shows, the opening of new markets for fruits, lessons in tobacco manufacture, and an extension of the Crédit Foncier system of loans. And later there was a deputation from the same gentlemen, who asked Mr. Bent to find £1,000—

Mr. MAUGER.—Under another name.

Mr. WATSON.—That is so. They asked Mr. Bent for £1,000 to be devoted to the finding of new markets for compressed hay. Those are all proposals with which, so far as I am personally concerned, I heartily agree. I believe that producers in Australia have a hard row to hoe. We are such a distance from the markets of the world that it is wise to give every encouragement possible, so far as the central powers of the Government are concerned, in order that producers may successfully occupy the land. I have assisted in New South Wales men like the Prime Minister, the Postmaster-General, the honorable member for Parramatta, and the honorable member for Hume, to provide facilities for the producing population at the expense, and under the control of the State. But it comes with a very peculiar grace from those who are continually crying for State Socialism in the form of Government assistance to enter upon a campaign of anti-Socialism. I ask the Minister of Trade and Customs whether his anti-socialistic ideas carry him to the extent of refusing to establish agencies for the disposal of agricultural products abroad?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Or the growth of beet-root here.

Mr. WATSON.—Or to encourage the growth of beet-root here, as has just been suggested? I ask whether the honorable gentleman is prepared to refuse all requests for Government assistance of this kind as purely socialistic, or whether he proposes to extend socialistic help to one class only? That is the position I put before the present Ministry, and the Minister of Trade and Customs in particular. In my own opinion a great deal of what is said to-day about Socialism is quite beside the mark. Modern industrial conditions, as has been pointed out frequently, inevitably tend towards monopoly. The power of capital was never greater, as such, than it is to-day, and in every country in the world we find statesmen agreeing that there must be some curb put upon the power that capital is wielding. Everywhere that feeling is finding expression in legislation of one kind and another. While that is so, while in America we have anti-trust legislation—which is partially successful, but in regard to which it may be found necessary even there to go much further—and while in other parts of the world also we find just the same complaint being made about the power of combined capital and its effect, not only upon the smaller capitalists, but upon the general community—when we see that condition of affairs existing, it is idle to seek to frighten the people by raising the bogey of Socialism. We were told the other evening by the Prime Minister that the Labour Party were sharpening wedges to be driven right into the heart of human and industrial liberty. Well, we have been at that game in Australia for very many years, if the people would only recognise what they have been doing. Long before the Labour Party came into existence, and before there was any suggestion of a Labour Party, there were wise men in the land who found it necessary to prevent private enterprise from securing control of those great national sources of wealth which might be converted into monopolies against the interests of the people. We had, years ago, I am glad to say, men of sufficient prescience to realize that our railways should not be handed over to private enterprise. We had men like the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, who saw that, so far as his own Colony was concerned, at any rate, the great natural water resources were not handed over to private individuals. I honour the honorable and learned gentleman, and shall continue to do so if he has nothing else to his credit but the one fact that he so roused the people of Victoria that they conserved these facilities for the use of the people generally. Even if advantage were not taken of his legislation immediately upon strict business principles, the great fact is there that Victoria has shown the lead in socialistic enterprise so far as water conservation is concerned in Australia.

Mr. HUME COOK.—It is a pity the Melbourne tram system is not in the same category.

Mr. WATSON.—It is indeed, and not merely for the sake of the labouring men who work the trams, but for the sake of citizens of Melbourne who cannot afford a threepenny ride, and are, in consequence, compelled to walk—

Mr. HUME COOK.—Compare the Melbourne system with that in operation in Sydney.

Mr. WATSON.—People in the neighbouring city are enabled for one-third of the price to travel, in many instances, quite as far as they travel in Melbourne for three-pence. We are told by an organizer of the Employers' Union—the body now standing behind the present Government with all its power and force—that the success of the trams in Sydney or Glasgow when owned on behalf of the people cannot be taken as a criterion, because, as he said, there is no competition. I ask what competition is there in Melbourne, where a private syndicate controls the tram system? There is no competition here, and yet the people do not benefit as the result. It is worthy of remark that the trams in Sydney, notwithstanding the fact that they are carrying a huge amount of dead capital owing to the transfer from steam to electric traction, during last year paid more than the interest and other charges, and, in addition to that, carried the population of the city many times over at an average rate of about $\frac{1}{2}$ d. per mile.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I wonder how much the Melbourne tram system pays?

Mr. WATSON.—We have no means of ascertaining accurately what the Melbourne trams pay, but it is certain that they do not afford the same measure of convenience to the people at the same cost that is afforded by the tram system in operation in Sydney. So far as the complaint about Socialism is concerned, it seems to me that the proper policy for the people of Australia is to weigh fairly and honestly every proposal to extend the benefits of government.

Mr. MAUGER.—Hear, hear; to consider it on its merits.

Mr. WATSON.—On its merits. If proposals are clearly laid down first as to the necessity for governmental action, and if that is conceded, then every care should be taken to put the management of the Government, municipal or other socialistic works on such a basis as will reasonably insure their working in the interests of the community at large. I am free to confess that if I had to choose between having a Government institution worked under a system of political patronage, where every Member of Parliament would be free to use his influence in the direction of having concessions made to himself or his friends—if I had to choose between that form of government or municipal enterprise and private enterprise, I should quickly choose private enterprise. Unless we have a patriotic determination on the part of Parliament to provide proper safeguards for the management of these concerns, to conduct them on business principles, so far as is consistent with a due regard for the interests of those employed—applying humanitarian principles, we shall not be justified in extending the sphere of governmental interference. But I say that, with these safeguards, and assuming, as we have a right to assume, that the people of Australia will continue to send into Parliament men who are honest, patriotic, and desirous of forwarding the interests of the people as a whole, we have nothing to fear as the result of this governmental interference. What is the contrary position? That we are to pursue a policy of stagnation or of retrogression. That is to say, we must be prepared to extend only a callous hearing to those who come to us and complain of the conditions in which they have to live. If we take up the attitude of the cold-blooded Spencerian doctrinaire, that we should have regard only to the survival of the fittest, that every person must battle for himself in the struggle of life, and that no effort is to be put forward, so far as Government is concerned, to save the weak from the power of the strong, then indeed the state of things cannot be other than one of hopelessness and despair, so far as the great bulk of the population is concerned. I ask what there is to-day before the ordinary labouring man in Australia, though perhaps he is better off here than in many other parts of the world? It is true that occasionally the newspapers will mention the fact that one or other individual has managed after great efforts to emerge from the ruck, and he is pointed to as an example of what is possible for all others. They say: "Brown, Jones, or Robinson has succeeded; why not others?" But very often when the individual succeeds, he does so at the expense of others, so that the blood and tears of the many have contributed to the success of the few. But even if that were not the result of the success of those individuals who have managed to struggle through, it is evident that all cannot be successful under the conditions which now obtain. Yet, unless we hold out to our people some hope for the future, unless we instil into them the belief that there is inherent in the power of Governments the possibility to achieve something for them and to lighten their load in some measure, they, instead of advancing, will go back, because nothing so much tends to lower a man's self-respect and to lessen his struggles for advancement as does hopelessness. What is there of hope in the declaration that we must resist, as the Prime Minister has said, every attempt to extend Socialism in the shape of governmental interference? I can understand that the honorable and learned members for Parkes and Wannon, and one or two other honorable members of the same way of thinking, should take up that position because it is the logical outcome of the doctrines which they hold. They believe that it is better to let the weakest fail or go to the wall, because those who survive will be better than those who have gone before, and the net result will be an improved race; that, even though evil may ensue in the meantime, the end justifies the means. Those views are, I think, out of harmony with the doctrines which a Christian nation should hold. It is out of place in a country like Australia to say that the Government should stand idly by and allow those who have the power to use every opportunity for self-advancement, regardless of the interests of their fellows. That, to my mind, is a doctrine which will not be approved by the people of Australia, if they are asked to express an opinion upon it. While the members of the Opposition differ on some points, we are in agreement upon the general principle that it is our duty, when we see that the power of the State can be used beneficially, efficiently, and safely, to so use it. I contend that that principle can be applied in all the avenues of public affairs; and it will be the guiding principle of those who sit on this side of the Chamber in regard to all matters that come up for public decision. The question is not whether, from the stand-point of the doctrine, we should interfere, but how far, when interference has been proved necessary in the interests of the great mass of the community, we can safely go. We, therefore, accept the challenge which the right honorable gentleman has put forward. He stands to-day for those who believe in marking time, and for those who believe in going back; for stagnation, and for retrogression. In respect to the principle of governmental interference, he stands for marking time; in respect to the past legislation of this Parliament, he stands for retrogression, because he has informed us that it is his intention, so soon as he shall have the power, to take steps to repeal some of the provisions which are so obnoxious to him.

Mr. McDONALD.—That is not in the programme of the Government.

Mr. WATSON.—No, but that is the intention declared by the right honorable gentleman on the hustings, and the announcement was supplemented by a statement to the same effect made in this Chamber last week. Therefore, there is a clear-cut issue between the present Government and those in Opposition, quite apart from the immediate programme which has been put forward. The question is not whether the Papuan Bill, the Trade Marks Bill, or an amending Electoral Bill should be carried, nor is it whether honorable gentlemen opposite, for whom personally I have the highest respect, shall continue to occupy the Treasury Benches. It is whether the people of Australia sympathize with the declaration of policy which has been made by the Government, whether they are prepared to go back upon that which their representatives in Parliament have done, and whether they are prepared to indorse the idea that private enterprise should be allowed full sway, and that interference on behalf of the community as a whole should be refused. I believe that the people are opposed to that idea, and that they will on a future occasion declare themselves to be opposed to it. That being so, I think it is my duty, in common with other honorable members who sit on this side of the Chamber, to try to ascertain whether the Government represent the majority of the House. I have been moved to my present action primarily by the considerations which I have put forward; but, in addition, by the desire to clear the political atmosphere, to make sure of how honorable members stand. I feel that the Prime Minister has no right to complain of a straightforward, open attack of this character, against which he has an opportunity to defend himself, the people being asked in the last resort to judge between the two parties.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—I do not at all question the right of honorable gentlemen sitting opposite to table the motion which the leader of the Opposition has just moved; but there is a marked difference between the motion involving the existence of the then Government which I moved some three years ago, and that which the leader of the Opposition has just moved. On the occasion to which I refer, I stated, in my motion, the grounds of principle upon which I asked the House to censure the then Administration; but my honorable friend has taken a different course. He has made a speech which amounts to the raising of an issue of vast national importance somewhere else. His closing sentences could have no meaning at all if applied to the position of honorable members who are now sitting in this Chamber. They point to a decision upon vital matters of national importance, which cannot be made by us. Although the honorable gentleman has framed his motion as if this were a mere domestic squabble between the "ins" and the "outs," he might well have framed it in such a way as to bring to the service of this party fight the declaration of some large principles, in respect to which the two sides of the House are at issue. We find it necessary, however, to interpret the motion by the way in which it has been supported. The leader of the Opposition has no serious fault to find with our proposed procedure for the present session.

But he complains that the Ministry which has just come into office is not sufficiently foolhardy to regard itself as fit to work out a deliberate matured policy for a session which cannot possibly begin for the next six or eight months. We are not heaven-born statesmen like those gentlemen who recently sat on these benches. We have had sufficient experience to know that whilst it is easy to make speeches in this House, especially from the other side, the position is different when one assumes vast responsibilities, and when the welfare of a great Commonwealth is intrusted to a Ministry, with reference to its policy. I think I can claim that I am supported in this Ministry by men of experience who have held high positions in the Governments of the States, who are men of affairs, and who know the difficulties of such a position; and we have had too much sense to profess to introduce, out of season, and six months before the time, anything like a declaration of policy upon large measures of national concern. Surely it is not a ground of censure that we do not come down now with the policy which we shall have to submit to Parliament, if Parliament continues to exist, somewhere about the middle of next year. My honorable friend the leader of the Opposition did pursue that course in a mild way.

Mr. POYNTON. — The right honorable gentleman asked him to do so.

Mr. REID.—Surely my innocent friend, the honorable member for Grey, does not consider that because I ask a Minister to do anything, he need do it? The leader of the Opposition is not a puppet. I do not pull him with a string. If I allowed my honorable friends to pull me with a string, it would not be quite so well for me.

Mr. POYNTON. — The right honorable gentleman could not pull the leader of the Opposition with a string.

Mr. REID.—I am glad to have the certificate of the honorable member. I am merely alluding to important facts. I presume that the leader of the Opposition spoke as the result of studied intention. I am sure that my honorable friend did not make that announcement with regard to the tobacco monopoly and the banks' reserves because I asked him to do so.

Mr. POYNTON.—He made the announcement because he was not ashamed to state his intentions.

Mr. REID.—My honorable friend said something else just now. He said that I had asked the leader of the Opposition to make that announcement. My honorable friend, the leader of the Opposition, did project himself into the future with reference to some measures for a future session.

Mr. WATSON.—Even then we were told that our programme was a crawling one.

Mr. REID.—I suppose we all have to hear a number of epithets. We all have to put up with them. Probably no man in Australia has had to go to bed with more epithets than I have, but I have never grumbled. I never meet honorable members with a scowl merely because I know them to be utterly wrong. I wish to say on the present occasion that, whilst in my opinion the leader of the Opposition may justify projecting his mind forward to a distant session—so far as the practical business of Parliament is concerned, the House wants to know what it has to do during the session it is in, and wants to know that clearly. It likes to leave Ministers—especially those who have just come into office—some reasonable time for consultation and investigation before they commit themselves to definite measures of large importance. Our policy was to close this session with all reasonable expedition after certain work had been done. I hope that honorable members will recollect the simple fact that we did not come into office as soon as we should have done. I ought to have been here years ago; but, as a matter of fact, the present Ministry has just come into existence. As another matter of fact, the session was six months' old when it came into existence, and, as a further matter of fact, we all hope, apart from party fights, to adjourn at a reasonable time before the end of the year, as the House has always endeavoured to do. Therefore, honorable members will see that to talk of the Ministry elaborating, within two or three months, a great national policy, which is to be announced nine months hence, is to make a demand of the kind that is only urged by a leader of the Opposition when moving a vote of censure. There was a singular omission from the statement made by the leader of the Opposition. We have heard nothing from him about the alliance—not a single word about the gigantic mountain which has brought forth two mice.

Mr. WATSON.—We shall tell the right honorable gentleman all about that.

Mr. REID.—No doubt; but does not my honorable friend think that when he enters into an alliance with bodies of public men who have the fate of the Commonwealth in their hands, this House should be the medium through which the public are made acquainted with the arrangements of the alliance?

Mr. WEBSTER.—Did the right honorable gentleman do that in respect of the coalition?

Mr. REID.—I did everything in the most public way.

Mr. WATSON.—So did we.

Mr. REID.—May I suggest to my honorable friend that there was no coalition; that there was a memorandum drawn up by my friend the honorable and learned member for Ballarat and myself—

Mr. HIGGINS.—And agreed to.

Mr. REID.—Will the honorable and learned member listen? That memorandum was submitted to the two parties, who did not agree to it. Surely, in the stress of this vote of censure motion we are not going to emasculate our memories. Surely I am not called upon to inform my honorable and learned friend of accurate judgment that, as a matter of fact, the party led by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat did not accept that proposal.

Mr. HIGGINS.—But the right honorable gentleman agreed to it.

Mr. REID.—I am glad I am making my honorable friends lively. It was quite beyond the efforts of the leader of the Opposition to stir up honorable members on this side of the House. I hope, however, that the clamour which sometimes prevails in public meetings will not characterize our proceedings.

Mr. MAUGER.—Would not that help the right honorable gentleman?

Mr. REID.—Not if it assumed the form of unseemly noise. The basis upon which the alliance was proposed was set down in black and white, and published in all the newspapers, but that alliance was never consummated. There was neither an alliance nor a coalition, because one party refused to join on the basis suggested. Nothing came of that proposal. In the meantime the late Ministry deliberately dug a pit for themselves, and buried themselves.

Mr. WEBSTER.—And the right honorable gentleman knocked them on the head.

Mr. REID.—I do not mind a certain amount of interruption, but when I am just beginning a sentence I do not wish to be interfered with. I have a great deal to say on the present occasion, and I would remind honorable members opposite that the leader of the Opposition was not greatly interrupted when he was speaking.

Mr. WEBSTER.—He never gave cause.

Mr. REID.—Is this a hall for free discussion? Must I speak with bated breath here, before the representatives of the only real democracy? Now, the leader of the Opposition, when he sat in the more serene position which he occupied in the Opposition corner, said that there had been a great deal of talk about alliances. Of course, to the honorable member, at that time, alliances were anathema maranatha. He was at the head of a solid party which was steadily marching, within its own highly disciplined ranks, to dominate the policy of Australia. The honorable member never thought then that he would have to embrace the honorable and learned member for Indi. When I heard my honorable friend's discreet and studied utterances this afternoon I could not help remembering—with a slight alteration—the language of old Abraham—

The voice was the voice of Esau.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Oh, oh!

Mr. REID.—I announced, Mr. Speaker, that I intended to alter the quotation—

But the hands were the hands of Isaac.

The leader of the Opposition said, "There has been a good deal of talk about alliances, but we"—that is the solid party—"have no serious intentions of our own until we have a majority who subscribe to our platform." Have these gentlemen subscribed to the platform? If so, it has been done in the Parliamentary vaults.

Mr. WATSON.—From where did the right honorable member obtain that quotation?

Mr. REID.—I am speaking from memory, but it is contained in the speech which the honorable member delivered upon the Address-in-Reply, at the opening of this House.

Mr. WATSON.—Years have elapsed since then.

Mr. REID.—I know that very much has happened. It is a new Mr. Watson that we have now. When the honorable member for Bland was the leader of the elect, with no strangers admitted, he practically affirmed that until the Labour Party had a majority of members who would subscribe to its platform, it did not hope to exercise any position of authority in this House. Now, I ask, "Has that subscription been made?" Have those honorable and industrious gentlemen really got an alliance at all. Because I accept the declarations made by duly admitted members of the Labour Party. I know that no member of that party, when he refers to the proceedings of the caucus, speaks wide of the truth. There is no member of the Labour Party in whose accuracy I have more sublime confidence than in that of the honorable member for Perth. He is a genuine member of the Labour Party—a man who has stood his ground against every opponent in a fair and honorable way—and this is what he is reported to have said at a “Pleasant Sunday Afternoon” meeting which was held on Sunday last—

Where was the necessity or advantage of an alliance? He, for one, would never indorse any attempt of that kind.

Mr. FOWLER.—That is correct.

Mr. REID.—The leader of the Opposition has not got a majority now. His majority has gone.

Mr. SPENCE. — The honorable member for Perth cannot be “trapped” in that way.

Mr. REID.—My honorable friend will do what he deems to be right, and I do not care which way he votes, because he will still inspire my respect.

Mr. SPENCE. — Let us be thankful for small mercies.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member for Perth is not a small mercy, and the Labour Party ought to be proud of him. Continuing, the honorable member is reported to have said—

The labour movement was liberal enough for any one wishing to associate with it, and, so far from there being any advantages in an alliance, there were very grave disadvantages. Was it not a tendency on the part of many supporters of the movement to be enticed away by some red herring across the trail?

Does that refer to the honorable and learned member for Indi?

It might be protection, or it might be free-trade. The so-called alliance never had any vitality, and was doomed from the outset to disruption.

What an unhappy pair of political twins. This is a pronouncement by one who has been in the nursery.

Mr. SPENCE.—That applies to the Ministerial coalition.

Mr. REID. — If I were quoting the honorable member for Darling he might say that, but I am quoting a gentleman of a different stamp. The report continues—

It was resorted to only as a very temporary expedient—

That is where I do not come in. What is the temporary expedient of this alliance? It is not a matter of public policy. It is a sort of uneasy movement on the part of my honorable friends opposite, for which I have no word of censure, because every man has a right to better himself.

Mr. WATSON.—That is worthy of the right honorable gentleman.

Mr. REID.—Surely political ambition is not a thing of which we ought to be ashamed?

Mr. WATSON. — The right honorable member insinuated more than that.

Mr. REID.—My honorable friend does me an injustice when he says so. Surely political ambition is not a dishonorable thing. I have never been ashamed to avow it myself. I have been criticised because I did so, but I despise such criticism. A man in public life who has no ambition has no right to be there.

Mr. HUGHES. — There can be such a thing as dishonorable ambition.

Mr. REID.—I am not attributing that sort of ambition to honorable members opposite. The honorable member for Perth continued—

It was resorted to only as a very temporary expedient, but there were always within the ranks of the party those who regarded it as contrary to the principles of the labour movement.

Have we not always been told that office as compared with the principles of the labour movement was as dust? Could we deflect these pure unselfish patriots from the path of loyalty to the labour movement for the sake of a vote upon a motion of censure? Never! But the voice from within has been heard at last. Hitherto we have been unable to learn what the caucus really did, but we have always been told what it did not do. Whenever anybody made a statement as to what was done at the caucus meetings of the Labour Party, we were always assured that nothing of the kind ever occurred. Nobody has ever told us what did occur. Now, however, we have a gleam of daylight.

Mr. CROUCH.—It must be interesting to the right honorable member to know that principles exist.

Mr. REID.—Continuing, the honorable member for Perth is reported to have said—

Those members felt it was unnecessary and objectionable, and their ideas had at least received the assent of a majority of their colleagues.

Mr. FOWLER.—That is incorrectly reported.

Mr. REID.—I wanted my honorable friend to follow the quotation. Does he repudiate any other portion of it?

Mr. FOWLER.—I do not.

Mr. REID.—That is a straightforward statement. Now we can understand why the alliance has not been talked about.

Mr. WATSON.—It will be loyally adhered to.

Mr. REID.—If the masters of the Labour Party in this Parliament will allow it to be adhered to. I should like to refer to the language of the overtures which were made to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. We have a letter in the handwriting of the honorable member for Bland dealing with the subject, and I hope that the honorable member for Grey will agree that it is correct.

Mr. WATSON.—I hope that the Prime Minister can decipher the letter.

Mr. REID.—It is in print. In the later alliance, which does not seem to have a very healthy existence—

Mr. GROOM.—Does the Prime Minister—

Mr. REID.—The honorable and learned member is all right. After some years he is at last beginning to see daylight. I wish to quote certain remarks made in a letter written to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat by the present leader of the Opposition. The Labour Party, which pursued its lonely course above the mere adventitious transitions of ordinary politicians who form alliances, has suddenly developed, so far as politics go, a most amorous condition. There was an approach to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat—

Mr. WATSON.—At his invitation.

Mr. DEAKIN.—Hear, hear.

Mr. REID.—I will take it as the honorable member pleases. There was an approach; but, although the young lady was willing, it did not come off, and now my honorable friend, the leader of the Opposition, finding no one else whom he can embrace, cultivates the melancholy personality of the honorable and learned member for Indi. Instead of this new alliance being greeted with delight by the whole family, there seems to be all the elements of a first class family quarrel.

Mr. WATSON.—Not at all.

Mr. REID.—My honorable friend is all right, and so is the honorable and learned member for Indi; but there are other persons who have to some extent to study these matters.

Mr. ISAACS.—Does the Prime Minister feel all right?

Mr. REID. — The honorable and learned member will have an opportunity to speak later on, and, unfortunately, I shall not be able to reply to him. Let me quote one of the proposals contained in the letter written by the present leader of the Opposition to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat—

Members of the joint party to be supported at the elections after the manner usual in all parties during continuance of an alliance.

That suggested something like a free body of men. But something else has since happened. Let us compare that, which sounds perfectly fair and reasonable, with the humble tone of the arrangement made by the new alliance—

Each to use its influence individually and collectively—

This is where the legal intellect comes in! An ordinary member of the Labour Party could not resort to all these legal subtleties of expression, bred of keen suspicion—with its organizations and supporters, and secure support for and immunity from opposition to members of either party during the currency of the alliance.

The alliance between the Labour Party and the followers of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat was to be free. In that case there was talk of equality, party with party—the usual alliance—and a promise that “we shall give the usual support.” But even that assurance had to be repudiated. The honorable member for Bland, and the party of which he is leader, were to use their influence over their organizations, but that influence has failed.

Mr. WATSON.—No.

Mr. REID.—It has failed in that particular part of Australia that concerns the honorable and learned member for Indi.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—It is a “Rock of Ages” cleft for him.

Mr. REID.—Does my honorable friend say that the Political Labour Council of Victoria has not passed a resolution refusing to use its influence in the way referred to?

Mr. WATSON.—No; they say that they will make no promise; but that it rests with the branch leagues and not with the central executive to decide the matter.

Mr. REID.—Exactly; so that my honorable friends have still the blessing of a reprieve. The fate which seemed to look so black is still subject to possible revision, if the principals do not repudiate the bargain made by the agents on their behalf. I wish to take a somewhat retrospective view, and to show what, in my opinion, makes this alliance—if it be a real alliance—

Mr. MALONEY.—The right honorable member will find out that it is.

Mr. REID.—I desire to criticise it if it be a real alliance; but there are some who evidently do not believe that it is. I wish the House to look back to the history of the situation which has arisen in connexion with one matter which my honorable friends in the Opposition corner profess to be anxious about—a revision of the Tariff, in the way of helping some of the protectionist industries that are said to be in distress. That is the basis of the alliance which my honorable friends in the Opposition corner have put before the country. It is not love of the Labour Party, nor belief in its principles, that has caused them to ally themselves with that party. I do not deny that a large number of their views are in sympathy with those of the party, just as is the case with honorable members on this side.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Not many Government supporters are in sympathy with us.

Mr. REID.—But my honorable friends in the Opposition corner put themselves in the position I have mentioned. It is not ambition; it is not a desire to injure an unfortunate individual who happens to be in the road—it is not anything of that sort that has led them to take this step. It is a great public necessity. There are protectionist industries in distress, they say, and in order to rescue them they have formed this alliance. Have honorable members of the Labour Party, who, I may say, all their lives long have stood loyally by the cause of free-trade, agreed to this compact?

Mr. WEBSTER.—The right honorable gentleman has left them in the lurch.

Mr. REID.—I ask that question, and I think that I am entitled to do so.

Mr. HUGHES.—Oh!

Mr. REID.—The honorable and learned member for West Sydney came to me before the last general election, and I took advantage of our meeting to put some questions to him on a subject which I had to consider prior to the election taking place. I then asked him, as I was fairly entitled, in a humble way, to do, a certain question. Whatever the support of the Free-trade Party may be worth, we have always given it to the honorable and learned member in his candidature for West Sydney.

Mr. HUGHES.—The Prime Minister knows that he opposed me tooth and nail at the first election at which I stood; but that I was returned in spite of that opposition.

Mr. REID.—I did not know the honorable and learned member at that time.

Mr. HUGHES.—But I was returned.

Mr. REID.—The honorable and learned member was then a perfect stranger to me. How many years ago was this?

Mr. HUGHES.—At the elections held in 1894, when the right honorable member himself was almost unknown.

Mr. REID.—Cannot I bring my honorable and learned friend closer to the facts of to-day than that? Is it necessary now to make, so to speak, a hurried expedition to the North Pole? I asked the honorable and learned member, as I was entitled to ask him, what was his position with reference to the labour pledges, and he gave me a perfectly fair explanation, saying, "I am perfectly free on a vote of censure."

Mr. HUGHES.—Touching the fiscal question.

Mr. REID.—I understood that the honorable and learned member meant that he was perfectly free to vote as he pleased on a motion of censure, whatever it might be.

Mr. HUGHES.—Oh, no!

Mr. REID.—I may have been mistaken—

Mr. HUGHES.—The matter has been frequently explained. I told the right honorable gentleman that I was perfectly free, except in regard to a plank in our platform.

Mr. REID.—I did not know that a vote of censure was a plank in the Labour Party's platform.

Mr. HUGHES.—A vote of censure might involve a plank in the platform.

Mr. REID.—Then the honorable and learned member thinks that the present motion of censure involves a plank in the labour platform?

Mr. HUGHES.—It involves the whole of them.

Mr. REID.—It, perhaps, involves one of the Ministerial planks. The honorable and learned member very fairly gave me the information that, on the fiscal question, he was perfectly free to vote according to his views. The honorable member for Canobolas was in the same position. I am not putting it that these honorable members ever asked us for our support; but I say that they did run, on the fiscal question under the colours of the free-traders of New South Wales.

Mr. WILKS.—They did not refuse that support.

Mr. HUGHES.—The statement is not quite accurate, but it is near enough. We could have so run had we wished to do so.

Mr. REID.—They were bracketed day after day with our candidates, and I never received any complaints on the subject. That is all I will say. The honorable member for Canobolas was returned unopposed. I am not making any imputations. I feel sure that there is not one free-trader in the Labour Party who has sold himself on the Tariff revision question to the honorable gentlemen in the corner. That is all I say.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That is funny!

Mr. REID.—It is not a bit funny. If honorable members opposite had sold themselves—I do not believe it; I will not believe it for a moment—it would not be funny at all. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am only mentioning that in order to come back to what I consider an outrageous attempt to violate public faith. I say it is an outrageous attempt.

Mr. POYNTON.—Say that again!

Mr. REID.—I do not think it is necessary; I am going to prove it. I think it is a matter that concerns the public far more than the question who is to hold office. If people are to be allowed to betray their promises to their electors the electors had better know it. I suppose that the policy of the Deakin party may fairly be quoted from the lips of the then Prime Minister, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. In the opening speech of his campaign, the honorable and learned member described my attitude by saying that I had greatly come down in my demands. He said that I had asked for a mild Tariff revision, and that "it was only a little one." Then my honorable and learned friend went on to say that he knew that industries were being injured by the Tariff. So that this is no new discovery which has just been made. It is nothing new. The then Prime Minister said—

Some industries have been destroyed by this Tariff; some others have been injured, and many have not been assisted.

So that the then Prime Minister went before the people of Australia, telling them, "We do not like this Tariff; it has destroyed some industries; it has injured others; it has not assisted some others; but, nevertheless, I say that the policy which I put before the people"—

Mr. MAUGER.—He had not the faintest idea of the extent of the injury.

Mr. REID.—May I read what the honorable and learned member for Ballarat said before the election? He said—

The clean cut issue, then, in the contest now to be commenced, lies between those who hold with us that what we need is time to adjust ourselves to our new conditions without another Tariff campaign in Parliament.

What is the Opposition corner trying to bring about? A new Tariff campaign in this Parliament. In the debate on the Address-in-Reply, the three leaders of the House declared the verdict recorded by the electors of Australia, in the following words:—

Mr. DEAKIN.—The fiscal issue is dead and buried during this Parliament, at all events.

Mr. REID.—I recognise that that is the verdict of the constituencies.

Mr. WATSON.—I share the gratification of the Prime Minister that with the last election the issue, as between free-trade and protection, has disappeared for some time to come, at any rate, so far as the Tariff is concerned.

Practically the fiscal issue is dead, at any rate, so far as this Parliament is concerned.

Even Sir William Lyne, in returning thanks at Albury, said—

The fiscal question should never have been raised in this election, because, owing to the stringency of the financial clauses of the Constitution it was impossible to have either protection or free-trade. Whatever party was in power, the only possible Tariff must be very similar to that now in force, and until the expiration of the Braddon clause it was in vain for either party to dream of radical alterations.

I want to go a little further. I have here some quotations from the leading protectionist organ. One was published after the speech to which I have referred. It is contained in a leading article, published on the 30th October, 1903.

Mr. TUDOR.—In what newspaper?

Mr. REID.—In the Age.

The first and foremost necessity of the time is a truce on the fiscal question.

The word "truce" is used. It was not recognised some months afterwards.

Mr. MAUGER.—The right honorable member would not recognise it then.

Mr. REID.—I am referring to the attempt made in a certain quarter to deny that they ever used the word "truce."

The first and foremost necessity of the time is a truce on the fiscal question. As long as that struggle goes on it bars the way to any progressive legislation on other national and social questions.

I now give a number of others—

6.11.1903.—The issue is clear enough—Preferential Trade, a White Australia, and Fiscal Peace.

23.11.1903.—This being the position, protectionists are compelled to concentrate all their strength upon the single item of fiscal peace, including the addendum of preferential trade within the Empire.

7.12.1903.—They (the electors) wish either for fiscal peace or for fiscal war again. They would have the present Tariff let alone pending the Imperial preferential proposals, or ripped up again as soon as Parliament meets.

But the issue on which the bulk of the community is divided is fiscal peace or fiscal war.—Mr. Deakin or Mr. Reid.

10.12.1903.—Now, whether we like it or not, we cannot get away from the questions which are at issue—fiscal peace under Mr. Deakin, or fiscal war under Mr. Reid. It all comes down to that in the end.

14.12.1903.—We cannot doubt, from the history of many Victorian elections, that liberal protectionists form the vast majority of the voters of this State. These people all want to see the Tariff battle cease for a few years. They want fiscal peace as proclaimed by the Deakin Government.

16.12.1903.—To-day the electors will return their verdict. They are to-day more truly a jury in their country's cause. For this State, we know beforehand, the overwhelming preponderance of the popular voice is for the Deakin Government and fiscal peace as against Reid and another fiscal war.

18.12.1903.—The net result of the whole polling in all the six States is to leave the strength of the respective parties almost exactly as before, with, perhaps, a gain of one seat to the Government, and a more solid vote than ever for fiscal peace and preferential trade. Indeed, on the one chief point which Mr. Reid insisted on making his battle cry—that of Tariff revision—he is hopelessly beaten.

19.12.1903.—When the new Houses meet, the Opposition will find itself powerless to make an effectual attack on the Tariff. That matter is, therefore, at rest for three years at least.

There can be no longer any doubt about the verdict of the people on this fiscal issue. The new Parliament will contain at least a majority of nine protectionists, and a majority of twenty-nine pledged to fiscal peace.

30.12.1903.—The free-traders, having fought and lost the late election as enemies of fiscal peace, are now putting out feelers for an alliance with the protectionists. . . . It is much more useful to recall to mind the true division of parties as they came from the country on the issues fought there. These are—

Members pledged for fiscal peace	...	51
Members for fiscal war	...	24

When Mr. Reid says he does not think the fiscal question can be re-opened, he may be thanked for nothing.

1.1.1904.—For one thing, we have cast off definitely the threats of the free-trade leader that he would force a new struggle over the Tariff.

As to the fiscal question, that will be at rest for a few years at least; and for this respite every one will be thankful.

Reid.

4.1.1904.—The Prime Minister (Mr. Deakin) has just made manifest one of the good results of getting the fiscal question out of the way.

That was published this year! Now I will pass on. We came out of this contest before the electors as representatives of the people. The then Prime Minister, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, honorably acknowledged the issue that he put to the people, and he was gratified, as he might well be, at the fact that an unmistakable majority had responded to his demand for a fiscal truce, and that there should be no Tariff campaign in the new Parliament. Whilst the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, the then Prime Minister, was making this statement, I interjected "Yes, I must admit that was the decision of the constituencies."

Mr. MAUGER.—That was after the event.

Mr. REID.—Could I be beaten before? That interjection only shows the unhappy position which a Prime Minister is placed in. I am blamed for having said after the election what could not have been said before!

Mr. MAUGER.—What I meant was, that the right honorable gentleman would not accept the truce before.

Mr. REID. — Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that amid all our personal controversies, something is due in the way of information to the great mass of the people outside, in the light of two statements made by the leader of the Opposition—one at the opening of the House after the election, and the other at Wagga Wagga only a month or two ago. I think I am entitled to ask my honorable friend whether he has promised the honorable and learned member for Indi that he will consent to the re-opening of the Tariff in this Parliament in order to make it more protective.

Mr. WATSON.—I am sticking to the alliance programme.

Mr. REID.—There is a fearless public man who always says what he means! He is sticking to a long document drawn up by a clever lawyer! I will read what the document says presently, if my honorable friend will resort to a lawyer's subtleties.

Mr. WATSON.—I will take advantage of my opportunity in reply to say a word or two.

Mr. REID.—I shall not have an opportunity to reply then. The leader of the Opposition before the election, in a speech on 12th November, said—

He would not, under any circumstances, be a party to the disturbance of the fiscal peace now reached.

That was a statement made by the honorable member when he was addressing men whom he asked to vote for him on the faith of his honour as a public man. Are members to write out these promises that they intend to keep, and sign and seal them, so that there may be no mistake as to the promises which they intend to keep, and the promises which they do not? Are not the electors entitled to accept such a statement from any honorable member, especially from a fearless, straightforward member such as my friend has always been? I am absolutely sure that the leader of the Opposition, in making that statement, honestly and honorably meant it; I am not throwing any doubt on that for one moment. When the House met, the leader of the Opposition again spoke, and though I am not quoting his exact words, honorable members will remember that he rejoiced that the fiscal question was dead, for this Parliament at any rate. On the 9th August, not much more than a month ago, the honorable member, as Prime Minister, spoke at the same place, Wagga, where he had given the promise to which I have referred. It is a double promise—a promise made by a man seeking the trust of the electors, and a promise by the Prime Minister of Australia, addressing the men who had trusted him. On that occasion the leader of the Opposition said—

I believe there is no probability of any appeal for the alteration of the Tariff being responded to during this present Parliament.

By the 9th August, we had heard wails of distress from the wailing member for Bourke, who, on a motion for the adjournment of the House, gave us a number of statements about the bad effects of the Tariff. I suppose the Prime Minister had heard that lengthy speech; but, at any rate, if he was not present, he must have heard something about it, and, knowing of those statements from the corner, he went to his electors and said what I have just quoted. Now I come to this compact. The honorable member will not give me, or rather the public, an answer; I am not entitled to an answer, while the public are.

Mr. WATSON.—The public will get an answer.

Mr. REID.—Then I ask the honorable member not to wait too many days, because the public are entitled to the latest information.

Mr. WATSON.—Yes, from those in authority.

Mr. REID.—This compact in writing is what the public have got from the honorable member.

Legislation (including Tariff legislation)—

Mr. GROOM.—Read it all.

Mr. REID.—Do not hurry me too much. The honorable and learned member may have written this paragraph, and is listening with the pride of a parent. The paragraph is as follows:—

14. Legislation (including Tariff legislation), shown to be necessary—

- (1) To develop Australian resources;
- (2) To preserve, encourage, and benefit Australian industries, primary and secondary;
- (3) To secure fair conditions of labour—and so on. A free-trader can read those words in a free-trade sense just as easily as a protectionist can read them in a protectionist sense.

Mr. MAUGER.—Then why worry over it?

Mr. REID.—I am coming to something more important. I am not worrying; it is the honorable member who will worry before all is over. I am beginning the worry, that is all. Those are words which speak to the ear in a double sense. Free-traders champion low duties, because they believe—they may be wrong, but they honestly believe—that a system of low duties helps to stimulate the great industries of Australia. The protectionist takes an opposite view, and thinks that a high scale of duties is necessary to that end. And, as I have said, a free-trader and a protectionist can read that paragraph as having opposite meanings. This is a clever legal document—strictly legal—but it is not the sort of information the public desire. The public do not wish for legal subtleties in matters affecting their vital interests; they want straightforward declarations. I am not saying that some honorable members have not publicly stated their position, so that there is no doubt where they are. They have made their statements openly to the House and to the country; and I am speaking now in reference to some gentlemen who do not belong to the Protectionist Party, holding altogether a different political faith on the fiscal question. There is the provision later on in the document, that—

Any member of either party may, as to any specific proposals—

- (a) Agree with the members of his own party, and be bound by their joint determination; or
- (b) Decide for himself how far the particular circumstances prove the necessity—that is to say, the necessity has to be proved to my free-trade friends in the Labour Party—prove the necessity or the extent to which the proposal should be carried.

Mr. MAUGER.—Hear, hear!

Mr. REID.—If the honorable member is satisfied with that—

Mr. MAUGER.—The right honorable member will be satisfied with the result all right.

Mr. REID.—Has not the leader of the Labour Party distinctly told the honorable and learned member for Indi that that party will never vote for the revision of the Tariff in a protectionist sense? Will the honorable and learned member answer that? Has no free-trade member of the Labour Party told him that he will not vote for any alteration of the Tariff in a protectionist sense?

Mr. ISAACS.—None.

Mr. REID.—Now we are in the position that the honorable and learned member has been led by the free-traders in the Labour Party to believe that they are prepared to destroy their principles. This matter may become the sport of these alliances; but the people outside regard it pretty seriously, because it affects them. I have now the information that the honorable and learned member for Indi, and his friends, have had no sort of communication from the free-trade members of the Labour Party as to their supporting or opposing such an alteration of the Tariff.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is not what the right honorable member asked.

Mr. REID.—Then I ask that question. I want the honorable and learned member to remember that I am not now troubling about protectionist members, with whom I have no concern, and who are entitled to say and do what they like.

Mr. ISAACS.—I shall give the right honorable gentlemen and the country a full statement by and by, but I can say that I understand there will be a loyal adhesion to the terms of the alliance.

Mr. REID.—What is "loyal adhesion" to a rope of sand? What does "loyal adhesion" to that compact matter, when honorable members may believe there is a necessity, or may believe there is no necessity, for an alteration?

Mr. POYNTON.—Why call it a "rope of sand"?

Mr. REID.—I shall tell the honorable member why—because there is the pretence behind this alliance that it is to bring relief to distressed workers in the Melbourne factories. Surely we need not play with the miseries and distress of the workers in these compacts. Surely, if these compacts achieve the personal end at which they are aimed, there is something behind them as a guarantee that that mischief is going to be dealt with. Will it be dealt with by an agreement like this?

Mr. MAUGER.—We shall see whom the people will trust to deal with it.

Mr. REID.—I want to know whether the honorable and learned member for West Sydney will trust the honorable member for Melbourne Ports to deal with the fiscal question? I think he will probably assert his own individuality in the matter. There is another gentleman who is positive and clear in his enunciation—I allude to the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs. When this Parliament met that honorable and learned member, according to Hansard, said—

Another question which has been definitely settled, so far as Queensland is concerned, is that there shall be no alteration of the Tariff.

Here is a trusted representative of the public coming back from his constituents, and placing on the parliamentary records what his commission was, and stating that the decision of Queensland—not of himself, not of his corner—was that "there shall be no alteration of the Tariff." The honorable and learned member further said—

I think the people have declared that it is desirable that until the bookkeeping period has closed we should adhere to the existing Tariff.

That is to say, until 1911. Here we have voices from Victoria, the Prime Minister of the time, of the Melbourne Age, of the late Prime Minister in New South Wales, and in this House, twice repeated, and the voice of the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, all declaring this public trust and this public decision, and yet the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs now busies himself with a movement which is either a ghastly deception or is a betrayal of the people of Queensland. Now I come to the honorable and learned member for Indi, who was in the happy position of being returned unopposed at the last election. I think that his good fortune in that respect is not likely to happen to him again. But he is very much to be congratulated upon it, because it is a source of honour to any man to be returned by his constituents unopposed.

I cannot quote an election speech of the honorable member's, but he knows what it means to stand by and hear a number of men making public statements as to a fact, without contradicting or correcting them. My honorable and learned friend has been marvellously conscientious and industrious during these four years. If an honorable member ever got up and was guilty of the slightest inaccuracy the honorable and learned member for Indi was swift to correct him.

Mr. ISAACS.—I must correct that inaccuracy.

Mr. REID.—I shall not quarrel over a trifle of that sort, but I wish to say that the honorable and learned member did not get up in this House and say anything contrary to the declarations to which I have referred. I desire to say that while the alleged distresses in the factories were going on, the honorable and learned member for Indi sat on the Ministerial dove-cot like a little dove full of love and good nature. One Government went out and another Government came in, but the little dove was on the dove-cot all the time. Why did not the honorable and learned member tell the late Government, or the preceding Government, about this necessity for Tariff revision? He is not a marionette used by a great daily organ that writes up a number of alarming statements, after which he jumps into the arena. We know he is not that. We know he is not worked in that way. All I say about the honorable and learned member is this—and this will not be denied—that for four years he sat steadily in his place, nearly always accepting all the Government said or did, and that, after that period of time, when some one else has come into office, he is suddenly so active that a soldier ant on a gridiron is lazy compared to the honorable and learned member. All at once that dense, philosophic calm, and that dignified complacency which has made him the admiration even of the galleries, are completely gone. There is no more rest for the honorable and learned member for Indi. Everything this Government even thinks of is wrong. Everything it talks of is wrong; and there is no man in this Chamber to-day who is more full of stratagem, and fire, and fury—still somewhat concealed—than is that calm, philosophical follower of past Ministries. The honorable and learned member has never been accused, even by his bitterest enemies, of an extravagance of rashness or impulse, and he is probably intent on this Tariff revision which he has put before the public—and I believe he is, I believe that that is his motive, however sudden it is, however mysterious it is, still it is there, though it sprang up in a night—I say that the honorable and learned member who stands before the people of Victoria particularly as a man who has formed an alliance in the interests of Tariff revision, and who cannot tell them that those with whom he is allied are prepared to support him in it, is fooling the people of this State. How do we stand now? I do not think the honorable member for Wilmot is likely to be converted to protectionist doctrines, and I am, therefore, including the honorable member on this point with Ministerialists. We are, therefore, thirty-eight, whilst there are thirty-six on the other side. I presume that my honorable friends opposite, who hold principles absolutely opposed to those of the honorable and learned member for Indi, have not consented to forget them on this question of Tariff revision? There are on the other side, eight honorable members who are, I will not say free-traders, but revenue Tariffists, anti-protectionists, staunch men whom I need not name. They are members of the Labour Party with whom the honorable and learned member for Indi is in alliance, and if only one or two of those eight, or none of them, support him, he can never have his Tariff revision in this Parliament. Is there one honorable member who represents the protectionists under the loyal flag, under the flag raised before the elections—

Mr. MAUGER.—What colour is it?

Mr. REID.—There was no party flag hung up when the chief of protection stood before the people of Victoria.

Mr. MAUGER.—He called the right honorable member and his supporters foreign traders in the same speech.

Mr. REID.—I should like to know from the then Prime Minister, when he addresses the House, if he does, whether one of these gentlemen remonstrated with him on the line of policy he was taking?

Mr. MAUGER.—Did the right honorable gentleman remonstrate with him?

Mr. REID.—If they did they are free. But I say that if any man allows his leader to make a manifesto to the people of Australia, and does not contradict what he says, as to what his course is going to be, he leaves himself in a false position to say the least of it. I wish to refer to this aspect of the question for another reason. Honorable members have heard the derisive cheers when I spoke of betraying a cause. These honorable members who sit so quietly opposite in fiscal peace with protectionists—the honorable member for Wide Bay for example—

Mr. FISHER.—What about him?

Mr. REID.—I say the honorable gentleman was sitting in a Ministry with four protectionists, and did any one accuse him of betraying his fiscal creed?

Mr. FISHER.—I never in my life declared a fiscal creed to be greater than the labour movement.

Mr. REID.—Then I leave the honorable gentleman out. The honorable and learned member for West Sydney also took his seat in a Ministry with four protectionists, and did any one ever accuse him of betraying his fiscal faith?

Mr. HUGHES.—No, because, as the right honorable gentleman is aware, I am a labour man first, and everything else a long way afterwards.

Mr. REID.—But always going straight on the fiscal question?

Mr. HUGHES.—The right honorable gentleman does not understand or appreciate what going straight means, on any question.

Mr. REID.—I think that before I have done, I shall deal with that observation.

Mr. HUGHES.—I hope so. If the honorable gentleman does not, I shall.

Mr. REID.—It must be very painful to the honorable and learned member, who sat behind me, with nothing but admiration for eight years of my public life.

Mr. HUGHES.—Eight years?

Mr. REID.—Eight or ten years.

Mr. HUGHES.—I was one of those who took a chief part in throwing the right honorable gentleman out.

Mr. REID.—That was afterwards.

Mr. HUGHES.—After what? After I had some experience of what the right honorable gentleman was.

Mr. REID.—The honorable and learned member might, at least, be fair. Did I endeavour to shirk the fiscal question when we were before the electors? I did not accept the easy part then. I took up the fighting part, and went all round Australia endeavouring to convince the people that the Commonwealth Tariff should be lowered, and lowered in a revenue Tariff sense. But the verdict of the people was against me.

Mr. MAUGER.—And yet the right honorable gentleman says that there is a fiscal truce.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member can see that the truce was not mine; it was a truce made between the protectionists and the people of Australia. I wished to carry on the fight. The electors heard us both, and declared a truce by returning a larger number of members who believed in a truce than were returned to follow me in making a fight. I ask any fair-minded man if, having done my best to carry out the principles for which I have fought all my life—principles which were put into practice in New South Wales when I had the power—if, having done my best to achieve the triumph of those principles throughout Australia, and the verdict of the people being unmistakably against me, I should be accused of treason; if when I have been overwhelmingly defeated I should be charged with betraying my cause? I wish now to come to that calm and critical intellect, the honorable and learned member for Indi. He made no speeches during the elections, but fortunately he the other day committed himself to a definition of fiscal peace. I am grateful to him for that. I will read two passages from his speech, which occur within thirty lines of each other, and I will ask the House to reconcile them. Speaking of the electors, he said—

They declared that there should be a pause in the great struggle between the protectionists and the free-traders, and that the protectionist flag should still continue to wave.

That is quite true. The Tariff had been passed. It was a protectionist Tariff. And by decreeing a fiscal truce during this Parliament the electors decreed that the protectionist Tariff should continue as it was, that, in that sense, the protectionist flag should continue to wave. The honorable and learned member in that passage said, not that the free-traders were finally defeated and annihilated, but that there was a pause, that the electors had declared that there should be a pause in the great struggle between the protectionists and the free-traders. Did that mean annihilation and defeat? Yet fifteen lines above the passage which I have just quoted the honorable and learned member is reported to have said—

I shall tell honorable members what that fiscal peace meant. It meant this, that the contest in Australia between the policy of free-trade on the one side, and the policy of protection on the other, was decided. There was to be no more struggling as to which policy was to be triumphant.

In the one breath the honorable and learned member spoke of there being a pause between the two great warring camps, and in the next he spoke of the final overthrow of free-trade. How can those statements be reconciled? In the one breath he said that free-trade was finally vanquished, that it was dead, while in the next he declared that the verdict of the electors was that there should be a pause between the two great antagonists. The latter is the true description of the circumstances.

Mr. ISAACS.—Will the right honorable gentleman kindly read the sentence immediately following the first quotation?

Mr. REID.—I will read it all. I had a reason for not being too frank about my authority for the quotation, because I did not know that I should be in order in making it. However, I will read all that the honorable and learned member said about the fiscal peace.

Mr. ISAACS.—I do not ask the right honorable gentleman to do that; it will be sufficient if he reads the sentence which follows the first quotation.

Mr. REID.—The speech from which I am quoting will be found on page 4457 of the Hansard report. As I have stated, the second sentence was uttered before the first, but I will now quote the whole passage. It reads as follows:—

I shall tell honorable members what that fiscal peace meant. It meant this, that the contest in Australia between the policy of free-trade on the one side, and the policy of protection on the other, was decided. There was to be no more struggling as to which policy was to be triumphant. We had erected the standard of protection, and that flag was to fly all over Australia. When the Prime Minister, in Sydney, taunted the protectionists of Australia, and said that they had that "tired feeling," and that they dared not raise the protectionist flag before the people of Australia, we dared to do so, and the people supported us.

The honorable and learned member was unopposed. I do not know where he did it. I did not hear of him speaking anywhere—

They declared that there should be a pause in the great struggle between the protectionists and the free-traders, and that the protectionist flag should still continue to wave.

That is the Tariff. We admit that the Tariff is to continue to wave.

Mr. ISAACS.—Will the right honorable member read the next sentence?

Mr. REID.—I ask my honorable and learned friend how can it be said that one army has been totally annihilated if, when the two great armies are face to face, there is a pause? How can one of the armies be destroyed when there is a pause, and no fighting is taking place? The sentence upon which the honorable and learned member relies is this—

But they never said that in this declaration of peace between two warring camps any details of protection should remain unattended to.

What are the details of protection? The putting up of duties. Is not that the re-opening of the Tariff contest? Does it not strike across a free-trade principle? What did all our fighting over a 10, 12½, or 15 per cent. duty on machinery mean? Do honorable members recollect the conflict between the two Houses which resulted in a duty of 12½ per cent. being fixed upon as a compromise? What are the details of the Tariff but the determination of the question whether a duty is to be 10, 20, or 30 per cent.? It does not matter what policy I put before the electors, but it matters what the verdict of the electors was. It matters what the candidates who went before them promised the people. If I had come back with a majority, I should have been bound to fight the battle to a finish; but I was beaten at the polls, so that I could not fight it. My honorable friends opposite have remained loyal to their obligations, and to the pledges which they made to the people; but I do not think that my honorable friends on the corner benches have done the same.

Mr. CROUCH.—Before the right honorable member leaves the fiscal question, will he deal with the question of starch?

Mr. REID.—That is included in the fiscal truce. But if there is one thing which the honorable and learned member needs, it is a little more starch. I shall probably be attacked for the next two or three weeks to come. That is a luxury of my position, which I must take with the honour attaching to it. But I wish to anticipate one or two of the most unfair attacks which may be repeated, attacks made on the ground of my abandonment of principle. It is so easy to charge a man with abandoning his principles. When I fought the free-trade fight, and was vanquished, I did not abandon my principles in accepting the verdict of the electors. What sensible man would ask honorable members to prove false to their convictions and to their pledge to the electors? That would be an infamous attempt, if I made it, and also an insane one. When I was before the electors I denounced, and I denounce still, that provision in the Post and Telegraph Act under which coloured crews cannot be employed upon the steamers carrying the mails to Australia.

Mr. MAUGER.—When is the right honorable member going to amend it?

Mr. REID.—I shall give the honorable member my answer; he will get no quibbling from me. I went all over Australia denouncing that clause. I said then, as I say now, that if the people returned a sufficient number of members to enable me to effect a change, I should bring it about.

Mr. MAUGER.—The right honorable gentleman should have made an effort in that direction.

Mr. REID.—I have great duties to perform to the people of Australia. Am I to be debarred from public life, because the people of Australia differ from me upon that subject?

Mr. CROUCH.—Or upon any other subject.

Mr. REID.—I had run a fair course in public life when the honorable member was in knickerbockers—and, probably, he never could keep them clean.

Mr. POYNTON.—That is a statesman-like utterance.

Mr. REID.—Little Turveydrop is always worrying. There is another matter that I denounced all over Australia, in regard to which I tried to secure a majority. I am quite in sympathy, as my whole life has shown, with the White Australia movement. Honorable members opposite should not talk about a White Australia policy as if they had invented it. The whole of the party to which I belong, in New South Wales, which was led by Sir Henry Parkes, passed measures to secure a White Australia twenty years ago, and that party has stood steadily to that policy through all these years. I took a position as strong even as that assumed by the Labour Party with regard to that policy, and I went beyond the Government when the Bill was before us. With regard to employment upon the ocean, however, I say that we have no right to make the oceans of the world white. We should be guilty of the grossest tyranny and injustice if we did so.

Mr. CAMERON.—We cannot do it.

Mr. REID.—We are trying as much as we can. In connexion with our mail services there is one little chance of trying to do it. By-the-bye, our friends who will not allow the British subjects of the Indian Empire to be employed on the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company's steamers are proposing to amend the terms of our land mail contracts in order to permit of our own coloured people being employed in connexion with them. That is surely a very proper thing to do; but under the Post and Telegraph Act the men who owned Australia, or their children, are debarred from performing this work. That is a lovely extreme to push a great principle to. Upon the oceans of the world, which are as much their property as ours, the coloured subjects of the great Indian Empire should occupy as good a position as any Australian. Now I come to the matter of contract labour. I am absolutely in sympathy with the intention of the clause as expressed at the time it was adopted. We do not want any use made of contract labour at strike time, nor do we want any frauds or impositions to be practised upon people in distant countries with regard to terms of labour and wages. I am with honorable members opposite upon that point. But it is absurd to say that a man who, instead of coming out here as a pauper, without a prospect, secures a job before he starts, comes out here in shackles. Does that not sound like Tom Mann and Socialism? The "shackles of wagedom." These matters have stirred me to the greatest depths, and it has been a source of the greatest disappointment to me that I have not had an opportunity of dealing with them. I have, however, had to put up with the position, and now I have had to form an alliance with gentlemen who differ from me on that point, which I did not consider of sufficient importance—in view of the fact that the people had decided against me—to block the coalition. How can it be said that I have abandoned my principles? Why is this abuse reserved for me? I have sat silent for years under a cloud of infamous abuse, involving my own personal honour. Only the other day, the honorable and learned member for Corio published, in the Melbourne Age, a letter addressed to the farmers of Victoria, in which he attacked me personally. He made some reference to my lavish expenditure. Upon that point I may say that during my last two years of office in New South Wales the expenditure was less by £12,000,000 than during the two years following my retirement from office. I shall not, however, touch upon that point.

Mr. CROUCH.—The board appointed to inquire into the matter decided that the expenditure was not less.

Mr. REID.—I am happy to say that I have in my hand a letter from that board, which I shall read to the House. I do not care about the imputation with regard to lavish expenditure, but I do care about the imputations cast upon my personal character.

Mr. CROUCH.—I have a letter from the chairman of the board, Mr. Dibbs, in which he says that the right honorable gentleman's accounts were cooked.

Mr. REID.—I only wish to say that to-night I am going to bring evidence before this House and Australia, both inside and outside. The accounts of a great State are not signed by the Treasurer alone, but also by the higher officials in his Department, and if there has been some dishonest manipulation of the accounts, there is an accomplice in the Treasury.

Mr. FISHER.—They need not necessarily be dishonest manipulations.

Mr. REID.—I do not mind statements that do not convey that impression. I shall read the letter of the honorable and learned member, and I shall ask whether any honorable member would remain silent under such imputations.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why bother about them?

Mr. REID.—Because other people behind the honorable and learned member have been doing the same thing; because this poison has been circulated in Victoria with the deliberate object of crippling my usefulness in the great public fight in which I am engaged. In New South Wales, where I am known, where I have lived nearly all my life, and where I have stood before the public all my life, I need not waste my time, because I never stood stronger in the public estimation in that State than I do to-day. These miserable slanders outside of my own country may run their wicked course, but, in my own State, I am happy to say that I have received marks of the confidence and the respect of the people which I think no other public man in Australia ever received. I shall pass by the matter of lavish expenditure referred to by the honorable and learned member for Corio. I do not care about that, because it does not involve any personal imputation. The honorable and learned member says in his letter—board, appointed by the Government, consisting of the general managers of the leading banks in Sydney, supported this criticism by finding that public moneys had been misused, accounts doctored, and balances wrongly applied.

It is notorious that his accounts were publicly condemned as cooked; and that a disinterested

I say that if that were true, I should have no right to stand in any public assembly of honorable men. I have had these things, in a milder form, hurled at me, but never in that form. In view of the use that is being made of these slanders, which are being employed, not to defame me as a man, but to injure me as a public man, I have felt it to be my duty to bring evidence to bear on the subject. I shall first read a letter from the gentleman who was accountant to the Treasury during the whole term of my office. In order to show the standing of this gentleman, I may tell honorable members that my successors—I do not know whether it was the Administration of the honorable member for Hume or that of Sir John See—promoted him to the high position of Auditor-General of New South Wales. That shows he was a man of high standing.

Mr. CROUCH.—Why does not the right honorable gentleman read the finding of the board?

Mr. REID.—I propose to read a letter from the board, with regard to these slanders. I submitted them to the board, and I have their letter signed by every member. The honorable and learned member's letter appeared in the Age of the 9th September. The first letter in reply to my inquiries, which I will read, is dated the 13th September, and reads—

Auditor-General's Department,
Sydney, 13th September, 1904.

My Dear Sir,

In reply to your favour received this morning, I am pleased to express my opinion, which is formed on my own personal knowledge, that at no time during your occupancy of the Treasury in this State was there any interference on your part, or on the part of any member of your Ministry, with the preparation of the public accounts of this State, and that the balances as published and used by you were as prepared and presented to you by the officers of the Treasury, and were in all respects statutorily correct; and no suggestion as to any alteration thereof, with a view of showing different results, was at any time ever made to me as accountant for the Treasury—

And I ask honorable members to listen to what follows, because it constitutes the most absolute vindication of all—and also, that the accounts, as subsequently published, exhibited in all and every respect the same figures and results as when they were first laid before you by me, acting as accountant to the Treasury.

Yours faithfully,
J. VERNON, Auditor-General.

That officer was the accountant, who signed every statement which I submitted to Parliament. I shall now read a letter from the Under-Secretary to the Treasury, a gentleman who has occupied that position for many years, and who still fills it. He says—

Treasury, New South Wales,
Sydney, 13th September, 1904.

Dear Mr. Reid,

I am in receipt of your note of 10th inst., and regret very much to hear of the baseless charges levelled against you in respect of your administration of the finances of New South Wales—

I sent a copy of the charges to each of these gentlemen.

Mr. CROUCH.—I sent them.

Mr. REID.—Surely the honorable and learned member might begin to be ashamed of himself.

The charges could only have been made by persons utterly ignorant of the facts, and also of the terms of the report furnished by the committee appointed by your successor at the Treasury. To your inquiry as to whether you ever suggested, or endeavoured to do anything at variance with the highest standard of political honour and integrity, I can only answer, emphatically, "No."

Trusting that you are well, with kindest regards,

Yours, very truly,
F. KIRKPATRICK.

Those gentlemen are no longer under my control. They are absolutely outside my sphere of influence. The next letter which I propose to read to the House is from the gentleman who became Colonial Treasurer of New South Wales when the honorable member for Hume quitted State politics, and who continued in that office for four years. I vacated the position in 1899, and Mr. Waddell became Colonial Treasurer in 1900, and retained office until 1904. Mr. Waddell says—

14th September, 1904.

Dear Mr. Reid,

Owing to pressure of work, I have got behind in my correspondence, and only just opened your letter, and read the extract which it contains, which you say appeared in a letter in the Melbourne Age of the 9th inst. When you ask my opinion of the statements or charges contained in the extract, I feel bound, in fairness to you, to say that no one is justified in making such charges, and I feel sure that whoever has made them, will, in his calmer moments, withdraw them unreservedly.

Yours sincerely,
T. WADDELL.

Further, as the Under-Secretary to the Treasury tells us, the statement that the report of the committee of leading bankers, which was appointed by the Government, arrived at findings which supported these infamous charges is absolutely opposed to the truth. I wrote to Mr. French, being under the impression that he was chairman of the committee in question.

Mr. CROUCH.—Mr. Dibbs was the chairman.

Mr. REID.—One would think that the honorable and learned member for Corio was making this explanation. I repeat that I wrote to Mr. French personally, thinking that he acted as chairman of the committee. He informed me, however, that he did not so act, but that Mr. Dibbs was the chairman. He interviewed Mr. Dibbs and Mr. Yarwood, the other members of the committee. Mr. Dibbs, I may add, was the general manager of the Commercial Bank; Mr. Russell French, the general manager of the Bank of New South Wales; and Mr. Yarwood was an accountant. These three gentlemen have written me the following letter:—

Sydney, 17th September, 1904.

Dear Mr. Reid,

Referring to your note of 10th inst. to Mr. J. Russell French, covering extract from a letter published in the Melbourne Age, our report, which is referred to, speaks for itself, and should not have given rise to any misapprehension.

In view, however, of the remarks in the extract in question, it is but just to you to state that we made no reflection whatever on your personal honour or integrity, nor did we intend to suggest any improper manipulation of the Treasury accounts by yourself or the Treasury officials, as would seem to be implied by the terms "cooked" or "doctored"—which appear in the letter.

Yours faithfully,

T. A. DIBBS,	} Members of the Committee.
J. RUSSELL FRENCH,
F. N. YARWOOD,

Mr. FULLER.—Can the honorable and learned member for Corio produce Mr. Dibbs' letter stating that the accounts were "cooked"?

Mr. REID.—I have simply to ask the House to pardon me for introducing this personal matter. I think that every honorable member in the Chamber will feel sufficient sympathy with me—after the infamous slanders which have been circulated against me for so many years—to admit that I should at last take notice of them, not because I need to clear my reputation in New South Wales, or perhaps even in Australia, but because I have the interests of Australia in my hands now, and I do not wish to see any man occupying this position against whom such accusations can be justly uttered. Passing from that matter I should like to point out that there is a statement due to the public of Australia, which I hope will be made by the honorable and learned member for Indi, if not by the leader of the Opposition, as to whether this alliance is a mere piece of legal network, from which any honorable member can escape, or whether it has a solid business meaning. We are all entitled to know that.

Mr. MAHON.—The right honorable member is very much interested.

Mr. REID.—Are we not all interested? Is it not a fair subject for criticism?

Mr. HUGHES.—Is not the right honorable member criticising it?

Mr. REID.—Yes, and I am entitled to do so. If honorable members opposite complain as little as I do, they will not complain very much. I have been accused of engaging in all sorts of intrigues to bring about the defeat of the late Administration in connexion with the Arbitration Bill. There are a number of my supporters here who know exactly the position which I assumed upon that matter. I have been quoted as saying that nobody would receive any black looks from me, if they voted against the Deakin Administration upon that Bill. I wish to explain exactly how that statement came to be made, because it is so easy to quote an isolated utterance without giving the context of it. In a leading article which appeared in one of the great journals of Sydney I was called upon to exercise my authority to coerce my supporters—

Mr. WILKS.—Which the right honorable member would not attempt to do.

Mr. FISHER.—When the right honorable member came to Victoria to enter into an alliance with the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, he said that he would answer for every one of them.

Mr. REID.—Because they had accepted it. I must now lift the curtain to explain that matter. I do not in the least mind lifting it. Before I entered upon those negotiations I had sounded the members of my party as to whether they were in favour of my doing so.

Mr. GROOM.—To what coalition does the right honorable member refer?

Mr. REID.—To the coalition with the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. I sounded my followers as to whether they were in favour of the adoption of that course. I suppose that was a fair thing to do. They are not cattle, to be bought and sold at Smithfield. When I learned that they were thoroughly in favour of a move of that sort, I felt very great confidence in my dealings with the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.

Mr. SPENCE.—Were they unanimous?

Mr. REID.—I do not know. They were unanimous at the meeting which was held, with the exception of the honorable member for Dalley, who did not express any objection to the negotiations.

Mr. WILKS.—I was not in favour of the coalition, but I would not join the Labour Party.

Mr. REID.—With the exception of the honorable member for Dalley, all my supporters were unreservedly in favour of the coalition. The night that the article in question appeared, I happened to be addressing a public audience, and I said that I would not influence my supporters in connexion with the Arbitration Bill either one way or the other. Many, including my honorable friend, had pledged themselves to the electors on the question of the inclusion of the railway servants of the States. I said, "I am not going to use any such influence at all." I naturally said, "If any member is to be deflected from his principles in order to save the Government, why should I be picked out? Why should I be selected to save the Government?" I thought that if anything was to be done in that way my honorable friend ought to set to work among his own followers. It was foolish to ask me to do such a thing.

Mr. KELLY.—The right honorable gentleman certainly did not attempt to influence the members of his party.

Mr. REID.—One or two honorable members of my party asked my opinion; but I declined to advise them in the slightest degree, either in one way or the other. I can quote one instance of this, which the honorable member for Grey will be able to corroborate. When the party held a meeting at the opening of the present Parliament, I spoke so strongly in support of the stand taken by the then Prime Minister, that the honorable member for Grey rose after I had resumed my seat and said he wished it to be distinctly understood that honorable members of the party were to have a free hand.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Was that a caucus meeting?

Mr. REID.—It was not, because I am able to tell the House what occurred at it, while a member of the Labour Party is never in a position to say what transpires at a meeting of their caucus.

Mr. POYNTON.—I told the right honorable gentleman that I could not follow him in his public utterances.

Mr. REID.—That is quite true, and no one expected the honorable member to do so. I am sure the honorable member is perfectly fair, and he will do me the justice to corroborate that which I have said—that I expressed my own individual view as being strongly in favour of the position taken up by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.

Mr. POYNTON.—That is so.

Mr. REID.—Therefore, so far from there being any of this miserable intriguing, I left my honorable friends—the members of my party—absolutely free. At a meeting of the party, I earnestly expressed my view in favour of the course taken by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. How is it that I am singled out for these attacks? I do not think that any other man is picked out in the same way. I merely mention the matter now, because it has been imputed to me that I have been manipulating the votes of honorable members in every possible way. I defy any man to single out one honorable member of this House whom I have ever approached since this Parliament met with a view to induce him to vote in any other way than he wished to do.

Mr. POYNTON.—How many members of the right honorable gentleman's party knew that the present Minister of Defence had his support in moving the amendment in regard to clause 48?

Mr. REID.—There was no bond of secrecy associated with the moving of that amendment. This is another pitiable complaint, and it seems to me to be utterly childish. Is this House so constructed that when important matters are to be decided, the proper course is to go into Committee, where a representative of the people is deprived of his vote? Is it a democratic idea that a vital matter shall be decided when one honorable member is necessarily prevented from casting his vote?

Mr. POYNTON.—Does not that frequently occur?

Mr. REID.—It is not a democratic idea. This explains the true soreness of honorable members opposite. The true soreness associated with the vote in question was due to the fact that honorable members opposite could not prevent one honorable member from expressing his honest convictions by putting him in the chair in Committee.

Mr. FISHER.—The least said about that matter the better. Honorable members on the Treasury benches know that that is so.

Mr. McCAY.—The least said the better in the interests of the Opposition.

Mr. FISHER.—No.

Mr. REID.—I do not complain of it. I think I may fairly say that the present leader of the Opposition took up the position that under our party and parliamentary systems we pushed to its extreme the practice of making questions vital. I believe that has been the objection raised by the honorable member. He has urged that there is too much of this system of party government, and of the lives of Governments depending on questions that come before the House.

Mr. MAHON.—The right honorable gentleman will make nothing vital to the life of his Government.

Mr. REID.—May I ask the ex-Minister to allow me, an actual Minister, to make a little Ministerial statement? It is a sore business, but I had to submit to it for four years, and now the Opposition have to undergo the same experience. I merely desire a few months, that is all. The present leader of the Opposition, in referring in the course of his Ministerial statement to the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, made the following remarks, which are to be found at page 1268 of Hansard :—

In September last, when the Bill introduced last session was dropped by the late Administration, I took the stand that they had no right to make a matter of detail a Government question.

In other words, he urged that the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, in standing by, as a vital matter, the position that the extension of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill to States servants was unconstitutional, and a gross interference with the rights of the States, did wrong, because it was after all only a matter of detail. We see the difference sometimes in the views held by men when they hold positions of responsibility as compared with those which they express when they do not. An honorable member had asked the then Prime Minister, the honorable member for Bland, if he would regard a vote against the extension of the provisions of the Bill to States servants as vital, and, in reply, the honorable gentleman made the statement which I have just read. A little later on, he said—

For my own part, I expressed the view as far back as six or seven months ago that the matter was one of detail, and, therefore, if occasion arises, I shall be free to take any course without going back upon principles already enunciated.

That is my point. The honorable member took a most liberal view of what was due to himself. "You have terrible objections to these clauses; but they are to be taken as a matter of detail." That was his advice to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. "Do not mind," he said; "but go on with the Bill." The scene changed. The honorable member, who advised the honorable and learned member for Ballarat to sink his views of political honour as a Prime Minister, came into office. He occupied the same responsible position, and—

Mr. POYNTON.—What did the right honorable gentleman say?

Mr. REID.—This matter has nothing to do with the honorable member, except in so far as he is a listener.

Mr. POYNTON.—It has a good deal to do with me.

Mr. REID.—I trust that the honorable member will bear with me. I come now to the question on which the late Government shipwrecked themselves. The House will remember that the Committee decided by a majority of five to insert in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill a provision that the Court, before granting preference to unionists, should be satisfied that a majority in the industry affected was favorable to the making of such an award. The Government said, "We will ask the Committee to reconsider that decision." But before they did that they made the statement that if the Committee would not eat their own words, and go back from their decision, as expressed in the Bill, the Government would take the view that their services were not required. That was done by the Prime Minister. Yet when we came to the recommitment, consider the view which the Prime Minister took of the difference between what was in the Bill and what was proposed to be put in the Bill. He did not think of resigning at first, and I do not blame him for that. If a decision is a close thing there is a tendency that way. Here is what the Prime Minister said when this proposal to recommit was challenged by the honorable and learned member for Corinella—

If anything approaching a majority apply for a preference, the Judge may reasonably hold that they substantially represent all engaged in the industry.

That is to say, if any number approaching a majority applied for preference, the Judge might reasonably know that they represented substantially all engaged in the industry. Then the honorable member went on—the remarks are reported in Hansard, page 4047—

Under the proposal of the honorable and learned member, the Court could not dispense with rigid proof of the existence of a majority in favour of the granting of a preference, while, under our proposal, if they were reasonably assured of the fact, it would not have to be mathematically demonstrated to them. That is the only difference between the two proposals.

That means there is precious little difference between the two, and that the honorable member's previous view was absolutely wrong. The Judge, in interpreting a measure of this sort, would not be required to have mathematical demonstration. That would be absolutely ridiculous. The provision must be read in reference to the subject-matter. Mathematical demonstration would mean a plebiscite all over Australia—in every hamlet in Australia. The thing is absurd. The Judge to be "satisfied" meant that he was satisfied from information before him—reasonable information—that such a majority existed.

Mr. DEAKIN.—The words are, "in the opinion of the Court."

Mr. REID.—That is much weaker still. The word "satisfied" is a much stronger word. I want to point out that the man who was so careless about the political honour and integrity and independence of his predecessor, was so scrupulously tender about his own as to stake his existence—on what? Did the honorable and learned member for Ballarat ask the House to undo something which it had done, and state that if it would not undo it, he would resign? Nothing of the kind. He said, "I cannot allow that to be put in the Bill"—a very different thing. His successor said, "It being in the Bill—the House having affirmed it, and decided it—you must stultify yourselves, or we will have nothing more to do with it." That is carrying matters, I do not say to an unfair extreme; I do not, for a moment, say that the honorable member was not justified in doing that—I only say that his views have altered very much since he expressed an opinion on the action of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.

Mr. HUGHES.—The point was a peculiar one. We came into office on this very Bill.

Mr. REID.—I wish now to point out the extraordinary circumstance, that before the late Government resigned there was only this one thing upon which they were at issue with the House. But the moment they resigned and I took up the Bill as they left it, they called it a fraud. Well, then, they have been engineering a fraud.

Mr. BAMFORD.—It is a fraud with the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella in it.

Mr. REID.—May I take it that the fraud consisted in that? I want to put it in the fairest way. We will say, then, that what made the Bill a fraud was that alteration. Now I will ask the House and the country to notice where the disinterestedness of these gentlemen comes in, the extent of their democratic principles, and whether their regard is for all the manhood of Australia, and not for a section of it branded "trade unionists." Because what was this provision? It was a provision singling out a worthy lot of men—a grand lot of men—probably the élite of the working classes of Australia. No matter how good they are, I object just the same. It was picking them out for a judicial administration, favouring one worker at the expense of another. That is the great point on which we say that this is a selfish provision. Fight your battles as you will in the industrial sphere. There is room for all. But when you come to the administration of the public affairs of a nation, and of legislation for the benefit of the whole nation, and the equal administration of public justice, I say that to single out any man for preference is wrong. A number of my honorable friends have gone further than I would go in this matter, but I was defeated. They have taken up a position that should have satisfied any reasonable trades unionist. My honorable friends said, "Before this tremendous preference is given—this favour—this preference of one worker over another—we must be satisfied that there is a majority of the men who are agreeable to it." That was a much milder position than mine. But even that, we are told, makes this Bill a fraud. That reveals the selfishness of the combination, and the power behind it. My honorable friend, the leader of the Opposition, stands here, and makes that speech of his, but does he represent the inner circle of the great labour movement? He is a gentleman to whose views we all listen with the greatest respect. From the manner in which he expresses himself, he might just as well be the leader of my party as of the party opposite. But we must look deeper than that. We are not blind to the real operations of the great labour bodies of Australia. Workers do not, as a rule, throw their money away on paid missionaries. They have little enough. They cannot throw their money about much. How is it that this gentleman, Mr. Tom Mann, who preaches rank Socialism and the destruction of private ownership and private industry—

Mr. RONALD.—No.

Mr. REID.—I say he does; how is it that he is being paid to go all round Australia preaching this extreme form of Socialism? My honorable friends opposite must know that there is a labour organ in Melbourne called the Tocsin. I have not got before me the particular extract to which I wish to refer, but it makes no secret of the policy of the party behind my honorable friend the leader of the Opposition. It means that the State must own all the factories, all the lands, and all the ships. I have here a newspaper, to which the late Prime Minister sent a congratulatory telegram, expressing his appreciation of the educative work which it was doing. That paper is the Brisbane Worker, which has a very large circulation, and of which, no doubt, honorable members have heard.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—A good Christian organ.

Mr. REID.—I shall read a little of its Christianity. I got this extract in rather a round-about way. I do not happen to subscribe to the Brisbane Worker, but I get newspaper cuttings from the old country. Amongst those received was this, from the St. James' Gazette, which had extracted it from the Worker; and it shows how we are "boomed" at Home by these organs. This was published in the Worker just a month or two after the Federal election—

Political power has been won in the Federal domain. . . . The question now is, What next? and the answer, Economic Revolution. . . . The wage system holds us as firmly as ever in its vampire clutch. . . .

"Wage system!" "Vampire clutch!" No more wages! All Government salaries.

The great work now awaiting us is the utilization of political power to economic advantages. The vote must be used as a bar to strike the shackles from our limbs.

What fearful slavery there must be in Queensland! And a Labour Government, or very nearly a Labour Government, is in office! What a fearful state of things the people of Queensland must have to contend against! The extract goes on—

The Capitalist State must go. . . . There can be no peace, no happiness, whilst civilization continues to be based upon the system of barbarism—a Master-caste whipping slave-masses to labour for private gain.

That sounds all right, does it not? Just fancy the mild and conservative leader of the Opposition using language like that! The leader of the Opposition is the right man in this Parliament, but that extract shows the work which is going on outside—

The Co-operative Commonwealth alone is worthy of this age of science and invention.

What does the "Co-operative Commonwealth" mean? The destruction of private enterprise, and the destruction of individual liberty. That is the true inspiration of the power behind the labour representatives. There is an ingenious way of working this Socialism. It does not pay to prescribe it too suddenly. The first thing is, as the leader of the Opposition has done, to speak of the evil of monopolies and combines. In that I quite agree with him. We, on this side, are as willing as he and his Government were, to introduce legislation to suppress any abuses of that sort. But each individual abuse is made an excuse for the introduction of the thin end of the wedge for the nationalization of the private industries of the country. It is tobacco to-day; it is something else to-morrow. Senator Pearce, speaking of the full socialistic programme at a public meeting, said, "We cannot do all this at once; but there are some plums ready for plucking now, and one is the tobacco monopoly." Those steps towards revolution we will oppose. There are other matters on which I could have spoken, but I shall confine myself to one before I sit down. Honorable members must understand, as was expressed in the basis of agreement drawn up between the honorable and learned member for Ballarat and myself, that our coming together was not under the precise terms of that memorandum. As I say, the honorable gentleman's supporters did not, as a party, accept the understanding, and it was never subsequently submitted to any other body of members. The policy of the Government is, therefore, a policy which they themselves have put forward, but, of course, in view of the fact that I and the honorable and learned member for Balaclava are in the Government, and were parties to that agreement, and that we have colleagues who assented to it, the result is practically the same. But I want to say to the leader of the Opposition that it is absolutely unjust to put us before the people of Australia as if we were indifferent to the interests of the producers—as if we were idle about water conservation or about advertising the resources of Australia in the mother country.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The right honorable gentleman is merely a different kind of Socialist.

Mr. REID.—That is an expression which reveals the difficulty, which I admit, of arriving at a fine distinction. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has evidently seen some reference of mine to Socialism, and it is perfectly true that I believe there are some aspects of what is called Socialism which are absolutely worthy of approval. But I can draw a line, and the difference between the Socialism of honorable members opposite and the view I hold is shown when one of the best principles in the world—when the principle of using the national power for ends of national good—is pushed so far as to convert the whole nation into an army of civil servants, destroying the initiative, the ability, the prospects, the property, and the opportunities of human beings with their intellects—their varying degrees of mental strength. There are some public services, such as those performed by our post-offices, which, we are all agreed, should be a national concern. By the way, some people, including myself, used to look on State railways as another phase of Socialism, but, on closer inquiry, State railways are shown to be an absolute negation of Socialism.

Mr. MAUGER.—The right honorable member will come round all right.

Mr. REID.—Is the honorable member for Melbourne Ports an extreme Socialist?

Mr. MAUGER.—Never mind!

Mr. REID.—We only want to know where to place the honorable member, who, after a bit of a fright, has since been out of the rain. I am afraid he will have to come out into the rain again. The taking of the railways from parliamentary control, and placing them under the control of business men, to be run as independent business enterprises, is a practical proof of the failure of Socialism as applied to great industrial concerns. There is no Socialism about the Commissioners of Railways. The Tossins and the Brisbane Workers do not do much with such gentlemen, who work those great concerns on the strictest business principles, beyond the control of the national authority. I want to point out that in the memorandum which was drawn up some months ago between the honorable and learned member for Ballarat and myself, my attitude and his, with regard to those matters, was stated with perfect clearness. I should like to read some extracts on the question of old-age pensions, for instance—

It is highly desirable that a uniform system of old-age pensions throughout Australia should be adopted as soon as possible, and that steps should be taken to accomplish this in co-operation with the States.

I do not know whether the leader of the Opposition has seriously thought this matter over. He says to the States, "If you will not join us we shall go on without you." Are we going to raise £4,000,000 through the Customs, in order to get £1,000,000 for a national old-age pension system?

Mr. THOMAS.—Why not a land tax?

Mr. REID.—Now we understand where the money is to come from. I am very glad to have this disclosure. I understand now where the millions are to come from.

Mr. THOMAS.—I am a free-trader.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member is a very free trader. He will take anything he can lay his hands on.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is in accord with the free-trade system; we do not agree with it.

Mr. REID.—There is no secrecy about the policy of the party to which the honorable and learned member for Indi belonged for many years. The honorable and learned member has not suddenly changed his coat on that policy? Honorable members who followed the Barton Government and the Deakin Government for three or four years were pledged to the declared policy of the party, that, so far as the Federation was concerned, we should raise taxation only through the Customs.

Mr. THOMAS.—Is that a free-trade idea?

Mr. ISAACS.—Indirect taxation—Customs and Excise.

Mr. REID.—Just so, Customs and Excise. That policy was also, with equal publicity, announced by myself as the leader of the other party in the Commonwealth at that time.

Mr. THOMAS.—As leader of the Free-trade Party?

Mr. REID.—Yes. The view I took was that in matters of land and other direct taxation every State should be left to work out its own policy as it pleased.

Mr. THOMAS. — The right honorable gentleman could not expect every free-trader to subscribe to that.

Mr. REID. — Perhaps the honorable member will permit me to answer one question before he asks another. What I desire to say in reference to that is that we all agree that the national taxing power should be used through the Customs House, and that all direct taxation should come through the powers of the States Parliaments. That would leave the people of each State to work out their own system of direct taxation for themselves, and if there were a majority in a State in favour of a land tax there would then be no obstacle in the way. But it was felt that it would lead to immense confusion if we were to attempt to raise direct taxation, and for many years to come. So far as I am concerned, I think it will always be better to leave to the States their individual freedom to work out their own destinies in this respect, and that the Federation should use the national power of taxation through the Customs only. But now we can understand the levity with which our honorable friends opposite look forward to flouting the States in reference to this question, which particularly affects two of them. There are two of the States in which already laws have been passed relating to old-age pensions.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—They are charity doles.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—They are rotten laws.

Mr. REID.—Still they are laws, and that is all I said. I said that they were laws, but I did not say the precise condition of preservation which they are in. There are such laws in New South Wales and Victoria, whilst none of the other States have passed such legislation. Now, if we had a friendly conference with the Premiers of those States we could get their authority to bring this system in without raising £4,000,000 through the Customs when we require only £1,000,000.

Mr. ISAACS.—In that the right honorable gentleman agrees with us.

Mr. REID.—I do not mind agreeing with the honorable and learned member sometimes, but I point out that I expressed that view years ago. I said that it could not be done through the Federation, but my honorable friend representing the Opposition now says, "We do not care what the States say, we will have it." The honorable member does not mean to oppress the people by raising £4,000,000 when only £1,000,000 will do. The honorable member has not become editor of the Tocsin yet, but he will get his £1,000,000 out of direct taxation. I admit that we are getting daylight in connexion with this matter. The honorable and learned member for Indi thought he had made a tremendous point in a criticism recently of the terms of the memorandum drawn up by the honorable and learned members for Ballarat and Balaclava, in conjunction with the honorable member for Macquarie and myself. We agreed on this—

The Tariff not to be altered in any respect during the present Parliament without the consent of both parties in the Ministry.

My honorable and learned friend professed to look upon that as an admission that we could alter the Tariff. But that is simply ratifying the truce which both admitted had been declared, instead of a provision giving liberty to break it. Just fancy our wing of the party agreeing to bringing in protective duties! There was another understanding—concerning preferential trade. We took up a position which is most excellently expressed by the Melbourne Age, of 30th October, just after the speech delivered by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. The Age said—

But on this point there is no need whatever for Australia to leap before she comes to the fence. Details at this stage are premature. Mr. Chamberlain may not succeed in his mission.

That looks very likely just now.

That is a matter which rests in the future. Should he carry the mind of England with him it cannot be done for the next twelve months. Therefore, any overtures from Australia would be completely out of place.

One thing is certain, the protectionists will never permit the preferential Tariff to undermine the Federal policy of protection.

Mr. MAUGER.—Hear, hear.

Mr. REID.—That is right; let the English people know that. That will be another encouragement to them to agree to a tax upon food.

Mr. MAUGER.—The English people do know that.

Mr. REID.—The Age further said—

Mr. Chamberlain has distinctly stated he is satisfied to work on that basis. Mr. Deakin's preferential policy is crystallized in a sentence.

Everything is crystallized in an Age leader—

"Great Britain must make the first move." That is the sound position to assume.

We all assume it; but because I agree with it I am the enemy of the Australian farmer! Since that article was written another obstacle has occurred. The Imperial Government has categorically rejected the policy of taxation on food and on raw materials. The present Imperial Government has distinctly said that that is no part of its policy. Is not this new anxiety about preferential trade more an attempt to create mischief, than anything else? The fact is, that my strong objections to preferential trade are from the point of view, that it would be most seriously injurious to the Mother country herself. I believe that if the Mother country were to adopt that policy, she would be injuring herself in a most serious way.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Would it be beneficial to Australia?

Mr. REID.—I expressed these views only the other day. Before I became Prime Minister, I was asked to send a contribution to a book which is coming out on Mr. Chamberlain's life and projects, and in the article I contributed, I expressed in the strongest way my belief that it would not be a good thing for the people of England.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Will it benefit Australia?

Mr. REID.—If the people of England come to the conclusion that it will be a good thing for them—and I admit that they know a little more about the matter than I can pretend to know—and if they do come forward with proposals, as I have already said, their proposals will receive from this Government as fair consideration as they could receive from any Government. But if it comes to a point at which I have to choose between adhering to and surrendering my views on fiscal questions, only one thing can happen. If any emergency occurs, and we are unable to come to a reasonable view on any matter of moment which arises, we must be prepared to give our honorable friends opposite a chance. But we are not going to make troubles out of things that are in the future. We are not going, in an unbusiness-like way to create points of discord. Our enemies wish us to do that. They wish us to muddle public affairs; to do everything at the wrong time, and in the wrong way. We are here, not to oblige them, but to do our best in the public interest. I think I fairly represent even honorable members who do not belong to the party which I lead, when I say that if the fiscal question had remained for this Parliament to deal with, it would have been impossible for us to come together. The people, however, removed that question from this Parliament, and the main bond of union between us is this: We are absolutely opposed to the political methods of the Labour Party, and to the authority which their organizations have over members of Parliament, and we are absolutely opposed to their extreme socialistic designs. It is very easy for newspapers in Australia to publish articles, such as that which I have read, and which are republished in the great newspapers of the Empire; but I wish honorable gentlemen to recollect that these revolutions which undermine the security for property and enterprise, these threats of turning our industrial system upside down, come at a bad time. They help to aggravate the state of unrest and of want of confidence which is paralyzing the industrial expansion of Australia. Labour Socialists talk of a time to come, when the workers will all be happy, when they will all be employed in a Government factory; but attempts to carry such views to a violent extreme—an extreme which makes the very basis upon which property, enterprise, and labour rest insecure—are the worst things that can happen for that great mass of the workers who have to live by the expansion of industry under conditions of confidence and trust.

Mr. FOWLER.—I wish to make a personal explanation. The Prime Minister read amongst other things, the following passage, from the report of an address which I delivered in Melbourne, on Sunday night:—

Those members felt it was unnecessary and objectionable, and their ideas had at least received the assent of a majority of their colleagues. It is evident that the word "majority" slipped in accidentally. The passage should read—

Their ideas had at least received the assent of a minority of their colleagues. Otherwise, the report is substantially correct.

Mr. HUGHES (West Sydney).—The Prime Minister, at very great length, essayed

the task, that he himself declared at the outset to be ridiculously easy, of replying to the leader of the Opposition. So far as I was able to gather, the right honorable gentleman made a very ineffective reply. Even now, after having had an opportunity of going over in my mind what the right honorable gentleman said, I am at a loss to know his objective, or how nearly he approached it. He did, indeed, during one period of his address, declare the difference—or what he thought to be the difference—between his party, or that heterogeneous collection of gentlemen who now form his party, or permit themselves to be so called, and honorable members on this side of the Chamber. Beyond that his speech was a very general résumé of those very fruitful and interesting criticisms to which he has treated the country for some months past.

Mr. WEBSTER.—For some years past.

Mr. HUGHES. — Of course there comes with each succeeding address a certain amount of delicate adjustment to existing circumstances that serves to stamp the right honorable gentleman as an artist of the very first rank. He has not failed on this occasion to put on just that particular delicate shade of colouring which is perhaps necessary under the circumstances, and which marks the difference between the occasion of to-day and that of, say three weeks ago. He stated that the leader of the Opposition had made no definite complaint against the Government. I should like to know what he means by a definite complaint. He said we ought to have formulated in detail reasons for displacing him. Have we not, from the very inception of our movement, ten or twelve years back, formulated the reasons for dislodging such a Prime Minister as the right honorable gentleman? He stated also that he had received support from me for eight years, and of course he meant that he had also received support from other men who, like myself, have been members of the New South Wales Labour Party, and now sit in this House. Yes, he did receive—not for eight, but for five years—the unswerving support of men like myself, who gave him their assistance so long as he was marching, no matter at what pace, along the broad high road of democracy. When at length, slumbering in the pleasant shades of the banyan tree of office, he was too long inactive, we put him out, and we sat behind another gentleman, upon whom I am sure the right honorable gentleman has never, during his life-time, passed one word of eulogy. In that, at least, the right honorable gentleman has been consistent. We transferred to the honorable member for Hume the support that we had given to the right honorable gentleman. In detail then we object to the Government, because it stands for everything we detest and mortally hate. What more detail does the right honorable gentleman require? That is not a general charge—it is a specific charge. I see the right honorable member for Swan—all of whose ducks and geese are swans—assuming a content which I am sure he does not feel.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—How does the honorable and learned member know that?

Mr. HUGHES.—In the adjustment of the political kaleidoscope, the right honorable gentleman's expectations have not been fully realized.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is nonsense.

Mr. HUGHES.—But it is not all, for the exigencies of political circumstance have compelled the Prime Minister even to throw obstacles in the way of other laudable ambitions of the right honorable gentleman. Honest ambition, we are told by the Prime Minister, is a most excellent quality in a politician, provided it is an ambition that suits the purpose of the right honorable gentleman; otherwise it is anathema, and is to be crowded out. For what does the right honorable gentleman, the member for Swan, stand, when he forgets that power to which he himself bent very readily indeed in Western Australia, and under which he subdued his fiery spirit for three years in this Parliament, never letting us know—except occasionally—that he was opposed to us? For what does he stand when he comes out in his true colours? I assume that when there is nothing further to be gained by dissimulation, the right honorable gentleman does come out in his true colours. Does he want to know why we are opposed to him? Does he want to know in detail why we object to the Government? We object to the Government because of their abandonment of principle, and particularly because they stand for everything that we are here to oppose and denounce.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member is no doubt a great patriot. Doubtless he has shown it all his life, and has done some public good.

Mr. HUGHES.—I notice that the Prime Minister, since his recent elevation, has found it necessary to make a number of remarks about his high and responsible position. Well, it is a high and responsible position, but he has not been so long in it that it need have altered his whole nature, and the recognition of his great responsibility should not relieve him from the duty of explaining to the country why he is occupying his high and responsible position. Is the fact that he occupies that high and responsible position to be sufficient for the people of this country, and are they to accept that fact in lieu of a policy? A high and responsible position is an excellent thing; but what about his high and responsible policy? What is his policy? The right honorable gentleman said that the honorable member for Bland had taken exception to the fact that he had not outlined his policy for the next session. I am astonished at the honorable member for Bland. The right honorable gentleman outlined the whole of his policy for this Parliament, and for as many other Parliaments as he shall lead. Briefly, his policy viewed from one aspect, is a movement, in rapidity excelling all the most up-to-date engines of science. It is a movement towards recess, towards that beautiful oasis in the desert of politics that the right honorable gentleman appreciates so much, and which he does not hesitate to dangle before his own supporters, and also before the weary sojourners on this side of the Chamber for all it is worth. On the one hand he directs our gaze to the beauties of recess, and on the other points to the danger of doing anything to this Government, for he threatens us with a dissolution, if we attack them. Only last week, or the week before, he said that he wished to intimate at once that any movement upon our part to upset this delectable Government before it had got its second wind, would bring about an appeal to the country. Here was his first exhibition of statesmanship. He came into office to restore responsible government, to bring about majority rule, and to exorcise from politics that condition of things which hampered the free expression of individual opinion. This was to be the battle-ground upon which every man, without fear or favour, without any cracking of the party whip, or blowing of the party horn, was to be able to say what he thought, and to vote as he pleased. Yet he was not in office twenty-four hours before he declared that if we dared to do anything hostile to the Government, there would be a dissolution of the House. He speaks of his consistency in regard to his beliefs. I wonder whether he really believes his own statement. He asserts that if we dare to attack the Ministry, we shall bring about a dissolution. What did he say in 1899? He may remember the occasion to which I refer, when the honorable member for Hume, I presume he will say, was permitted by a jaundiced Providence, to occupy that sphere which he himself had ornamented so magnificently. I will tell the House what the Sydney Daily Telegraph reports him as having said then, and surely it cannot be wrong. Upon the 13th of September, 1899, it published this statement—

After making all the illegitimate use of the dissolution whip that he possibly could while his own turn was to be served by it, Mr. Reid—now hastens to deprecate the possible resort to any such tactics on the part of Mr. Lyne in any future emergency. There is a somewhat comic suggestion of over-anxiety for constitutional rectitude in a protest of this kind addressed to an incoming Premier, with an almost two to one majority. "There is," says the ex-Premier, "no sort of personal or inherent right to a dissolution on the part of any Government or any Ministry."

I hope that he will take that advice to heart. It is the teaching of a constitutionalist, which he may well accept—Reid upon Reid. Now the right honorable gentleman wishes to know why we are opposed to the present Government—he who assumed office to restore freedom of debate and freedom of personal opinion. Why? Because in his very first act he threatens the House with a dissolution. That threat will not frighten honorable members upon this side of the Chamber, although it may intimidate some of those who sit behind him. He states that it is impossible to formulate a great national policy in a few minutes, and that he and his colleagues have too much sense to attempt anything of the kind. Certainly he has too much sense to do anything that will obstruct his smooth and easy path to recess. When once he got there all would be well. There he is. He stands for recess, and all that recess means, and with one solitary exception in his political career he always has stood for it. Again he declares that the leader of the Opposition did not supply him with any information in respect of the Labour-Liberal alliance. He is very anxious to learn something about that alliance. His chief anxiety is to learn whether it is an alliance de facto or merely de jure. If it be an alliance which exists only in the mind of a certain constitutional lawyer—that alert intellect which he seems to dread a good deal—he will be very well satisfied, but if it be de facto an alliance, he will be very much annoyed. However, he may take heart. The explanation is abundantly simple. It is to be found merely by glancing at this side of the House. Here is to be seen the Alliance. It is de facto—and de jure, if the right honorable member so chooses to regard it—an Alliance which, at any rate, will be effective, so far as he is concerned, upon all occasions. It has, amongst the other bonds which unite it, one invincible and ineradicable determination, and that is to remove him from the Treasury bench. The right honorable gentleman came into power to restore responsible government. To whom or to what is he to be responsible? He is not to be responsible to this House, because almost the first announcement which he made, good, careful man that he is, was that he did not intend to be defeated by a flank attack. We could not come any of that sort of business with him. We should require a charge of dynamite to shift him. Certainly nothing in the way of a mere detail of a Bill would move him. He said that he objected to the late Government resigning office upon a mere detail, and that he could not understand the chivalrous conduct of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. It hurt the feelings of this broad-minded gentleman, who, during his term of office in New South Wales, never did such a thing. He continued in office for five years, and notwithstanding that details which other men might have regarded as principles went toppling about his ears, nothing happened. He remained as calm as possible. When the present leader of the Opposition moved in the New South Wales Legislature, in regard to the Local Government Bill, which the right honorable gentleman introduced, that one vote should be given to each elector, and not four votes to one elector, he took his stand upon that measure like a man, and threw it under the table—he who came in with a garland upon his brow—the chap to save the country—and whose cry upon one dramatic occasion, was "Turn the fossils out," referring to members of the Legislative Council, whose only offence was that they adhered to their principles and were sold. From every balcony in New South Wales he frantically appealed to the people to give him an opportunity to wipe out of existence the Legislative Council of that State, or else to place him in the position of being able to shove down the throats of its members the principle of land values taxation. Although honorable members would never think it, the right honorable gentleman achieved what reputation he enjoys in New South Wales by an appeal to the people to take away the rights of private property. Can we imagine him, the chosen champion of the Property Owners' Association, actually desiring to put his sacrilegious and iconoclastic hand upon private property? He went to the country for the purpose of obtaining a mandate to tax land values, and came back with an enormous majority made up, I may say, of the members of the Labour Party. He came back with that majority, and the Upper House insisted upon knocking out the exemptions which he had inserted in the Bill to capture the vote of the small man. Then my right honorable friend—this stickler for principle—backed down, obedient to the will of the Upper House, and absolutely ate his words, and swallowed the enormous mouthings of principle in which he indulged when before the people. Such is the record of the right honorable gentleman for responsible government and majority rule!

Mr. REID.—And still the honorable and learned member and his party supported me all the time.

Mr. HUGHES.—We supported the right honorable gentleman simply because he was the only man we could find at the time to do anything at all for us. He derived what power and opportunity he had in New South Wales from our support.

Mr. REID.—Surely not altogether?

Mr. WEBSTER.—Absolutely.

Mr. HUGHES.—The right honorable gentleman never, in the whole course of his political career, held office in New South Wales for twenty-four hours, unless the Labour Party kept him there.

Mr. REID.—Absolutely untrue.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Will the Prime Minister please withdraw that statement?

Mr. REID.—Certainly, Mr. Speaker. I shall say that the statement is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. HUGHES.—In the New South Wales Parliament of 1894 he had a majority which, as I have already mentioned, was made up of three members whose votes never went on his side during that Parliament—men who were his most bitter personal as well as political opponents.

Mr. REID.—I have even now a number of such opponents.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Those men principally opposed the right honorable member because the Labour Party supported him.

Mr. HUGHES.—What has that to do with the matter?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the honorable and learned member cannot see what bearing my remark has upon the subject he must be very dense.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member for Parramatta may as well attend to his own little shortcomings, and leave the right honorable gentleman to look after himself. He is well able to do so.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I shall also attend to the honorable and learned member.

Mr. HUGHES.—The Prime Minister, who came into office to restore majority rule and responsible government, never held office, with the exception of a few months which I have mentioned without our support. Even during those few months he held office because we fought for the same principle. And yet he speaks of coming into power to establish majority rule! He has come in with a majority of two, and he is afraid to-night that that majority has dwindled away to nothing. When one honorable member incautiously pinned his card to a seat on the Ministerial side of the House, the Prime Minister said, "My majority has gone up 100 per cent." How much has it now gone down? Two hundred per cent. He wishes to know why we oppose his Government. Let me tell him. I hold that we have a right to oppose a Ministry that came into power to restore responsible government, and has evaded all responsibility by crawling on all fours ever since. We have a right to oppose a Ministry which came in to restore responsible government, but whose first public announcement is that it is not going to be put out of office until it is pulled out with a block and tackle. When I made an interjection a few nights ago about responsible government, the Prime Minister replied, "There is no rule without an exception." The right honorable gentleman is made up of exceptions.

and so is his Ministry. Yet he has come in to restore responsible government! He came into office once before, in the Parliament of New South Wales, to take the burdens off the shoulders of the poor. He did a little in that direction, and has never done anything since. The right honorable gentleman is very anxious to know something about the new alliance. A complete statement of its principles, and the terms upon which it united, has been published, but I desire to say that it has something better even than that to recommend it. It is an alliance of men who, so far as principles, excepting fiscalism, are concerned, are absolutely united. The members of the alliance believe in the same principles, and what is more natural than that men who are agreed upon essentials should combine? The Prime Minister desires to know what sacrifice of principle is involved. Let me deal with that question. I take the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. He is a protectionist, and has never hesitated to declare that he is. I am a free-trader, and no one will deny that, when I have stood on the free-trade ticket, I have always done my part in the advocacy of free-trade. I am so much a better free-trader than is the right honorable gentleman that, unlike him and the honorable member for Lang, I am in favour of resorting to land values taxation. The honorable member for Lang is opposed to land values taxation.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable member for Lang will speak for himself.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member surely cannot be the "Mr. Johnson" who spoke the other evening at the Henry George celebration. He cannot be the honorable member for Lang, who delivered an address on "Henry George and land values taxation," and the Prime Minister, who is opposed to land values taxation, surely cannot be the man who, in 1894, stumped New South Wales in favour of that principle.

Mr. WEBSTER.—He is.

Mr. HUGHES.—These honorable members now talk of free-trade. My record, as a free-trader, will bear favorable comparison with that of the Prime Minister, and the record of the honorable member for Melbourne Ports as a protectionist will bear favorable comparison with that of the Minister of Trade and Customs.

Mr. MALONEY.—It is much better.

Mr. HUGHES.—On every point, except fiscalism, I venture to say that the honorable member for Melbourne Ports and I are perfectly in accord.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Then why did the Labour Party oppose him at the last election?

Mr. HUGHES.—I am just about to deal with our methods. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports says that he does not approve of our pledge; but on the broad principles which underlie our platform he and I are agreed. There is, therefore, nothing more natural than that, in the face of these serried ranks of honorable members opposite who have abandoned every principle, we should join our forces. We have before us the honorable member for Parramatta, hand in glove with the honorable member for Kooyong, and the sworn brother of the honorable member for Flinders. The honorable member for Parramatta also finds a particular friend in the honorable member for Corangamite. And so the list goes on. What more natural in these circumstances than that we, who believe in the same principles, but are not quite agreed as to the method of attaining those principles, should now band ourselves together, stimulated, and, indeed, compelled to do so, by the combination that we see on the Ministerial benches, consisting of honorable members who have abandoned every principle of which they have for a long time declared themselves in favour, and who apparently have no set principles, except a desire to get into recess as quickly as possible, and to evade the consequences of their treachery and misdeeds. When we compare the alliance with the coalition we find in our ranks no such divergences of opinion as are represented by the honorable and learned member for Parkes, and the honorable member for Lang.

Mr. JOHNSON. — The honorable and learned member for Parkes is a better judge of democracy than is the honorable and learned member.

Mr. PAGE. — The honorable member's idea of democracy is a remarkable one.

Mr. HUGHES.—If, as I understand, the honorable member for Lang regards the honorable and learned member for Parkes as an ideal democrat, it would ill become me to disturb such a pleasing belief. All that I have to say is that, as the honorable and learned member for Parkes has been throughout his political life bitterly opposed to everything that the honorable member for Lang has permitted a long-suffering country to believe he insisted on, either one or the other cannot be a democrat. They cannot both be democrats, and I shall leave them to settle the delicate question as to which of the two is. The right honorable gentleman at the head of the Government is not a Socialist, or at any rate he is only a kind of "so-so Socialist." He is in favour of Socialism as long as it does not interfere with the exercise of individual freedom. He does not mind how far the Government and the nation go in restricting individual liberty. That is to say, so far as a straight line is a straight line, and can be made straight without curves he is in favour of straight lines, but when it comes to corkscrews—when it comes to circles—he altogether objects to straight lines. When we have a clear, definite, and unambiguous statement of that kind, no man can be under any misapprehension any longer. My right honorable and learned friend at the head of the Government, says he is opposed to Socialism. He says, "Restrict human liberty only so far as is necessary; but I will go no further"; and he does not even go so far! But what is the position of the honorable and learned member for Parkes? He, at any rate, is logical. His position requires no defence. By right of his opinions, he takes his position on the Government side of the House. He is opposed to our party, because he is a Spencerian, who believes to the very uttermost in individual effort, as opposed to State aid, or governmental effort. He believes in the "survival of the fittest" without qualification. He believes in no public libraries, no State-owned tramways, no public baths or washhouses, no municipal effort. He stands as a clear individualist, without any sort of kink or reservation. My right honorable friend, the leader of the Government, has never dared to oppose State railways or State tramways. He is in favour of doing anything that he can do towards assisting individual effort, when it can be done without affecting individual liberty—and above all, can be done without risking his position upon the Treasury bench. Here, then, is a combination—the right honorable gentleman at the head of the Government, the honorable and learned member for Parkes, and the honorable member for Flinders, who stands, I suppose, as the living embodiment of individual effort. He, however, is at least not so consistent as the honorable and learned member for Parkes. As the leader of the Opposition said this afternoon, he is not one of those anti-Socialists who want everything done for them by the State, but refuse to allow the State to do anything for anybody else. The head of the Government says that one of the reasons why he is opposed to us is, that we stand for class legislation. I would ask the honorable member for Flinders, when he has time to get this idea thoroughly into him. I should like him to tell the House what he calls class legislation. Is it not class legislation to give to one section of the community aids in the direction of butter bonuses, assistance in the way of irrigation, and cheaper freights, and greater opportunities for displaying their goods in the markets of the world, and otherwise? Are not all these things advantages for a class? It is very necessary that they should be done—very desirable. And I stand by everything that the leader of the Opposition said on this subject. I desire that these people should get all these things, but not that they only should get them. I desire that some other sections of the community should get similar advantages. So that we are not for a class, as the head of the Government and the honorable member for Flinders and others are for a class; but we are for the whole nation. That is our position. We are opposed to this Government, that has come in, according to one of its leaders, to oppose Socialism, to restore responsible government, and to fight against class legislation, but which has behind it the Property Owners' Association. What is a property owner? How does he differ from an ordinary man? We stand for men—for citizens—not for property owners. Every man and every woman is not asked whether he or she has any property, on wishing to join our associations. We do not ask whether they have "a stake in the country." It is sufficient for us that they are men and women. That is all that we want to know, and we are here to help them. If they are down-trodden and suffering an injustice we are ready to help them. So much for class legislation, and now for another matter. My right honorable friend came in to abolish third parties—or at all events, one of the heads of the combination did. I give the Prime Minister credit for this—that he does not stand here to abolish anything that will abolish him. It so happens that the abolition of third parties would destroy my right honorable friend. Therefore, he is opposed to their abolition.

Mr. REID.—Honorable members opposite, of course, came in to abolish themselves—poor disinterested people!

Mr. HUGHES.—The right honorable member for five years in New South Wales lived by virtue of a third party. To-day he is quite consistent to his old belief and opinions. He is living by a third party, or, for aught I know, by a third and a fourth party. There is one party who stand by themselves—that solid phalanx of men who represent people who have a "stake in the country," men of solid and prosperous appearance, who are so different from us wretched Cassiuses. We are not sleek, fat-headed men. I am sorry that we are not. The honorable members to whom I refer are such men as Cæsar would have desired to have about him—

Let me have men about me that are fat, sleek-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights;

They sleep o' nights, while other poor devils perhaps cannot sleep by virtue, it may be, of some of the laws which these gentlemen are going to oppose or introduce. We are asked why we oppose this combination. What is the position that the honorable and learned member for Ballarat occupies in this interesting coalition? Where is he? He does not believe in the policy of the coalition Government to the extent of joining it. He believes that the coalition is a jolly fine thing, but he will not become a member of it. His statement about it is very much like the advice given by certain people—"Go on the land; cultivate the soil"; but who will not go on the land themselves, and who would never cultivate anything more than a geranium in a flower-pot. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat says that he is opposed to our party, because we are over-organized, because we are dominated by machine politics, and because we are controlled by caucuses of men outside Parliament. He desires to re-establish responsible government, and so he gives his support to a Ministry which comes in to restore responsible government. How gratified he must be at their early movements made in that direction! I feel sure that he sheds tears of joy to see the herculean efforts of the Prime Minister towards that end. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat went out of office because he considered that third parties were obnoxious. He must be highly pleased with the result of his action. He is followed by a small and rapidly diminishing band of faithful men who will not go into the ordinary room which the followers of the Government use, but go into a little room of their own. If the fates are as kindly to them as they have been, the honorable and learned member will soon be able to put his party into a piano-box or a packing-case. He started out with a party of some fifteen or sixteen, or more. They are down to some six now. Some of them sit opposite; some of them are with us. None of them are dead, I hope; but at any rate there are very few left. Some have been seduced by the siren's voice of the half-head of the Ministry. There they are—two of them—no, there are three, and they have accepted the advice of the right honorable gentleman, and gone into the thing thoroughly. They have trampled on their scruples, and they have forgotten their little remarks to their electors. Some were not asked to join the Ministry, and the iron has entered into their souls; and with the faithful leader of the party, who believes in the abolition of third parties, they have gone into a little room of their own. And if the honorable and learned member for Ballarat says to-morrow that black is white will the right honorable gentleman at the head of the Government say that it is not? The Government is absolutely at the mercy of that eloquent, inconsistent, and ingenious gentleman who set out to destroy a third party by the extraordinary expedient of establishing four, and who restored responsible government by putting in a Government which denounced the late Government because it had a "crawling" policy, and has substituted a policy of crawling away with tremendous energy and towards the lettuce of recess. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat is in favour of the abolition of third parties; and I want to know what party he is leading now—the second party, the third party—or the fourth party? At any rate, he will not acknowledge such men as the honorable member for Kooyong, the honorable member for Flinders, the honorable member for Corangamite, or the honorable and learned member for Wannon.

Mr. WILSON.—Why not?

Mr. HUGHES.—Why not? Ask me not why not. Ask the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. I think that this refusal of recognition gives the honorable member for Corangamite a legitimate ground for complaint against the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. Are those gentlemen illegitimate followers of the honorable and learned member, that he will not acknowledge them. Why the honorable and learned member will not acknowledge them I do not know. Perhaps the room will not hold any more. A humorous effort was made by a newspaper a little while ago, when it said that only seven gentlemen attended the alliance meeting. How many followed the honorable and learned member for Ballarat into that little room? And who leads that other combination of righteous souls on the Government front cross bench? Is the honorable member for Moira in this, or that, or the other combination? Where does he sit? Where does he stand? Where is his resting place? We have a right to know. The Prime Minister says that the country wants to know all about the alliance on this side. What the country really wants to know all about, is what the present Government are doing in office? The Government came in to do something that the previous Government were unable to do. The present Government came in to restore responsible government. When the Prime Minister sat in Opposition he said that not for twenty-four hours ought the Labour Government to be allowed to remain in power, for we were, as it were, cutting right into the heart of responsible government—cutting right into the heart of those representative institutions under which the Empire has reached its present imposing proportions. But the Prime Minister never did anything after that. Having counted noses, he found that while not a day should be lost, many days had to be lost owing to the fact that he had no majority, and the time went on. Instead of challenging the late Government, as one would imagine such a man of principle would, he simply waited until the honorable and learned member for Corinella moved his ingenious little amendment. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat, whose speech about the Arbitration Bill would have moved even the angels to admiration, drafted, or assisted in drafting, that amendment.

Mr. REID.—Who drafted the proposal of the Labour Party as to clause 48?

Mr. HUGHES.—By whom does the right honorable gentleman think the proposal was drafted?

Mr. REID.—I have an idea it was not drafted in Melbourne.

Mr. HUGHES.—I trust the right honorable gentleman is not suggesting that we have any improper relations with any other place.

Mr. REID.—None whatever—they are business relations.

Mr. HUGHES.—I thought the right honorable gentleman was going to suggest that it was not drafted on earth. The emanations from this part of the House are deemed so suspicious as to lead to the belief that they come from “below.”

Mr. REID.—They would be too clever down “below” to make the mess which the party of the honorable and learned member did.

Mr. HUGHES.—I did not smell any brimstone about the amendment; but the brimstone may have been there all the same. Anyhow, it was an amendment which the right honorable member, while not believing in it, voted for. He was quite surprised when the late Government elected to make it a point on which they should resign if defeated.

Mr. REID.—No, I was not; I never expressed any surprise of the kind.

Mr. HUGHES.—The right honorable member said that he could not understand the late Government resigning on a matter of detail.

Mr. REID.—I said I could not understand the honorable member, after making the statement he did in the debate on the Address-in-Reply, in reference to the action of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, doing as he did.

Mr. HUGHES.—That is another exception. I notice that when the honorable member for Bland declared his intention to regard the amendment as serious, the present Prime Minister said, “Quite right! Quite right!”

Mr. REID.—I should think so.

Mr. HUGHES.—There was an opportunity for the right honorable gentleman to attain the position he now occupies. We are opposed to this Government because it stands for a policy that dare not be enunciated. What is the Government policy? Why do those organizations outside, which stand for monopoly and reaction, pin their faith to the present Government? It is not because of any declaration of policy, or programme, because no declaration has been made. But they believe in the right honorable gentleman at the head of the Government, supported by the honorable member for Kooyong, and the Conservative corner, and by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, whose principles are hazy to a degree calculated to bring tears to the eyes of his friends, and joy to the hearts of his opponents. They believe that this Government is the only one that can help them, and that sooner or later, with, perhaps, a few recruits from this side, the Government will be able to put in force that policy for which the right honorable member, with as little reservation as is possible with him, says he stands. The Prime Minister stands for the policy of the abolition of a White Australia.

Mr. REID.—The honorable and learned member will say anything after that, and he has been saying a good deal.

Mr. HUGHES.—The Prime Minister stands for the policy of the abolition of a White Australia.

Mr. REID.—What rubbish!

Mr. HUGHES.—The right honorable gentleman said this afternoon that the section which permitted the six hatters to be detained——

Mr. REID.—Are not our fellow-countrymen from England, Scotland, and Ireland white people? The honorable and learned member is a disgrace to the people from which he sprang, if he takes any other view.

Mr. HUGHES.—The Prime Minister has declared himself against the policy of a White Australia. But I ask him what he is going to do, not in the matter of the six hatters, but in the matter of six potters, whom he is now prosecuting in Sydney? Six potters were brought all the way from England and landed in this country. Although they are here, citizens of our own flesh and blood, bone of our bone, sinew of our sinew, under the régime of the right honorable gentleman instructions have been given to the Solicitor-General of New South Wales to file against the man who brought them here an information under the section of the Act which did not permit of the six hatters coming in. Under the potters' thumb the right honorable gentleman now stands; the mark of the beast is on him.

Mr. HUME COOK.—What will the Argus say to-morrow?

Mr. HUGHES.—This is the right honorable gentleman of whom the Daily Telegraph on 17th November, 1903, said——

Mr. Reid has specifically announced that he would endeavour, if placed in office, to repeal two enactments specially dear to the Labour Party, and which were only carried by the cordial co-operation of that party with the Government.

Mr. REID.—Hear, hear; I have not repeated them yet.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The right honorable gentleman does not dare to propose it.

Mr. REID.—The honorable and learned member knows that I am sworn to carry out the laws of the country, and if I did not do it, he would accuse me of treachery in breaking the law.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Of what did the right honorable gentleman accuse Sir Edmund Barton?

Mr. HUGHES.—The Daily Telegraph further said——

One of these enactments is the notorious section of the Immigration Restriction Act, by which it was sought to keep the six hatters out of the Commonwealth. The other is the equally notorious section of the Postal Act by which the Government seek to prohibit mail steamers from carrying lascar seamen.

Mr. REID.—I said it to-day again.

Mr. HUGHES.—It is a singular thing, and something more than a coincidence, that the right honorable gentleman should in the last few days have been compelled to bow down to these two enactments.

Mr. REID.—To the law; that is what I bowed to.

Mr. HUGHES.—He has permitted an information to be laid against the men to whom I have referred. Proceedings have been directed to be taken by the Department over which the right honorable gentleman presides against a man in Sydney for importing six potters into the State of New South Wales under contract.

Mr. REID.—And in violation of the law, which I am sworn to administer.

Mr. HUGHES.—And the six hatters were introduced also in violation of the law.

Mr. REID.—On the contrary, they were admitted, on the ground that their introduction was not a violation of the law. That is the answer to that. They are here now.

Mr. HUGHES.—The right honorable gentleman seeks now to evade the full responsibility of his action. I ask the honorable and learned member for Ballarat whether it is not a fact that the point in dispute between Sir Edmund Barton, as Prime Minister, and Mr. Anderson, was simply this: that Mr. Anderson had not sought that permission to land those persons which the Act required before persons introduced under contract could be admitted?

Mr. REID.—It was not that at all.

Mr. HUGHES. — The honorable and learned member for Ballarat acknowledges that I have stated the matter correctly, and that is the refutation of the statement of the Prime Minister.

Mr. REID.—The question was whether they came under that section or not.

Mr. HUGHES.—They had to ask permission.

Mr. GROOM.—They had to get a certificate of exemption.

Mr. HUGHES.—Persons who had contracted to perform manual labour came within the section.

Mr. REID.—The question was whether those persons did come within the section. That took a week to find out.

Mr. HUGHES.—And this is the first time the right honorable gentleman has said, in his denunciation of the proceedings relating to the six hatters, that this was the matter to which he took exception—the question whether they came within the section. What he said, according to the Daily Telegraph, is something very different. According to that newspaper, he objected to keep men of our own flesh and blood out of the Commonwealth—our own race, white men.

Mr. REID.—I say that now.

Mr. HUGHES.—Yet the right honorable gentleman now proposes to deport these six unfortunate potters—at any rate that could be done under the section—and to imprison the unfortunate man who brought them here—to paralyze his industry, and to drive out our own flesh and blood. The right honorable gentleman is pledged on this question. “If I have the opportunity,” he said, “I will strike this iniquitous section out of the Act,” and the first thing he does when he has the opportunity is to give instructions for a prosecution under it.

Mr. REID.—What would the honorable and learned member say of me if I deliberately broke the law of the land? Would he not denounce me?

Mr. HUGHES.—I am not here as a magistrate to declare what I should do with the right honorable gentleman if he broke the law; but, as a member of the House of Representatives, I call upon the right honorable gentleman to redeem his pledge, and strike that section out of the Act. The right honorable gentleman not only gives orders for a prosecution under the Act, but he says, “I am now with men who believe in this Act, and I am not going to say one word against it any more.”

To do a great right, do a little wrong;
And curb this cruel devil of his will.

The right honorable gentleman talks of breaking the law; but if it suited him he would break the law and the prophets. He asks why we oppose the present Government coalition? I say, because it stands upon a policy which it dare not enunciate. It stands for a policy which, so far as it is enunciated, is entirely a policy of negation. What policy is the right honorable gentleman for? Is he for the policy of White Australia, or against it? He denounces it on one occasion, and yet orders a prosecution under the Act.

Mr. REID.—The potters are white men, not blackfellows. What question of “White Australia” is raised by white men coming here.

Mr. HUGHES.—The right honorable gentleman said he was opposed to the section, until these potters came here. What sort of a White Australia would it be if the right honorable gentleman had his way; or, rather, if the property-owners, the Employers’ Association, and the other non-class institutions which stand behind him had their way? He has said that we on this side are responsible for every word that Tom Mann has said.

Mr. MALONEY.—A very good man, too.

Mr. HUGHES.—I do not know that I agree with everything that Tom Mann has said, but I know that I would much rather stand by what Mr. Mann has said than by what Mr. Walpole has said. Let the Prime Minister stand by what Mr. Walpole has said. Let the right honorable gentleman go to his own electorate and advocate the policy put forward by Mr. Walpole. At any rate, that would be an honest course to take.

Mr. REID.—I did not ask the honorable and learned member to advocate the cause of the disloyal men behind him—anarchists and republicans.

Mr. HUGHES.—Here is a statesman, a widely-read economic thinker, and he says that the anarchists are behind us. A man has only to go down to the Yarra Bank any Sunday he has an hour to spare, and he will hear the most unsparing denunciation of the Socialist Party by the Anarchists, and he can hear the most unsparing denunciation of the Labour Party by the Socialists, if he goes to Sydney.

Mr. REID.—They will all vote for the honorable and learned member's crowd against ours.

Mr. HUGHES.—The right honorable member either does not know what he is talking about, or is saying that which is not true. At the last elections the Socialist party declined to vote for our nominees, and put up several candidates of their own. I have been opposed on two occasions by Socialists, and other members of the party to which I belong have been similarly opposed. We oppose the present Government because its policy, so far as we can understand it, is to do nothing, to delay, and to hurry into recess. The Government have not dared to enunciate their true policy, but, judging by the appearance of those who sit behind them, it is a policy of reaction, a policy that stands for monopoly and for class legislation, a policy that would paralyze industrial legislation, and aims at holding back the sweeping tide of democracy. It is a policy which is supported in this House by men who have abandoned every principle for which they have stood. I am not now referring to fiscal principles, because, of course, there is a fiscal truce. We are opposed to the Government because its members and those who support it have nothing in common with each other. Take the honorable member for Hunter. What are his views? Has he anything in common with the honorable member for Flinders?

Mr. LIDDELL.—Yes. We represent exactly the same kind of electorates—farming constituencies.

Mr. ROBINSON.—And they do not believe in bringing the farming industries under the Arbitration Bill, as the honorable and learned member and his party do.

Mr. HUGHES.—I have only lately realized what a happy escape I have made. I used to sit with some of those honorable gentlemen, and I thought that they were fairly democratic. I now understand that the honorable member for Flinders, who is one of the bulwarks of the men with a stake in the country in this great State of Victoria, and the advanced democrat who took the place of the conservative Sir Edmund Barton, who passed the White Australia legislation in which the Prime Minister does not believe, but which he either voted for or did not oppose, have the same opinions. What those opinions are no one seems to know.

Directly one asks, "Are you in favour of this?" he is told, "No, not just now." Judging by the men who sit behind it, the Government stands for the policy of reaction, of conservatism, of monopoly, and of class legislation. As such, I stigmatize them, and as such, I shall oppose them. The Prime Minister to-night said something about fiscalism, and contrived, in that way of which he is such a master, to make it appear that we are sacrificing something if we do not stand by our various fiscal opinions. I wish to say, first of all, that it is true that I stood with the right honorable gentleman as a free-trader in this Federal Parliament. I will not deny that I have always been a free-trader; but I deny that for five years any man knew whether I was a protectionist or a free-trader. In New South Wales I sat behind the Government of which the right honorable member was at the head as a member of a party which had sunk the fiscal issue. One of the reasons why the honorable member for Paramatta left that party was that it sank the fiscal issue, which he regarded as of paramount importance.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is absolutely incorrect.

Mr. HUGHES.—I thank the honorable member for those words, for when he says that, I know that everything is right.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member is a good judge of what is right, and what is wrong.

Mr. HUGHES.—I am indeed. I have seen the honorable member do so few right things, and so many wrong things, that I am an excellent judge. When he did right, I supported him; but when he did wrong, I ceased to support him, and he went down, and has never been up since.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member never did any wrong in his life.

Mr. HUGHES.—I thank the honorable member. I shall get him to sign that statement, so that should I lose my present position, I may have a character which will take me anywhere.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member is a regular George Washington.

Mr. HUGHES.—I thank the honorable member again. The Prime Minister said to-night that we should stand by our fiscal opinions. For five years in New South Wales, the party to which I belong supported the Government which he led.

At that time, we were against having anything to do with, or to say upon, the fiscal question. I was elected on the first occasion in opposition to a nominee of my right honorable friend; but afterwards, he did not oppose me, because he was afraid that, if he did, some one who would sit in opposition to his Government would be elected. There was, therefore, an alliance between himself and myself, and between himself and the party to which I belong. That alliance existed de facto for three elections. We went to the country together, and we worked together harmoniously. It was only in rare instances that a candidate of one party was opposed by a candidate of the other. During those four or five years, the right honorable gentleman did not say a word against our caucus methods or pledges. He was perfectly satisfied with the party, and was delighted with the way in which we supported him.

Mr. REID.—The honorable and learned member is entirely wrong again. I publicly denounced the methods of the party during the elections of 1894.

Mr. HUGHES.—The right honorable member denounced us in 1894, before we supported him, but after we supported him he discontinued his denunciations until 1899, when we were again opposed to him, and he again denounced us.

Mr. REID.—I would take support from any one who would vote with me.

Mr. HUGHES.—Even the section of the Labour Party which supported the right honorable gentleman after 1899 were not denounced. Only quite lately he said nice things of the honorable member for Canobolas and myself, and exempted us from the avalanche of criticism which he levelled against our party generally. We had done all that was right, and he gave us a character like that which the honorable member for Parramatta has just given to me. The Labour Party in New South Wales, for five years, supported a Ministry headed by the right honorable member, and went to the country practically in alliance with him. He cannot, and does not, deny that. We supported him, and he supported us. After five years we had to put the right honorable member out, and we put the honorable member for Hume in. The latter introduced legislation of which we approved, and a great deal more of it than the right honorable member had given to us. The Prime Minister said the other night that we had squeezed more out of the honorable member for Hume in two years than out of him in five years; but the truth is that the honorable member for Hume proved himself so much the better democrat, that in two or three years he gave the people of New South Wales more and better democratic legislation than the right honorable member had given to them in five years. That is a fact.

Mr. WILKS.—Legislation that he originally opposed.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is not so.

Mr. HUGHES.—I know that the honorable member for Dalley did not oppose that legislation.

Mr. WILKS.—I supported certain legislation, but not the honorable member for Hume.

Mr. HUGHES. — We supported that legislation. The honorable member knows very well, because he is perfectly acquainted with all the circumstances of the case, that we supported legislation introduced by the honorable member for Hume, who proved himself to be at least as good a democrat and a statesman as the Prime Minister. We passed legislation under his leadership which stands on the statute-book of New South Wales to-day, and which has done for the people of that State much that is good. Very many people bless the name of the Government that introduced and passed such legislation. Now we are told that we must stand fast by our fiscal opinions. This admonition comes from a gentleman who, all his life, has been a free-trader. He is a free-trader first, last, and all the time. Now I am not a free-trader, first, last, and all the time. I am a member of the Federal Labour Party, a member of the Labour Party of Australia, and I believe the aims of that party to be infinitely more important than fiscalism. I have declared not once, but a hundred times, in the Parliament of New South Wales, that I was in favour of the labour platform as opposed to fiscalism. The Prime Minister never said a word when Mr. McGowen and Mr. Arthur Griffith and other men who were solid protectionists gave his Free-trade Administration for five years their consistent support. He never said that they were betraying their principles. He accepted from Mr. McGowen, and Mr. Griffith, and others, their faithful and unswerving support, and he relied upon them. Now he says that we must not, at this stage, do what we did then. As to what I am going to do upon the fiscal question in this Parliament, my position is abundantly clear. I was returned to revise the Tariff, and to support the right honorable gentleman in doing it. My honorable friend, like the brave old warrior that he is, never tried to do it. I remember him saying—when we members of the late Labour Party in New South Wales said that Federation would kill free-trade, and when he knew it—“Let us have Federation, and I will fight like a tiger for free-trade.”

Mr. REID.—And so I did—more than the honorable and learned member ever did. Not once did he stand upon the platform with me in support of that policy.

Mr. HUGHES.—That is one thing that stands to my eternal credit.

Mr. REID.—The honorable and learned member took my flag and my support, but did not back me up.

Mr. HUGHES.—I never had, in my electorate, any man outside of my own party who said one word in my favour. I never asked for it, and the greatest boon that they could confer upon me was to keep away.

Mr. REID.—What?

Mr. HUGHES.—The greatest boon they could confer upon me was to keep away.

Mr. REID.—Who are “they”?

Mr. HUGHES.—They are “they;” ye are “they.” I am not denying, and I have never denied that I was ready enough to accept the support of the Free-trade Party, and they have always been ready enough to accept mine.

Mr. WILKS.—Did not the honorable and learned member ask for the support of the Free-trade Party?

Mr. HUGHES.—Undoubtedly I did.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And received it to a very material extent.

Mr. REID.—When the storm was on the honorable and learned member was very good to me; we got on splendidly.

Mr. HUGHES.—I had a right, occupying the position that I did, to know whether or not the Free-trade Party proposed to support my candidature as a labour representative, and I asked the right honorable gentleman whether he proposed to support me, and he said, “Of course.” I had a right to expect that, because for four previous elections the right honorable gentleman had supported me.

Mr. REID.—When the honorable and learned member explained that he was free on the fiscal question I was quite satisfied.

Mr. HUGHES.—On the fiscal question, I was returned to this Parliament to revise the Tariff, and I followed my right honorable friend, because he was the reviser.

Mr. REID.—And now the honorable and learned member is following the honorable member for Indi.

Mr. HUGHES.—For two and a half hours I listened to the right honorable gentleman, and did not interject once, and I cannot go on if he persistently interrupts me.

Mr. REID. — I shall not do so any further.

Mr. HUGHES. — The right honorable gentleman was returned here to revise the Tariff. Now, what did he say? He is reported in the Sydney Daily Telegraph of 18th August, 1903, as having spoken as follows:—

I want to tell you frankly that, although all sorts of temptations have been addressed to me to sink the fiscal question, and although I believe I would be an infinitely stronger man, so far as the whole of Australia is concerned, if I would only sink this question, I cannot do it. My whole public career would be a fraud if I endeavoured to get political power by sacrificing the great principle of my political existence.

Mr. REID.—Hear, hear!

Mr. HUGHES.—Now the right honorable gentleman is a free-trader first, last, and all the time. I am not, and never have been, and do not want to be. I believe that free-trade is a better policy than protection, but I have declared, and I say again, that the planks of the labour platform are infinitely more important to me than any form of fiscalism. Does the right honorable gentleman say that a White Australia—or rather a Black Australia—is more important to him than fiscalism? No. He says free-trade is to him the beginning and end of everything; and yet there he sits in calm community with the Minister of Trade and Customs, the Treasurer, and the Minister of Defence. These three protectionists and another leaven the lump. The right honorable gentleman has sunk his fiscal belief. He is in favour of amending the Immigration Restriction Act with a view to removing the present restrictions upon the immigration of contract labourers, but he will not do that at this stage, because his friends in the Ministry do not agree with him. In fact, the right honorable gentleman is a seething volcano of convictions, but he cannot find an opportunity to carry them into effect. He says he will fight like a tiger for free-trade, and he will fight more like a hyena to carry out his other convictions; but circumstances are not favorable, and he cannot go on. He asks us to formulate in detail our objections to the Government. Why, it is with difficulty that we can bring ourselves to consider the claims of such a combination to ordinary treatment. Consider the circumstances under which the late Government came into office, and the conditions under which they were thrown out. Consider the promise we got from the honorable and learned member for Ballarat that we should have fair play. Consider the circumstances connected with the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. Consider the volume of opinion in this House that had led the country to believe it was in favour of the whole of that measure, and consider how it changed the moment that we assumed control of it. The head of the fourth party, or the third party in this Chamber—the honorable and learned member for Ballarat—wanted to give us fair play. He himself said so. He was in favour of entering into an alliance with us. That honorable and learned member who is opposed to the existence of third parties and to the methods of the Labour Party, made overtures to us some considerable time before the House met, that we should join with him. He did not qualify those overtures with any objection to our methods, to those irresponsible persons outside of Parliament, to the caucus, to the pledge, or to anything else. He was willing to ally himself with our party, ignoring what he now professes to regard as blemishes in our movement and platform. The House met. He was still in favour of an alliance, so much in favour of an alliance as such, irrespective of the party with whom he allied himself, that he was also in favour of an alliance with the right honorable member for East Sydney. That was, indeed, putting the virtues of an alliance before anything else. He made overtures to the right honorable member for East Sydney, and to us. We were unable to agree to his overtures. The right honorable member for East Sydney was in a very different position. He had taken a very rapid bird's eye view of the situation, and saw clearly enough that there was no hope from fiscal strife, or anything in that direction. He knows when he is "licked," and says so. Anybody who has watched his career would know so much without his saying so. No man accepts defeat more readily, or declares it more readily, when it suits his purpose to do so. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat was negotiating with two parties at the same time. The right honorable member for East Sydney objected to that. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat said he was very sorry, but could not help it. It was one of the consequences of his insatiate desire for an alliance of some sort, and if there had been three or four parties in the House, doubtless he would have offered to ally himself with every one of them. That is why I cannot understand why the honorable member for Corangamite has not been admitted to the little room in which the Ministerial protectionists meet. Yet, although the honorable and learned member for Ballarat wanted to ally himself with the Labour Party, because he conceived it would be a natural alliance with the Liberal Party which he was leading, he now stands behind the present Ministry, the head of which says he is glad to intimate that the honorable and learned member for Ballarat is his warmest friend, and that he has now only one mission in life, namely, to bring the blessings of brotherly love to the people of Victoria from those of New South Wales. He declares that his one mission in life is to bear the olive branch. He desires to embrace all the people of Victoria. He loves them so much that he wishes them to understand that those cruel things which he uttered a little time ago, were uttered in a frenzy, and must not be considered seriously. According to the Age of 17th May, 1904—

There is really a good deal of humour in politics "would men observingly distil it out." One exquisite piece of it lies in the tearful yearnings of the inventor of the Petriana Myth towards Mr. Deakin. Only a few months ago, when the local free-trade press was vainly trying to get the Victorian electors to accept Mr. Reid's nominees and throw over those of Mr. Deakin, no abuse was too rabid, and no falsehood too foul, with which to bespatter the protectionist leader. He was held up to the odium of the world at large as a man who pushed shipwrecked sailors back into the sea, and denied them a foothold in Australia. When Mr. Deakin branded these fictions with the name of the "Petriana Myth," and proved by irrefragable documents that his accusers had deliberately invented their accusations, he was told that he was a mere tool of the Labour Party, ready to cling to office by any means, however grovelling.

That represents the attitude of the right honorable member for East Sydney towards the honorable and learned member for Ballarat a little time ago. Now all is changed.

MR. REID.—I never made such a statement, and only the Age would say so. It is an absolutely false statement.

MR. HUGHES.—Anyhow, the Age does say so. When the late Government came into office, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat was still smarting under these gentle, amicable olive branch overtures on the part of the right honorable member for East Sydney, and he would not look at him. On the contrary, he declared that he was one of our warmest friends. According to the Age of 19th May, of the present year—

When Mr. Watson sat down yesterday, after making his statement to the House, of the Ministerial programme for the current session, Mr. Deakin rose and complimented him on having announced a policy almost identical with that which had been agreed upon between Mr. Reid and himself.

The honorable and learned member for Ballarat promised that we should receive fair play. At that time he was not opposed to our party to the extent to which he has latterly betrayed himself, but he was still angling for a coalition with the supporters of the right honorable member for East Sydney. Upon 20th May last the Age said—

The liberal caucus has silenced the cry of conservative coalition.

The honorable and learned member for Ballarat did not begin to see the vices which are inherent in the organization of the Labour Party until some time after. Possibly he thought that the Watson Government would fall into decrepitude and decay almost before it was out of its swaddling clothes. Possibly he hoped for the very best—that is, for the very worst. Perhaps he thought that we should require his assistance—that we should run to him, as to a foster mother. At any rate, we were promised fair play at his hands, and we expected to receive it. He urged then, as the chief reason why he acted as he did, that three parties in the House were undesirable, and rendered constitutional government impossible. Upon 23rd May last the honorable and learned member had altered his opinions to such an extent that the Age made the following remarks—

Mr. Denkin is at great pains to emphasize the differences between himself and Mr. Watson, and to minimize the points of dissimilarity between himself and Mr. Reid. . . . Having admitted that the business programmes are identical, he flies off to something which Mr. Watson has outlined as possible work for another session; and so, as there are no difficulties for to-day drags in possible differences of the future. That is not the attitude of a friendly critic, and shows a disposition of mind which is anxious to cause a quarrel. But the singular thing is that the leader who thus strains after something to justify him in opposing men to whom he has promised a fair trial quite ignores the dangerous differences which ought to have guarded him against all present thought of coalition with the free-trade leader.

Here then, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat begins to evidence that objection to the Labour Party which latterly has become accentuated. Now he is not only opposed to third parties as such, but he is opposed to the Labour Party as such—the very party with which, a few weeks or a few months ago, he was perfectly willing to ally himself, upon almost any terms—at any rate upon equal terms. As to this coalition, to which my honorable and learned friend has lent his powerful aid, but to which he has not committed himself body and soul, I would remind the House that as formerly projected, it was dealt with by the Age in its issue of 26th May last. I understand that the present coalition is the lineal descendant of that first proposed. I presume that the basis which supported the one first proposed supports the present. May I ask the Prime Minister for an approving nod.

MR. REID.—The honorable and learned member will not allow me to interrupt.

MR. HUGHES.—Jove sleeps. I presume that the present coalition is the same as that which formed the subject of the famous effort made by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.

MR. WATSON.—He said some time ago that it was not the same; therefore, there has been no public notice of the understanding.

MR. HUGHES.—If it be not the old coalition, what is it? What guarantee has the honorable and learned member for Ballarat that it is going to do that which he said it would? Where is the agreement for the maintenance of a White Australia? Has my honorable and learned friend not obtained it? I believe that he has. Can he rely on it? I believe that he cannot? Is he satisfied with a mere declaration? Does he not desire that it shall be in black and white? Will the honorable and learned member who does not believe in written pledges take the mere ipse dixit of my right honorable friend in this matter? I do not think that he will. I think he betrays a weakness in this little matter for black and white. And the Prime Minister, who has nothing but scorn for the labour pledge, says of the terms of the alliance, "Let us see it in black and white." Will he not take the word of an honorable member? It is, nevertheless, very convenient apparently to have everything in black and white. Now, this is what the

Mr. Hughes.

Age said of the coalition as first proposed in its issue of 26th May last:—

It may be at once conceded that if a coalition were necessary to make a policy effective, or to avoid any great danger to the integrity of parties, a coalition between the Liberals and the Labour Government would be quite a natural one. It would be a coming together of the two great branches of the Liberal party—a union mostly of affinities as contrasted with a union of discords in the proposed coalition with the conservative free-traders.

Here, then, we find that the Age emphasized that coalition which it believed ought to have been effected. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat was in favour of that coalition, but it did not come about, and he has ever since consistently opposed the party to which I belong. I have merely a few more words to say on the attitude of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, and I shall have done. The honorable and learned member was in office for nearly three years as a member of the Barton Government. During that time the Labour Party supported him, and he never said a word against it. Then he became Prime Minister, the Labour Party supported him, and he still was silent as to our organization and our methods. He next went to the country, and the verdict was so much in our favour that he thought it would be unwise to continue without our aid. He then requested us to join him. He made overtures of the most liberal character to us, and said not one word against our pledge, our methods, or our outside organizations. He did this publicly, in his Ballarat speech, and subsequently privately. We did not accept those overtures. He hoped by decisive action, possibly, to bring us to his way of thinking. Following that, he offered to coalesce with the right honorable member for East Sydney. He still hoped, I believe, during all this time, to coalesce with us. He never shut the door to a coalition with the Labour Party even while he was endeavouring to coalesce with the party led by the present Prime Minister. After that coalition had been consummated, however, he denounced our methods, although not to the extent he has since done. He denounced third-party Government, the methods of our selection, and everything in connexion with us. He demanded that the Labour Party, because of these things, should go out. At the very time that he was willing to coalesce with our party he had apparently some overwhelming objection to us. As time went on his denunciations became more bitter. And so we come down to the present day. We find that for three years he accepted our support, and said nothing against us. We find him during all this time willing to accept the aid that we would give him, glorifying in it, and willing enough to join with us in preference to coalescing with the party led by the right honorable member for East Sydney. Having coalesced with that party, however, he gradually withdrew that fair-play treatment that he had so liberally promised, and now we have not a more consistent opponent than is my honorable and learned friend. That is a very saddening reflection, and it is a matter which I should be glad to hear the honorable and learned member attempt to explain. On a previous occasion he smarted so much under some criticisms that I had offered, that he made some personal accusations against me—accusations which perhaps would have come better from some other man—but I ask him now to endeavour to explain, if he can, not to me, but to the country, the attitude at present taken up by him. I call upon him to explain his opposition to third parties, when he himself leads such a third party; that little band of honorable members who go with him to the little room to which I have referred. I ask him to say whether the members of that little band owe allegiance first to him, or to the Government. I ask him to say where he stands with the conservative phalanx on the front cross bench on the Government side, and also to state how he stands in regard to democracy in Australia, in regard to the policy of a White Australia, and to that reversal of such a policy which the Prime Minister has promised. The people of Australia have a right to receive an answer to these questions. If they be answered, we shall know something about majority rule; we shall then learn who is ruling the country—whether the little band behind my honorable and learned friend control it, whether it is run by the conservative phalanx in the Government corner, or whether it is controlled by my right honorable friend who has placed himself in the hands of outside class organizations, employers' unions, and property-owners' associations to such an extent that he stands here to-day without a declared policy, except that of getting into recess. He has thrown over the High Commissioner Bill. Where is the right honorable member whose last "Swan" song amused the late Government? He has been thrown over because the Government's march to a speedy recess would not be expedited by the introduction of the High Commissioner Bill. The Prime Minister has inquired why we are opposed to him, and has requested us to formulate some reason for seeking to displace him. The late Government were butchered in the most cowardly and unprecedented fashion by honorable members who had not the courage to formulate in detail their reasons for displacing it, and were unable to deal with us as every other Government has been dealt with in this House, irrespective of from what section of the House it came. This Government, which comes into office with its hands stained with the last Government's blood, composed of honorable members who have abandoned their principles, and have nothing in common save a desire to remain where they are, now ask for consideration. If the Government wish to know why we are opposed to it, let me say that it is because it stands for reaction, for monopoly, for class legislation, and for what it terms "anti-Socialism." I shall not deal with that phase of the question, for it has already been dealt with by the leader of the Opposition. The difference between the policy of our party and that of the Government, so far as it has been enunciated this afternoon by my right honorable friend, may be briefly stated. The Prime Minister says the difference between his party and ours, so far as Socialism is concerned, is that while we are prepared to go to extremes—to socialize everything—he will only go a certain length in that direction. I appeal to him to be specific in this matter, and to tell us at what particular point he will stop. Where will he stop? As for us, our policy is clear, and our methods are open to all men. We would socialize everything when, and only when, it became a monopoly. When it is necessary in the interests of the community to socialize anything, is when, in our opinion, it has become a monopoly, and, therefore, dangerous to human liberty. Let my right honorable friend dare to say what his masters outside wish him to say, that he stands against Socialism in that direction, and that he will not nationalize monopolies because the employers' associations outside and other associations—class associations—that he stands for, are in favour of them. We are opposed to this Government, because it has no policy. We are opposed to it, because it threatens us with a dissolution if we dare to do anything against it. We are opposed to it because it is made up of men who have nothing in common. We are opposed to it because it crawls on all fours towards recess, and because it stands for nothing but reaction.

Mr. REID.—Has the honorable gentleman got to the peroration yet?

Mr. HUGHES.—Peroration, with an individual like the right honorable gentleman sitting in front of me! He interrupts in such a way that Demosthenes himself would be unable to perorate under the circumstances. If I were to perorate as I should like to do, I should tell of a man who has shamefully betrayed his hustings pledges, as the right honorable gentleman has done, and it would be a peroration that would burn into his heart and mind, and be engraven there for ever. It would be a peroration that would penetrate even that pachydermatous hide of his that no ordinary criticism seems to be able to pierce. He would not then sneer about a peroration, but would betake himself to some quiet, secluded recess, where he could commune with himself and ask whether repentance was not possible. We have no confidence in this Government, we can have none, and, therefore, we oppose it. I believe that if an appeal were made to the country, the people of Australia would be only too ready to approve our opinions as to this Ministry. We believe that this Government does not occupy the Treasury bench by the will of the people of Australia. We say that it is there first of all by a trick, and secondly as the result of a combination of men who have abandoned their principles. Not all of them; I do not say that for a moment. I do not say that men like the honorable member for Flinders have abandoned their principles; but I do say that the Government is composed of men who are so widely dissimilar in their opinions that if they have not abandoned their principles, some tremendous explanation or excuse is necessary to explain to the country how it comes to be that they are now united upon a policy which absolutely is so tenuous as not to bear examination, and which we, as an Opposition, do rightly challenge and denounce.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I am but a young parliamentarian, and, therefore, I cannot speak from long experience; but, as far as my knowledge goes, I believe that usually when a Government is challenged, it is challenged upon some question of public policy, or because of the non-fulfilment of pledges, or for some specific reason which can be clearly shown. But now we have the astonishing spectacle of a Government being challenged, not for acts of maladministration, not upon any ground of public policy, or of injury to the public weal, but simply because it has decided to go on with public business, and devote the tail end of the session to some useful public purpose. That is the sole ground, apparently, for challenging the existence of the present Government. There is no justification whatever for the action which has been taken by the leader of the Opposition. So far as his speech was concerned, not the slightest reason was advanced for the tabling of this motion. The speech to which we have just listened has added nothing further in that direction. On the contrary, it has simply been one long tirade of abuse, and of misrepresentation, and has been conspicuous for the amount of spitefulness and vindictiveness which have been imported into it. We have heard a great deal about a White Australia. But is it not a fact that the present Prime Minister moved an amendment in the Alien Immigration Restriction Bill to substitute the colour line for the education test, and is it not a fact that he had the support of the leader of the Opposition in doing that?

Mr. TUDOR.—Not in this Parliament.

Mr. JOHNSON.—So much has been made of this White Australia cry, that I am justified in saying that the use which has been made of it is altogether unjustified by the facts. I will quote what the Tocsin said in regard to certain members of the Opposition in reference to that matter. Speaking of two members of the Opposition, the Tocsin said—

When it came to the vote, McMillan kept his promise, but Mauger did his little somersault. That is in reference to the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. Then, in regard to the honorable member for Bourke, the Tocsin said—

When it came to the division, he, like Mauger, turned turtle. Hume Cook was one of the few citizens of the Commonwealth who, to use his own words, would not support the proposal for which he had spoken.

As to the honorable member's attack upon the Prime Minister, in reference to his action with regard to the six potters, I should like to know what action the honorable and learned member himself would have taken, and what he would have said if the Prime Minister had adopted any other course. He would have said that honorable members ought to vote against the Government, because the Prime Minister had not the courage to carry the law of the land into effect. I ask honorable members opposite whether it is not the duty of the Prime Minister, or any responsible Minister, when he finds a law in existence of which, personally, he may disapprove, to carry out that law just as fully as if he was in favour of it? Would it not be a dereliction of duty if a Ministry did not carry out the law? That is an aspect which ought to be placed before the country in contra-distinction to the aspect already placed before us—an aspect which has been grossly distorted. Carrying out the law as it exists is not inconsistent with any promise which a Minister may make to alter that law if he gets the opportunity. Until that opportunity presents itself, and the Minister is able to repeal the law or its objectionable sections, it is his duty to see that it is carried into effect.

Mr. REID.—A Minister is under oath to do so.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is so; and if he does not do so, he simply breaks the oath he takes on accepting office.

Mr. TUDOR.—But the Prime Minister denounced a previous Government for carrying out the law.

Mr. REID.—In that case the men were not breaking the law, and they were liberated.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It is unfair for the honorable and learned member for West Sydney to bring charges of this character against the Prime Minister. But what can we expect? The Opposition has absolutely no material on which to base an attack of a legitimate character, and they are driven to the necessity of resorting to those questionable and very unfair means to bolster up a motion which has no justification whatever so far as the public interest is concerned. I am surprised that an attack of the kind made on the Prime Minister should come from the honorable and learned member for West Sydney.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He, of all others!

Mr. JOHNSON.—Of all men in this Parliament, the honorable and learned member for West Sydney is the last who should say one unkind word of the present

Prime Minister. No man has received more favours or greater kindness at the right honorable gentleman's hands than has the honorable and learned member.

Mr. BAMFORD.—What does the honorable member for Lang know about it?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I happen to be in a position to know. While the honorable and learned member for West Sydney has been making attacks on honorable members on this side, because of an alliance with those who are of opposite fiscal faith, it is a fact within the knowledge of many besides myself that the honorable and learned member sought the support of the party in New South Wales, of which the present Prime Minister was the head.

Mr. FRAZER.—The honorable and learned member for West Sydney does not deny that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member for West Sydney had more support from that party than either myself or the honorable member for Lang.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Unquestionably. The Prime Minister went out of his way to assist on the platform, and in other ways, the candidature of the honorable and learned member for West Sydney. That honorable and learned member himself, when he saw that his name did not appear on the list of approved candidates of the party led by the present Prime Minister, I am credibly informed, went to the newspapers and sought the support of the party. I hold in my hand a special issue of a leaflet sent out by the Free-trade Association of New South Wales at the request of the honorable and learned member for West Sydney.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The honorable and learned member is a good free-trader.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That leaflet asked the electors to vote for the honorable and learned member, not because he was a labour candidate, or because he was a member of any other party, but because he was a free-trader, and he desired the imprimatur of the Free-trade Association.

Mr. BAMFORD.—When was that?

Mr. JOHNSON.—At the last Federal election. The leaflet is headed, "How to vote in the West Sydney electorate," and there is a representation of a ballot-paper with the honorable and learned member's name marked.

Mr. FRAZER.—Why labour the point? The honorable and learned member does not deny being a free-trader.

Mr. JOHNSON.—But he sought the imprimatur of the Free-trade Association while running under the flag of the Labour Party.

Mr. FRAZER.—He does not dispute that.

Mr. JOHNSON.—He was running in a dual capacity. It is all very well for the honorable and learned member to now come into the House, and say that free-trade is a secondary or tertiary matter—that the Labour Party is first. Free-trade was first when he was seeking election. And why? Because he knew perfectly well that if the Free-trade Association had put another free-trader up against him he would not have been returned. Did not the honorable and learned member, through the present Prime Minister as the leader of the Free-trade Party, beg for the support of the association when he was in danger, knowing that without that support he would probably lose his seat? If the honorable and learned member makes these disgraceful and unwarranted attacks on the Prime Minister it is right that something on the other side should be shown. I would be the last to say an unkind word of an opponent, and these words are said, not in any unkindness, but only with a desire that honorable members and the public shall learn the truth as to the actual position the honorable and learned member for West Sydney occupies as a member of this House. I have a perfect right to show that the honorable and learned member was a candidate with the imprimatur of the Free-trade Association, from which a request was sent out that the electors of West Sydney should give him their votes.

Mr. FRAZER.—The honorable member has only proved what was admitted before he started.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable and learned member for West Sydney also went out of his way to attack my position in regard to certain principles which I hold—to charge me with abandoning those principles. But I have a better record than the honorable and learned member can show for holding true to the principles which I have advocated all my life. There is not the slightest abandonment of principles shown, in the fact that I am supporting the present Government. There is no alliance, so far as the two parties are concerned, other than one which is based on the perfect freedom of individuals—on an entirely voluntary principle. There is no attempt to subjugate principles, or to put a round peg into a square hole. Every honorable member in the alliance is left absolutely free to follow his own inclinations, according to his convictions; there is no restriction in any direction. I defy any honorable member of this House, or any one else, to coerce me into voting in a way I do not think proper. I am a free agent, and I am at liberty to hold opinions differing from the opinions of the leader of my party on other matters than the one vital principle which unites us as a party.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Why was the honorable member not here to vote against the third reading of the Arbitration Bill?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I was laid up with influenza at the time, and I did not know that a division was to be taken. There is absolutely no justification whatever for the motion tabled by the leader of the Opposition. The half-hearted manner in which the honorable member for Bland advocated his cause, showed clearly, to my mind, at any rate, that he has no great confidence—that he feels there is no justification for the motion at the present time. What good can possibly be done by the motion? If the Prime Minister had brought forward a larger programme for this session, knowing there was no possibility of carrying it into effect, there would have been just ground for a motion of no-confidence or of censure. Here we are, at this late season, without the Budget, which ought to have been before us long ago; and this motion is only brought forward with the obvious object of obstructing public business, and with no other object in the world. It was clearly seen that the Government were going on with some useful measures, and making progress with useful legislation. We had got so far with the Transcontinental Railway Survey Bill that honorable members opposite began to take alarm. Some of them were afraid that the Bill would be carried, and that, by contrast with the work done by the late Government during a much longer period of office, there would have been too good a record for the present Government for the short time they have been in office.

Mr. TUDOR.—That was owing to the obstruction of honorable members opposite.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Was not the Seat of Government Bill of more importance.

Mr. BROWN.—If honorable members on this side treated the present Government as honorable members opposite treated the late Government they would be able to do nothing.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I now come to the real grounds for the opposition to the present Government. It is not opposed on the ground of public policy, because of the non-fulfilment of promises, or on account of any maladministration of public affairs. It is opposed for two reasons only, the first of which is personal animus against the Prime Minister. That is the mainspring of the action of honorable members opposite, and it is bolstered up by the second reason for opposition, which is the gratification of personal ambition by individual members on the opposite side. Not grounds of public policy, but private ambition and private hatred are the two worthy motives which are the basis of this motion of want of confidence.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The honorable member is altogether wrong.

Mr. JOHNSON.—We have only to look at the newspapers supporting honorable members opposite, and the utterances of their public men, to know that there is no other reason. We know that the public, of Victoria especially, have, month after month, and year after year, had their minds inflamed with the sole object of defaming the Prime Minister in their eyes. I am glad to know that the right honorable gentleman's residence in Victoria for some time, and his position as head of the present Government, has given, and will give him opportunities of meeting the people of Victoria face to face, and thus by personal contact, destroying the baneful influence brought to bear unfairly on the people of Victoria, with a view to prejudicing him in their eyes. We have to go back to the recent elections, and ask ourselves what was the issue put before the public at that time. We know that the issue, so far as honorable members opposite who at that time supported the honorable and learned member for Ballarat are concerned, was fiscal peace. That cry was taken up by every member of that section of the Opposition that is now clamouring for fiscal strife. In their election addresses and elsewhere, they supported the honorable and learned member for Ballarat in the demand for fiscal peace, which he raised as the chief issue of the general election. Those honorable members now break away from the agreement into which they entered with their chief, and, after the verdict of the country has been given in favour of fiscal peace, they desire to go back upon the verdict which they asked the people to give, and resort to fiscal strife. It is this betrayal of pledges which is the basis of the unholy alliance between those honorable members, and the members of the Labour Party. I say an "unholy" alliance advisedly, because it is an alliance which is based, not upon a recognition of the individual rights of free men, or on voluntary support, but on the subjugation of principles for private and party ends.

Mr. TUDOR.—What about the alliance which the party to which the honorable member belongs tried to make a couple of months ago?

Mr. JOHNSON.—That was an alliance made in open daylight, and all the points of the proposed agreement were handed to the press, while no honorable member of either party to the alliance was pledged to stand to it unless he chose. There was nothing of the "caucus" in that case. There was in that case no violent disagreement on the matter amongst ourselves, no bearing-garden within our own ranks, owing to some being for it and some against it, and those against it being compelled to vote for it afterwards. There was nothing of that sort. The agreement was simply put to members of either party individually and collectively, and they could accept or reject it at their pleasure. There was no power in either party to compel any single member to subscribe to the proposed agreement.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Grey left the party, and he has not yet been denounced as a renegade.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable member for Grey left the party because he did not accept what was proposed. The honorable member went over to the Labour Party, and, as is usual with brand new converts, he is now one of the bitterest opponents of those with whom he was formerly associated. I have just stated the issue put before the electors by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat as Prime Minister, and that issue was supported by the Age newspaper as the central cry upon which the campaign was based.

Mr. TUDOR.—Some of us were not in favour of that.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Perhaps not, but as a party honorable members supported it, and after they were returned, though they might not have supported it prior to the election, they sat behind the Government that had declared that that was the policy on which they had gone to the country, and upon which the verdict of the country had been given. On the 12th December, 1903, the Age said—

The watchword of the Deakin Ministry is fiscal peace, and all Australia at the present juncture should cry a truce on the Tariff question while the great issue of Imperial preference is being fought out in England.

A truce not only up till now, but while that great issue was being fought out in England. That is what the Age said on this question.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Who takes any notice of the Age?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Speakers on the opposite side have quoted the Age all night.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The Age newspaper was the organ of the party that went into the election campaign on that cry for fiscal peace. On the polling day, 16th December, the Age published a leader in which these words occurred—

To-day the electors will return their verdict. They are to-day most truly a jury in their country's cause. In this State we know beforehand the overwhelming preponderance of the popular voice is for the Deakin Government and fiscal peace as against Reid and another fiscal war.

I do not think the matter could have been put more clearly. There is the issue put on behalf of the Government by the Age newspaper, which was the organ of the Government, and was backing it up. The verdict of the people was in favour of that issue, not in New South Wales, it is true, but that State is only one of six, and the verdict outside of New South Wales was admittedly one of fiscal peace. On the same date, amongst the names printed in heavy black type, as supporters of that policy of fiscal peace, and as opponents of Socialism—because opposition to Socialism was another matter put prominently before the electors by the party—I find those of the honorable member for Bourke, the honorable and learned member for Corio, and the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. The same paper cautions the public against voting for Reidites, amongst other reasons because he is the man who, "by re-opening the Tariff, will disorganize Victorian trade and commerce." Who is it who to-day wishes to re-open the Tariff, and to disorganize Victorian trade and commerce? The prime mover in that direction is one of those who subscribed to the speech delivered at Ballarat by the representative of that city, who was at the time Prime Minister. But although he subscribed to the declaration for fiscal peace which that speech contained, he is to-day endeavouring to promote fiscal warfare. Associated with the honorable member to whom I refer is the honorable member for Hume, who, by the way, has been supplanted in the leadership of the rebellious section of the Opposition. The honorable member for Hume is reported to have said at Albury—

The fiscal question should never have been raised at this election. Whatever party is in power, the only possible Tariff must be very similar to that now in force, and until the expiration of the Braddon sections of the Constitution Act, it would be vain for either party to try to frame a Tariff.

How does that statement tally with the present position of the honorable member? Amongst others who supported the declaration for fiscal peace were the honorable and learned members for Northern Melbourne and Indi, and the honorable member for Bourke. We, on this side, have been charged with having sunk our principles, because we have entered into a perfectly voluntary and open alliance with members of the protectionist party. But our alliance involved none of the elements of coercion such as were involved in that of honorable gentlemen opposite. It has been the result of political accident, and has been caused by political circumstances, and the necessity for restoring responsible government and saving the country from the threatening disasters of class legislation of a most pronounced character. The representatives of New South Wales found that, as the result of the verdict of the people, they were not in a position to challenge the Government of the day. The Free-trade Party comprised only one-third of the House, and were consequently in a minority. That being so, how could they give effect to their fiscal principles?

Mr. BAMFORD.—We, on this side, have always kept our flag flying, no matter how few our numbers.

Mr. JOHNSON.—There has been no hauling down of the flag on the part of either free-traders or protectionists; but an informal and unofficial alliance has been come to between us, which is more powerful, and more likely to do useful work than the alliance of honorable members opposite.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member agreed to a tied alliance.

Mr. JOHNSON.—This is no tied alliance. Every member on this side of the Chamber is free to vote as he likes. No section and no clique can interpose between him and his constituents. He could, if he chose, vote against the Government. He is not bound by any pledge to an organization, and no one can come between him and his constituents. But what is the position of honorable members opposite? Some of them belong to a party which is governed by the caucus, and it does not matter what pledges they may have given to their constituents, if the caucus decides that it is not in the interests of the party to keep them, they must break them. That is the machine against which we are fighting. It is admitted, too, that there is no full agreement among honorable members opposite as to their alliance. Even if it had not been admitted, the modifications of the proposals for an alliance which have been put forward from time to time, modifications which have practically amounted to the surrender of principles on both sides, show that there is no full agreement. The leaders of the Labour Party have given the assurance that every effort will be made to induce labour organizations to withhold opposition to the extreme protectionists who have joined the alliance on a basis of support in return for concessions. But as they are only part of a huge machine the controlling influence upon which is the organizations outside, it is seen that they have no power to bind those organizations. Do honorable members think that members of the Labour Party outside who aspire to political honours will submit to the thwarting of their aspirations because the seats upon which they have cast their eyes are occupied by protectionists? Is it to be supposed that these men, after working for their organizations for years, subscribing to their funds, and, perhaps, suffering some privations, will consent to be calmly swept aside because the leader of the Labour Party in this House says that they are not to offer themselves for election to the positions to which they have been aspiring? Perhaps they may submit to such treatment, but unless human nature has undergone a great change within the last few weeks, I doubt very much whether we shall see any evidence of that unquestioning support by the Labour Party which has been promised to those honorable members who have entered into alliance with them.

Mr. MAHON.—When did the Labour organizations ask for the advocacy of the honorable member?

Mr. JOHNSON.—How long is this alliance to last? We find that the agreement entered into is not intended to extend—as our alliance was—over the life of this Parliament only. Honorable members opposite have assumed a power they do not possess, namely, to bind the next Parliament. How can they control the action of the next Parliament, of which they may not be members? It is certain that at least some of them will not be returned as members of the next Parliament. Their agreement can extend only for the life of this Parliament, and can affect only those parties who signed it.

Mr. POYNTON.—Let us go to the country. There is no need to prophesy as to the result.

Mr. JOHNSON.—If we do go to the country, the party to suffer will be that which is now trying to obstruct public business and to secure special privileges for a certain class, at the expense of all others in the community. I think that there is a fair amount of evidence of fear on the part of some honorable members opposite, that they will lose their seats. When some humorist, on a recent journey to Sydney, sent a telegram, which seemed to indicate the possibility of a dissolution, upon the defeat of the Watson Ministry, honorable members who had been very pot-valiant in this House, and who had talked in grandiloquent strains about appealing to our masters, the people, ceased their jubiliations. A great change came over the scene, because some honorable member were not sincere, even as advocates of the rights of the Labour Party. They had posed as the champions of certain principles, which they themselves abandoned when they had an opportunity to carry them into effect. What did they do? When the Deakin Ministry was in office, they went to the length of tabling a motion in favour of the inclusion within the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill of the public servants of the States. The then Prime Minister stated that the Government could not accept that proposal, because, in their view, it was unconstitutional.

Mr. TUDOR.—They have accepted it now.

Mr. JOHNSON.—No; they have not. Let me relate the history of events which have been referred to, but not correctly, by honorable members opposite. The honorable member for Wide Bay was put up to move an amendment providing for the inclusion within the scope of the Bill, not of the railway servants, but of the whole of the public servants of the States and of the Commonwealth. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat gave the Labour Party clearly to understand, that, if they pressed their proposal to a division, the Government would make it a vital matter, and, if defeated, would have to consider their position.

Mr. TUDOR.—That is the reason the honorable member voted for the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is one of the reasons, because I had pledged myself to get rid of the Deakin Government. Our object in New South Wales was to reduce the Customs duties, and to get rid of all those who were responsible for the Tariff, or who were likely to seek to increase the imposts under it. So that I was pledged, first of all, to get rid of the Deakin Government, and when the opportunity arose, I voted in order to put them out of office. But I had good reasons apart from that consideration for voting as I did. Honorable members of the Labour Party spoke about the amendment proposed by the honorable member for Wide Bay as embodying a vital principle, without which the Arbitration Bill would be absolutely useless. Notwithstanding that, by reason of their numerical strength as a minority, they were in the position to coerce the Government into bringing in measures which they, when they took possession of the Treasury benches, dared not bring forward, they were willing to press their amendment to a division. They did so, not because they desired to displace the Government, but because, secure, as they thought, in the knowledge that their proposal would be defeated, they wished to pose as the champions of the civil servants. They knew that the present Prime Minister was practically bound to vote for the Government on the question, because he had spoken so strongly in support of the attitude they had assumed, and they also thought that all the members of his party would follow him. That is where they made a grave miscalculation. They had overlooked the fact that the members of that party were free men who had the right to vote as they thought fit upon such questions. They had measured the Free-trade Party by the conditions of their own caucus, and they made a great mistake. The result was that when they discovered that several honorable members of the Free-trade Party intended to vote with them, it was too late for them to retreat from the position which they had taken up. The honorable member for Gwydir waved his arms like a wind-mill, and threatened those honorable members who supported the amendment with what would happen to them when they went before the electors—as if the Labour Party had not previously opposed them. Honorable members of the Labour Party, one after another, expressed themselves in terms which showed how disappointed they were at the prospect of the amendment being carried. But their knowledge came too late, and their object in posing as champions of the public servants was defeated, because, when they came into office, and had an opportunity to carry into effect the principle they had advocated, they failed to do so.

Mr. TUDOR.—No, they did not fail.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I say they did. They took into their Cabinet the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, who had previously voted for that provision. I believe that he voted for it. At any rate, whilst the Labour Party occupied the cross-benches the honorable and learned member, in speaking upon the Address-in-Reply, attacked the Deakin Government upon their position in regard to this matter. He said—as will be seen by reference to Hansard, page 1037—

The best argument that has been advanced by the Prime Minister is that at the inception of this Act it is inexpedient to overload it. I should be strongly impressed by that argument if this question were not involved in a greater one. We are asked to refuse to extend the operation of this Bill to the public servants of the States, upon the ground that we do not possess the constitutional power to take such action. With me that consideration overweighs any question of expediency. If we believe that we have the necessary constitutional power, by all means let us exert it. Now is the only time for us to exercise it. We must speak now, or be for ever silent. When we are told by the Government that we do not possess this power, we must insist upon testing the question.

That declaration meant that the only way in which the matter could be tested before the High Court was by including that provision in the Bill. The honorable and learned member affirmed that that was the only opportunity which honorable members had of testing the question, and if they believed in the principle they should incorporate it in the Bill. He continued—

I would not be a party to including in the measure any provision which I thought would be obligatory and useless. At the same time, if we honestly believe that we possess this power, let us exert it, and not abandon the trust which the people have reposed in us.

That language clearly indicates the attitude of the honorable and learned member upon this question. What happened subsequently? The Labour Government succeeded the Deakin Administration. Having defeated that Administration upon this very principle, which they had declared was absolutely necessary to the successful working of the Bill, one would naturally suppose that their first step would have been to include such a provision in that measure. Instead of doing so, however, they presented the Arbitration Bill with this clause excised from it, and that upon the advice of their Attorney-General, who had previously declared that they must seize this as the only opportunity which would present itself of including it in the Bill, so that the question might be tested.

Mr. POYNTON.—Can the honorable member name a public servant who is excluded from the operation of the Bill?

Mr. JOHNSON.—All civil servants were covered by the amendment.

Mr. POYNTON.—So they are now.

Mr. JOHNSON.—No; only the public servants of the States, and those who are engaged in industries.

Mr. TUDOR.—Would clerical employes have been covered by the amendment in its original form?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Unquestionably. There was no invidious distinction thus contemplated. The contention was that, without the amendment of the honorable member for Wide Bay, the Bill would be absolutely useless. I should like to dwell for a moment upon the attempt which is now being made to reintroduce the Tariff question, with a view to raising the protective duties at present operating? The object of the Ministerial alliance is to abide by the verdict of the people during the life of this Parliament. That arrangement involves no sacrifice of principle, because protectionists are still free to advocate their Tariff theories, whilst free-traders possess absolutely the same liberty. So far as the Free-trade Party are concerned, I hold that when they have not the power by force of numbers to effect any revision in the Tariff by way of lowering the existing duties, the next best thing for them to do is to attempt to prevent those duties from being increased.

Mr. TUDOR.—Then the honorable member admits that the protectionists who are associated with the Ministerial following are betraying the people.

Mr. JOHNSON.—No; because the appeal to the people was not made on behalf of protection, but on behalf of fiscal peace. As evidencing that, I will read what honorable members said immediately this Parliament met. According to Hansard, page 90, the present Prime Minister, in discussing the motion for the adoption of the Address-in-Reply, said—

I wish now to express my entire agreement with a remark made by the Prime Minister in a remarkable announcement which he made on the occasion of a great gathering in this city at the beginning of last month. I heartily agree with the Prime Minister that the only basis upon which a system of a responsible Executive, acting in a Parliament of this type, can be secured—the only possible condition under which that principle can be honorably and usefully worked—is when the Ministry in office commands the confidence of the full majority of the people's representatives. If the Ministry do not command that confidence, they should make an alliance—provided that alliance can honorably be made.

That is precisely in keeping with what has since taken place. He continued—

I will at once admit that, provided an alliance can be honorably made between two parties in the House, it is the only way in which to adjust the balance. But as long as three independent parties live in the same House—the parties being more or less equally balanced—the basis of an honorable Government is, I will not say lost, but endangered. . . . There must be none of these underhand intrigues. I hope that the party to which I belong, and that the Labour Party too, whatever they may do in the public life of this country, will act up to the principle which the Prime Minister has announced.

The honorable and learned member for Ballarat said, as will be seen by reference to Hansard, page 91—

The problem facing them now was how to conduct a Parliament which, instead of having a majority and a minority, had three practically equal parties taking part in the proceedings. It was a problem which had not yet been solved in any part of the world. . . . Administration and legislation had always been conducted on the principle of a majority and a minority. Now, however, they had practically three equal parties, and the position was unstable. It was absolutely impossible. It could not continue, and ought not to continue.

Mr. POYNTON. — That is the position which exists to-day.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It was the position taken up by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, and the present Prime Minister, immediately after the assembling of Parliament—so early, indeed, as the debate which took place on the Address-in-Reply. Their attitude indicated that two parties must find a common basis of agreement if the business of the country was to be successfully carried on. This statement was made by the honorable and learned member at a time when he was fresh from the elections. We may say that we are still fresh from the elections, for are we not in the first session of the new Parliament? Let me read what the honorable and learned member for Ballarat said on the question of the armed truce during the course of the same speech. At page 108 of Hansard he is reported as follows:—

When he spoke with a certain sympathy—

He was referring to the right honorable member for East Sydney—of the funeral obsequies of the Ministry, the apprehensions which I might otherwise have felt were calmed by the realization that he is wearing black crape upon his own arm in remembrance of obsequies far more important than those of a Ministry or party—the death and burial, during this Parliament, at all events, of the fiscal issue.

The honorable member for Bland, who at this time was the sole leader of the Labour Party—

Mr. BAMFORD.—He is still the only leader of the party.

Mr. TUDOR.—Does the honorable member think that we now have more than one leader?

Mr. JOHNSON.—The Labour Party is now a triple-headed party. I understand that the honorable member for Hume is one of its leaders, that the honorable and learned member for Indi is another, and that it has yet another in the honorable member for Bland. Honorable members on this side of the House have been twitted with supporting a double-headed Ministry. That may be an undesirable state of affairs. I should be better pleased if it did not exist; but, on the other hand, those who "live in glass houses should not throw stones." When we look at the composition of the Opposition, we find that they are in a worse plight than we are—that instead of having only a dual-headed leadership, they have a triple-headed one. It will perhaps in time be only a dual-headed Opposition, for the head that happens to be between the other two will probably get crushed in the course of the battles that are sure to rage in the ranks of the party itself.

Mr. WEBSTER.—It is only the honorable member's imagination that we have a triple-headed Opposition.

Mr. JOHNSON.—We witnessed the spectacle of the honorable member for Hume leading the forlorn hope of the extreme protectionists, who are anxious to raise the fiscal issue, notwithstanding that they have subscribed to a Tariff truce, and honorable members on this side of the House commenced to look upon him as the actual leader, not only of the Labour Party, but of the whole Opposition. Suddenly, however, another leader sprang up, and the honorable member for Hume was apparently deposed. I should not like to say that he was, for it is only charitable to believe that he still holds the position which he was assumed to occupy.

Mr. TUDOR.—Who assumed that he occupied that position?

Mr. JOHNSON.—Honorable members were entitled to assume that he held that position, in view of the very prominent part which he played on various occasions as spokesman for the whole party, and also by reason of the fact that several consultations took place between him and other leading members of the Opposition. I shall not read any lengthy quotation from the speech made by the honorable member for Bland, during the course of the debate on the Address-in-Reply; but I shall take extracts from it which show that when he met this House, he, in common with the leaders of the other parties, recognised that the country had declared for a truce on the fiscal issue. It was not the fault of the free-trade members of this House that such a declaration was made by the people. So far as New South Wales is concerned, the country declared for a revision of the Tariff in the direction of free-trade. But New South Wales is only one of six States in the Union. The remaining States were opposed to her in this matter, and declared not for a greater measure of protection, but for a Tariff truce. That is vouched for by the honorable member for Bland, who, at page 147 of Hansard, is reported to have said—

There is another feature of the elections to which I should like to refer, namely, the fiscal question. I share the feeling of gratification which has been expressed by the Prime Minister, that with the last election the issue as between free-trade and protection has disappeared for some time to come. . . . At any rate, so far as the Tariff is concerned. Practically, the fiscal issue is dead, and the surest confirmation of that view is the neglect of the leader of the Opposition to test the feeling of this House upon the subject. That is an admission that the question is dead, at any rate, so far as this Parliament is concerned.

There is no vague ambiguity about that declaration. How can the honorable member reconcile the position which he then took up, with his position at the present time, as a member of a party which, although it has declared the Tariff issue to be dead, is now anxious to raise it to its highest possible point? How can he reconcile his position as an advocate of fiscal war, with the position which he then took up as an advocate of fiscal peace, declaring that he accepted the verdict of the country as being in favour of the adoption of that course?

Mr. WEBSTER.—That is not correct.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have quoted from Hansard.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I say, that the conclusions which the honorable member draws from the speech are not correct.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am not responsible for the accuracy of the report, but I presume that, had there been any inaccuracy, it would have been corrected. If the honorable member thinks that the Hansard report is incorrect, what has he to say to a further declaration which was made, on a subsequent occasion, by the honorable member in his capacity as Prime Minister?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I am not doubting the accuracy of the Hansard report, but the conclusions which the honorable member draws from it.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Let me first quote a statement made by the honorable member for Bland, when before the electors. On the 12th November, 1903, shortly prior to the general elections. He said that—

He would not, in any circumstances, be a party to disturbing the fiscal peace now reached.

That is a fairly comprehensive statement.

The Labour Party had been able to knock out a few taxes which pressed heavily on the people, and in this way had reduced the revenue by a large amount.

After making the speech during the debate on the Address-in-Reply, to which I have referred, the honorable member, as Prime Minister, went to his own constituency, and, speaking at a public meeting at Wagga, on 9th of August last, said—

I believe there is no probability of any appeal for the alteration of the Tariff being responded to during this present Parliament. The people were assured at the last elections that it was desirable to have fiscal peace, at any rate, for this Parliament, and I must say that I agree that it is desirable to have some rest from the eternal fight on the fiscal question. If this were a country which had been united for many years, and the full effect of Inter-State free-trade could be accurately gauged, and the whole records were available for years, then I should say that there might be grave reason to inquire again into the conditions brought about by the Tariff. But we have not had time since the passing of the Tariff to get any clear idea of what its incidence will be in the future.

We thus have the evidence of the leaders of the three different parties which were then in existence—the Deakin Party, the Reid Party, and the Watson Party—as to the verdict of the country. We have also the evidence of another honorable and learned member, who, strange to say, is to be found to-day most actively assisting those who wish to fight against what they declared to be the verdict of the country. We find the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne among those who now wish for fiscal war instead of the fiscal peace on which they appealed to the electors. Here is what the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said in regard to that question—

Now that the Tariff has been disposed of, surely we must recognise that there is nothing between the Ministerial and the Opposition side of the House than the table. There are more differences of opinion between individual members of the Opposition than there are between members of the front Ministerial and front Opposition benches.

The honorable and learned member professed to recognise that there was practically no difference between those who were sitting in Opposition and those on the Ministerial benches.

Similarly there are more differences between Ministerial supporters themselves than there are between the political views of Ministerialists and Oppositionists.

I should like to know how the honorable and learned member reconciles that attitude with the attitude he takes up now, as one of the small party led by the honorable and learned member for Indi, who are anxious to raise the Tariff issue at the present time? Some complaint has been made by the leader of the Labour Party about the unfair tactics which have been pursued in arriving at the vote by which the late Government were ousted from office. But I would remind honorable members opposite that the battle ground was of their own choosing. The issue upon which the late Government were defeated was not in itself necessarily a vital issue. Believing that they had means of escape at their disposal the late Government, with that appearance of courage which characterizes them when they think they are going to win, and that there is no possibility of defeat, made the question vital. But while they chose the battle ground, the members of the then Opposition chose the time for making their attack. This was what the Labour Party had not bargained for. It was a case of being out-generalled. The then Government had made provision for meeting a frontal attack. They had prepared bridges by which they could escape, and laid mines and made other preparations to repel an onslaught from the front. But they had not made provision for an attack on their flank. The members of the Opposition, whilst accepting the field of battle, chose the time when the issue should be fought, and by means of superior generalship a time was chosen which was inopportune for the occupants of the Treasury bench, whose sentinels were caught napping at their posts. It was a perfectly legitimate thing when the gauge of battle had been thrown down by the Ministry of the day, and they had declared that they would regard a certain proposal as vital, for the Opposition, accepting the situation, to choose their own time for making the attack. Their choice, of course, was made when it best suited them. That was perfectly fair tactics in political warfare. But there was no necessity to make a detail of a Bill in Committee vital, and the members of the Opposition are not to be held responsible because the late Government were foolish enough to do such a thing. But the charge of unfairness made against the Opposition is absolutely baseless. I now want to refer to something which was said by the honorable and learned member for Indi in reference to the Prime Minister. He quoted a passage from a speech by the Prime Minister, in which that right honorable gentleman said—

In the plenitude of time, when our millions have become tens of millions, we shall have a crop of misery which shall solve the difficulty in regard to cheap manufactures.

The object of that quotation was to indicate that the present Prime Minister meant that the question of cheap competition was to be solved when men and women in Australia were starving and lacking even a crust of bread. But I charge the honorable and learned member for Indi with gross unfairness in separating that quotation from its context, which bore no such construction as he placed upon it. This is a sample of the kind of charges which are levelled against the Prime Minister and honorable members on this side.

Mr. TUDOR.—Let the honorable member read the context.

Mr. JOHNSON.—This is the portion which the honorable and learned member for Indi did not read—

Will the erection of a fence solve it? Never! We may run a ring round our own people, but we cannot bull-doze the markets of the world. When we come to compete with those markets, we shall have to do as all other nations do. That is why I have abhorred the policy of producing artificial industries which belong to a period of human misery and over-population.

It will be seen that those words are not capable of the construction which the honorable and learned member for Indi sought most unfairly to put upon them. The Prime Minister was referring to the futility of attempting to improve human conditions, and to get rid of misery, starvation, and other evils which oppress humanity, by raising Tariff walls around industry—he was trying to prove the absolute futility of such means for bringing about an improvement in the social and industrial conditions of the people. The words are not capable of the construction which the honorable and learned member for Indi most cruelly attempted to put on them, and which went broadcast through the newspapers as the sentiments of the Prime Minister. I should like to say a word as to the position of the honorable and learned member for Indi, in regard to the fiscal truce. In the Melbourne Argus, of 14th September, there is reprinted an extract from a speech delivered by the honorable and learned member on fiscal matters, and as I have seen no contradiction I may assume that the report is correct.

Mr. TUDOR.—What is the date of the speech?

Mr. JOHNSON.—The date of the delivery of the speech is not given, but it was before the last election, I think.

Mr. TUDOR.—The speech was delivered about ten years ago.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The speech was quoted in the Argus a few days ago, and I presume that if anything had been wrong the honorable and learned member would have taken the very first opportunity to send a correction.

And the miner, how is he on a level with the workers in the town? He has a weight round his neck.

Evidently, the honorable and learned member was a staunch free-trader at that time.

We are told that the miners patriotically stood by protection in the past. Are we to whip the willing horse to death? Is protection to go on for ever to an unlimited extent, right on, as we are told, to prohibition? Are we never to stop taxing the miner? He is the man who goes through the most arduous labour, the most dangerous pursuits, to win the wealth of the country; and what does he get in return for it? A promise that more burdens shall be laid upon him. His pick is weighted with taxation, every article he wears is weighted with taxation, and when he goes home every article in his house, even his knife and fork, is taxed.

When we read that speech, can we conceive it possible that it was delivered by the same honorable and learned member for Indi, who is now seeking to place fresh burdens on the shoulders of the miner—to put fresh taxes on what the miner uses? Can we conceive it possible that the two are one and the same person? I must confess that to me it seems a most strange and unaccountable metamorphosis. As to some other honorable members, it is interesting to see what they have said in regard to those matters. The honorable member for Bourke is reported in the Melbourne Age of November 25, to have said at Northcote—

The electors had to consider whether they would be represented by a person who was the nominee of a little clique called the Political Labour League—

I wonder whether the honorable member meant any allusion to gentlemen now sitting on the other side of the House. Seeing that he is in active association with those same gentlemen, I can hardly believe that to be the case. But still we have to go by what the honorable member himself has said. The speech proceeds—or whether they would send back their present member, who represented, not one section, but all sections of the constituency . . . leaving the ballot-box to decide whether the choice should rest with the domination of the Political Labour League or the individual judgment and liberty of the people.

How are we to reconcile those sentiments with the position of the honorable member at the present time in association with those whom he in November last, during the recent campaign, denounced in no unmeasured terms? In making a very violent attack on that party, he further said—

Their methods savoured of Tammany Hall and Russia—the caucus did not allow any liberty.

Those are peculiar sentiments for an honorable member to hold who is now so closely associated with the very men whose methods he thus described in November.

Mr. TUDOR.—Tell us what the Prime Minister said about the honorable and learned member for Ballarat.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I leave that to other honorable members. Here is another remarkable speech, delivered at Brunswick Town Hall, and reported in the Age of November 12th:—

It was a question of the domination of a party called the Political Labour Party or of the electors choosing a candidate of their own free right. He would deal with the constitution, the tactics and methods of the Political Labour Party at a future election meeting, and he would promise to make it very interesting indeed.

And he did, though I shall not quote the speech just now. Honorable members may look it up on the files for themselves.

He held their own declaration in his hand, on which were the names of Tom Mann, Messrs. White and Fleming, and other anarchists.

Mr. TUDOR.—Whose declaration?

Mr. JOHNSON.—The declaration of the Political Labour League.

Mr. TUDOR.—I think the honorable member is misquoting the honorable member for Bourke.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am reading the speech as reported in the Melbourne Age, and if the honorable member had been misreported, I take it that he would have sent a correction. I looked in subsequent issues for a correction, but could find no trace of one, and, therefore, I think it is perfectly legitimate for me to accept the report as an accurate statement of what the honorable member said. At this juncture of the honorable member's speech, a voice interjected, "What has that to do with the Labour Party?" and the reply of the honorable member for Bourke was:—

It had got this to do with it; that circular was issued as the result of a minute carried at the Trades Hall Council. . . . With reference to the future, he would support the Government as regards the maintenance of the present fiscal protection and fiscal peace.

So that the honorable member for Bourke was a declared anti-Socialist at that time, and asserted that the Political Labour League was composed of anarchists and Socialists, because they had accepted as their creed a circular issued by those bodies. The honorable member's name appears in the list published by the Age newspaper of those who were opposed to any interference with the Tariff and to Socialism, but we now find him amongst those who are raising the Tariff issue in order to bring forward measures of extreme protection, and who to do this have allied themselves with those very Socialists whose policy they have condemned in such vigorous language. I have a good deal more to say upon the question, and possibly honorable members would agree to an adjournment of the debate at this hour.

Debate adjourned.

House adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Wednesday, 21 September, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—I wish to make a personal explanation with reference to a statement made in this House last evening as to my conduct in connexion with the case of some potters under the Immigration Restriction Act. Honorable members will recollect that the honorable and learned member for West Sydney stated last night that I had taken certain proceedings with reference to either the employer or the men themselves. In one of the newspaper accounts published this morning he is reported to have said that I had taken proceedings against the men.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He said "against the employer."

Mr. REID.—I think that he did. In the other and fuller account—that which appears in the Melbourne Age—he is reported to have said that I had taken the proceedings against the employer. I should have liked to refer to an advance proof of Hansard, to set the matter at rest; but we are not entitled to see proof copies of other member's speeches until they have been corrected, unless with the permission of the member concerned, and, as the honorable and learned member for West Sydney was not here, I could not get his authority. I have therefore had to fall back on the newspaper reports. The Age report of the honorable and learned member's remarks reads as follows:—

The Prime Minister stated his intention of altering the law—

That is the law with reference to this contract arrangement—as soon as he got into power; but what has he done? Listen: Six English potters landed in this country—men of our own flesh and blood—and are now here as citizens; but instructions are being given—to the Solicitor-General to file, in New South Wales, an information against the man who brought them here, and under the very section of the Act under which it was sought to prevent the six hatters landing. (Sensation, and loud Opposition cheers).

Honorable members will notice that the present tense is employed—

Since the rising of the House I have had an opportunity to get full information on the subject from the Secretary to the Department, and I am now in a position to state to the House that I have never, from the time I entered office until this moment, had any papers submitted to me in connexion with any incident of the kind, nor have I ever given any instructions of any kind with reference either to the potters themselves or to their employer. I knew that something had occurred in reference to this matter since I came into office, and that made me reticent until I could satisfy myself of the facts, because it is always best to wait until one is sure. This is what has occurred: When I came into office the Secretary to the Department asked me if I wished to disturb any of the actions of my predecessors, especially with reference to this Immigration Restriction Act. Honorable members who have been in office know what the universal rule is—that no Minister who comes in disturbs the decisions of his predecessors except under some very special circumstances. That is an unwritten law, of which every man of experience is aware. The Secretary asked me whether I had any intention to undo or to unsettle the actions of my predecessors under this Act, and I said, as I think any other Minister in the world would have said, that I had not. As a matter of fact, the instructions to prosecute were issued by the honorable and learned member for West Sydney himself some days before I took office. I am sorry that he is not here now. I asked that word should be sent to him of my intention to make this explanation, but unfortunately he is not here. I am making a statement of my own now, but it will be more satisfactory if I presently read the report of the Secretary to the Department. I am stating now what I think is the worst feature of this matter, that the honorable and learned member, standing at this table, put that imputation upon me, to be printed in the records of the national Parliament, and to be circulated against me all through Australia, and, a few minutes afterwards, went out of the Chamber, and made another statement to the representative of the Melbourne Age, which was absolutely at variance with it, and in which he acknowledged that he had given the instructions himself, though he said that I could have undone them.

Mr. MAUGER.—Hear, hear.

Mr. REID.—Of course I could. Who requires to be told that? I could have undone the administration of the law; but is that what honorable members wish a Minister to do? Just fancy the denunciations which would have been levelled against me if I had undone the work of my predecessor under that Act without either rhyme or reason. Honorable members surely see the distinction between fair political fighting and the making of statements to be reported in our proceedings which are absolutely untrue. Surely there is a distinction between those two things!

Mr. WATSON.—I do not think the honorable and learned member wished it to be implied that the right honorable gentleman should have undone his work.

Mr. REID.—So far from implying it here, he stated that I had done what was really done by himself; but outside he admitted that I had not done it, though I could undo his work. Yet, notwithstanding that admission, there is left on the pages of Hansard his statement that I did the work.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The right honorable member would have carried out the law, would he not?

Mr. REID.—I hope that the honorable and learned member will allow me to make this explanation. I know that he is generous enough for that small favour. On my arrival at my office this morning, I addressed this minute to the Secretary to the Department—

The alleged prosecution of six potters.

My impression at the time was that the honorable and learned member for West Sydney had stated that the six potters had been prosecuted. That is the statement reported in one of the newspapers; but in the Age report it is stated that it is the employer who was prosecuted. However, that is an immaterial point.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable and learned member for West Sydney said that it was the employer who had been prosecuted.

Mr. REID.—My minute continues—

Perhaps the Secretary will be good enough to furnish me with a report on this subject. Is there any truth in the suggestion that I put the provisions of the Immigration Restriction Act in force in connexion with any such case?

The Secretary replied—

The papers in this matter are in Sydney. The order of Mr. Hughes to initiate proceedings was communicated to the Collector of Customs, Sydney, in a letter dated 13th August—

That was before I came into office—instructing him to lay the papers before the Crown Solicitor, with a view to prosecuting the firm under section 12 of the Act, which provides that—“Any person who makes or authorizes any contract or agreement, the performance of which would be a contravention of the Act, shall be guilty of an offence.”

No instructions were given to take proceedings against the men.

Mr. MCCAY.—The 13th August is the day upon which my motion was carried against the Watson Administration.

Mr. WATSON.—The decision may have been arrived at earlier than that.

Mr. REID.—I am not making any point of that.

Mr. MAHON.—But one of the honorable member's colleagues did.

Mr. REID.—I have no complaint of any kind to make upon that point. I was so anxious to carry out the ordinary rules that when I found a recommendation of my honorable predecessor with regard to the appointment of a judicial officer for New Guinea, I accepted it, although the appointment had not actually been made. I wished to show proper respect for the decisions of my predecessor, although they might not have been formally ratified. The memorandum proceeds—

On Mr. Reid taking over the administration of this Department, I had a conversation with him about the more important cases then current, and informed him briefly what had been done in this matter. Mr. Reid said that he did not propose to interfere with any directions given by his predecessor.

I never even saw the papers upon the subject, because they were in Sydney when I came into office. Mr. Hunt proceeds as follows:—

Recently I wrote to the Collector of Customs, Sydney, asking how the matter stood, and was informed, in reply, that the Crown Solicitor had asked for further particulars, which were then being obtained.

Then I asked the following question:—

Since our conversation, when I took office, above referred to, has the case been submitted to me in any shape or form?

Mr. Hunt's reply was “No.”

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

MOTION OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Debate resumed from 20th September, (vide page 4758), on motion by Mr. WATSON—

That the present Administration does not possess the confidence of this House.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—The statement which has just been made by the Prime Minister, with reference to the attack upon him as the head of the Government, in connexion with the six potters, shows the unscrupulous character of the opposition which is being directed against the present Ministry, not, I admit, by the whole of the members of the Opposition, but, certainly by some of the prominent members of that party. I have every liking for a fair, straight-out fight, no matter how hard the hitting may be, but I entirely disapprove of tactics which savour of gross unfairness.

Mr. FRAZER.—Then why did the honorable member take part in the sand-bagging of the last Ministry.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I never took part in any sand-bagging. In my attitude towards the Opposition I have throughout been guided by principle. I have endeavoured at all times to refrain from personalities or attacks upon individuals.

Mr. KELLY.—Is the honorable and learned member for West Sydney a prominent member of the Opposition?

Mr. JOHNSON.—He is an ex-Minister. I have never descended, and I trust I never shall, to pursue such despicable tactics as have unfortunately been practised by some honorable members opposite. The new-found zeal for fiscal war on the part of honorable members who were returned to promote fiscal peace, is certainly most peculiar, in view of the death-like silence they have maintained with regard to that question during the last few months. We are entitled to believe that some sinister influence has been at work, rather than that their action is prompted by a desire to promote the public interest. We have been told by the honorable and learned member for Indi that the alliance entered into between his followers and the Labour Party is a perfectly natural one, because the Labour Party have always helped the protectionists to impose the heaviest burdens upon the backs of the people.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member should not attack his friends.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am not doing so. I am speaking of those honorable members who wish to raise the Customs duties still higher. The desire of the honorable and learned member for Indi is to secure the assistance of the members of the Labour Party in imposing still further burdens upon the people whose interests they are supposed to have specially in their care. The honorable and learned member, who, by the way, is playing the part of the spider in the fable of the "Spider and the Fly," when speaking a few days ago, said—

But for the assistance of the protectionist majority in the Labour Party, the Tariff would not have been as protective as it was.

The honorable member for Melbourne Ports stated—

The alliance is purely on a protectionist basis. The honorable member for Darling said—

The only true protectionists are on this side of the House.

The desire on the part of honorable members for an increase of duties is in strange contrast to the attitude they assumed when they were before the electors recently. Among those honorable members who subscribed to the principle of a fiscal truce was the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. His utterances are specially interesting in view of the present action of the Labour Party, because in his speech reported in the Age of 24th November last, the honorable member not only defined his position with regard to the Tariff, but also expressed his opinion very strongly with regard to the Labour Party. He said—

He had no intention, however, of re-opening the Tariff fiscal question. (Cheers.) In answer to a question Mr. Mauger said he had been asked to "nominally" sign the platform of the P.L.C. A Voice—"Then the Council is a failure." (Cheers.)

Mr. MAUGER.—"I say it is not only a failure—it is an absolute fraud."

Now we find the honorable member, who described the Labour Party with which he is in alliance as a fraud —

Mr. MAUGER.—That is not correct.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am reading from the report published in the Age.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member is placing his own construction upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have not seen any contradiction in the same paper.

Mr. MAUGER.—No, because it did not suit the honorable member to look for a contradiction.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have looked through the files, and I have not seen any contradiction. If the honorable member assures me that he did not make the statement attributed to him, I am prepared to accept his denial. His position on the Tariff question has, however, been clearly defined. He was one of those who supported the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, who was appealing to the country on the issue of fiscal peace. Notwithstanding that during all these months he has never opened his lips in an attempt to raise the Tariff question, he now wishes to deny that the verdict of the electors of the Commonwealth was—as his erstwhile leader, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat declared—in favour of fiscal peace.

Mr. MAUGER.—I was the first to open the matter, and to point out what I thought was necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I cannot help contrasting the utterances which I have just quoted with the attitude of the honorable member at the present time. How can he reconcile his appeal to the electors to return him to assist in promoting fiscal peace, and his tacit acceptance of the result as a verdict for fiscal peace, with his action in denying, months afterwards, that the verdict of the people was in favour of a Tariff truce?

Mr. MAUGER.—That was a mere incident in the elections.

Mr. JOHNSON.—It was the main issue at the general elections. As I pointed out last night, it was the issue set forth by the organ of the Protectionist Party—I refer to the Age—day after day, and it was also that which was put before the electors by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat in his opening speech of the campaign, and the issue put to the electors of Melbourne Ports by the honorable member himself. How, then can the honorable member for Melbourne Ports justifiably urge that it constituted merely a minor incident in the elections? It was the main issue, I repeat, and that upon which the battle was fought in Victoria and the other States. The verdict of the electors of New South Wales was overwhelmingly in favour of free-trade, but that of a majority of those of Victoria and the Commonwealth was in favour of the maintenance of fiscal peace, as the honorable member for Melbourne Ports is very well aware.

Mr. MAUGER.—The verdict of the electors of Victoria is always in favour of adequately protecting industries.

Mr. JOHNSON.—How can the honorable member reconcile his present attitude with the speeches which were delivered by himself and others in this House at a very early stage of the present session? Both the present Prime Minister and the leader of the Labour Party admitted in the debate which took place upon the Address-in-Reply that the people had declared for the maintenance of fiscal peace. Since then they have emphasized that fact time after time.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is twelve months ago. Look what has happened since then.

Mr. BAMFORD.—What was the verdict of the electors of New South Wales?

Mr. JOHNSON.—It was in favour of the adoption of a free-trade policy. I am just as ardent a free-trader now as I was when I appeared before the electors. I am also an advocate of temperance and other reforms. Does the mere fact that I cannot achieve my desire in respect of these matters, because the numbers are against me, constitute an abandonment of principle? The idea will not hold water. Honorable members upon the Ministerial side of the House are perfectly free to express their individual opinions. I stand here to-day as absolute a free-trader as I ever was, and with full power to exercise my own judgment as to how I shall vote. Honorable members opposite cannot lay claim to the same measure of freedom, because no matter how ardently they may believe either in free-trade or protection, if a majority of the caucus decide against them they have to bow their heads in submission.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is not correct.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is the position, and honorable members know it. If the adoption of a certain course is declared to be in the interests of the party, the minority have to vote in a certain way.

Mr. WATSON.—Nonsense; that was the pledge which the honorable member signed in New South Wales.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Not at all. The leader of the Opposition forgets that the first fighting platform of the Labour Party was an absolutely free-trade platform. It contained these words—"We will raise revenue by the taxation of land values, irrespective of improvements."

Mr. WATSON.—It did not say that.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have the platform here.

Mr. WATSON.—Read it.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I have already quoted from it in this House. I read the extract in question when addressing honorable members from the Opposition side of the Chamber at an early stage of our existence as a new Parliament. As a matter of fact, I have copies of all the platforms which have since been adopted by the Labour Party. With each succeeding year that platform has retrograded from democratic ideals more and more. I repeat that the original platform of that party partook more of a free-trade character than did the platform of the Free-trade Party itself, and when I ran under the auspices of that party, it was on that democratic free-trade platform, and with the express stipulation that if I were ever called upon to give a vote which would involve the sacrifice of my free-trade principles, I would resign my seat in Parliament rather than consent to such a proceeding.

Mr. GROOM.—Was that stipulation in writing?

Mr. JOHNSON.—We have every reason to believe that there is in the Labour-Liberal alliance something which has been kept very much in the background. There is a compact which has not yet been revealed, but upon which some light has already been thrown. The somewhat blunt, and, perhaps, incautious remarks of the honorable member for Hume shed a little light upon this matter. He informed us that the Labour Party has pledged itself to support the Manufactures Encouragement Bill. Where do free-trade members of the Labour Party come in when they sell themselves body and soul to a body which wishes to introduce that measure of protection? When they charge Ministerial supporters with having abandoned their principles, how can they reconcile their own free-trade tenets with a pledge to support a Bill which is admittedly of a severely protectionist character?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Who said that?

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable member for Hume gave us an insight into the basis of the alliance.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He is not one of the leaders.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I understand that at the time of which I speak he was one of the leaders. I do not know what position he occupies at present, but it seems to me that the superior generalship, and perhaps cunning, of another ambitious individual in the person of the honorable member for Indi has unfortunately paled the lustrous radiance of his political light.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member is entirely wrong. The honorable member for Hume is as much a leader now as he ever was.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Then we are to understand that the Opposition has three leaders. I repeat that the honorable member for Hume has declared that the Labour Party has entered into a compact to support the Manufactures Encouragement Bill. That measure, as honorable members are aware, was made the subject of an inquiry by a Select Committee, which was subsequently converted into a Royal Commission. That Commission consisted of twelve members, and opinion was evenly divided upon the merits of the proposal. Amongst those who disagreed with the principle embodied in the Bill were the honorable member for Bland and the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, who subscribed to the following paragraphs in the report:—

1. We, the undersigned members of the Commission, are against the passage through Parliament of the Bill for the payment of bonuses by the Federal Government for the establishment of the iron industry within the Commonwealth. . .

3. The Bill provides for the payment of £324,000 of the people's money to private individuals engaged in an enterprise for their private gain.

These are not my words, but those used in the report itself—

There can be no guarantee that the bonuses proposed would permanently establish the industry, though it is probable the inducements offered might be instrumental in forming speculative companies.

4. One of the witnesses, Mr. Sandford, managing director of the Eskbank Iron Works, New South Wales, stated that he had made an agreement with an English syndicate to spend £250,000 in extending the Lithgow works if the Bill passed. In answer to another question, Mr. Sandford said that to make pig-iron he wanted a plant involving an expenditure of from £100,000 to £125,000. This estimate is less than half the sum proposed to be paid in bonuses.

These are very strong statements, to which the leader of the Opposition and the honorable and learned member for West Sydney subscribed, in the report of the Commission. Yet we are now told, in the face of these damaging assertions, that the Labour Party, of which these honorable members are shining lights, have pledged themselves to support the very Bill against which they reported in such unmeasured terms of condemnation.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Why not quote all that I said? In addition to the statement which the honorable member has attributed to me, I said that in Committee the members of the party would be free to vote as they pleased on the question whether the industry should be owned by the State or taken up by private enterprise.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is the whole point.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I quoted the exact words used by the honorable member.

Mr. GROOM.—But the honorable member suppressed the context.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The statement just made by the honorable member for Hume does not alter the position.

Mr. GROOM.—The position may remain the same, in the opinion of the honorable member, but not in the view of any one else.

Mr. JOHNSON.—These honorable members show clearly in the report to which they subscribed that it is proposed to put an immense sum of public money into the pockets of private individuals.

Mr. GROOM.—And some of the members of the present Ministry also agreed to the payment of the proposed bonuses.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Is it not the purpose of the honorable and learned member for Indi and the honorable member for Hume to secure the passing of the Bill in the interests not of a State industry, but of private enterprise?

Mr. HUGHES.—Should not the honorable member be very glad of that?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am merely showing the position taken up by the honorable and learned member. I desire to put before the House the inconsistency of the position now occupied by him as compared with that which he took up when he signed the report to which I have referred. If it be true that the alliance has been established on such a basis, I can only say that it is an unholy one, and will not commend itself to the respect of the people.

Mr. GROOM.—The honorable member should now justify the coalition.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The honorable and learned member will have an opportunity later on to deal with that matter, but I intend on this occasion to hoe my own row, and will come to that point presently. I wish now to refer to the claim made by the leader of the Labour Party—one of the leaders of a party which has three heads—that the particular section to which he belongs is the representative not of a class, but of all classes. That assertion, however, has been denied, not only by honorable members on this side of the House, but by members of the Labour Party. It is true that when it suits their own purpose members of the Labour Party claim to represent all classes. For example, when they were speaking on the motion for the second reading of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, some of them—and the honorable member for Darling was among the number—were careful to state that they came into this House to represent no particular class, but all sections of the community.

Mr. SPENCE.—We could not be returned if that were not so.

Mr. JOHNSON.—In the face of that assertion the honorable member for Darling and other members of the party, when called upon to deal, in Committee, with certain clauses of the Bill conferring special privileges upon a particular class—and that only the section of a class—sang a very different tune.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is not correct.

Mr. SPENCE.—I desired fair play for them, that was all.

Mr. JOHNSON.—On that occasion the honorable member for Darling said, among other things, that—

Non-unionists are the most miserably mean, selfish, and narrow-minded men in the community, and why should they be considered.

Mr. MAUGER.—Many of them undoubtedly are selfish.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Notwithstanding this statement the honorable member for Darling insists that he represents non-unionists. At a later stage he said—

Non-unionists are largely men of a criminal type—a criminal class.

Mr. SPENCE.—Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Does the honorable member represent men of a criminal type?

Mr. MAUGER.—No; criminals have not a vote

Mr. WATSON.—Does the honorable member represent every man in his constituency?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I represent men of all shades of opinion.

Mr. WATSON.—Including criminals?

Mr. JOHNSON.—There may be some lurking unknown in my electorate—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No; I live in the district. There are no criminals there.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I am not prepared to say that I do represent any criminals. My constituency is an eminently respectable one. Although the portion in which I reside possesses a police station, it has no police court within its boundaries. I have every reason to believe that even the lock-up rarely has an occupant, so that I think I may fairly claim that I do not represent any criminal class. I am not prepared to dispute with the honorable member for Darling the honour of representing a criminal class. I am quite satisfied to represent those who do not belong to that type.

Mr. SPENCE.—I am not a champion of the non-unionists. I do not want the support of some of them whom I know.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Just so. Yet but a short time since the honorable member claimed to represent them equally with unionists. I come now to the honorable member for Kennedy, who, in the course of a speech delivered recently by the right honorable member for East Sydney, interjected that non-unionists were “scabs and blacklegs.” If the honorable member is a representative of scabs and blacklegs, I do not think that such a declaration comes very well from him. It certainly is not creditable to him, and his constituents will not consider that it is at all complimentary.

Mr. POYNTON.—He never said that he represented scabs and blacklegs.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The statement which I made can be found in Hansard.

Mr. WATSON.—But he did not say that his own constituents were scabs and blacklegs. The honorable member has placed his own interpretation upon the statement.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I made the reference in only a jocular vein, but it cannot be denied that the expression to which I have referred was used by the honorable member. Notwithstanding the assertion made during the second-reading debate by members of the Labour Party that they represent all classes, many of them in discussing the provisions of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill in Committee declared that they were sent here to represent not all classes, but certain special interests, and to legislate for those interests.

Mr. WILSON.—To secure class legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Exactly. Many of them admitted that they were here to secure the passing of legislation in the interests of a certain section of the community; although others denied that that was so. This is only another evidence of the want of unanimity which exists among members of the Opposition. I hold that the members of the Labour Party do not truly represent labour. Those who are associated with other parties in the House more truly represent labour than do the members of that party, who claim to be the representatives of special classes. Honorable members on this side of the House represent labour in the broadest and fullest sense of the term—in that sense which recognises as a labourer every man who by the exercise of his brain or muscle uses the energies with which the Creator has endowed him to carry out his allotted work on this planet. Those who justify their existence by the application of mind or physical energy in any avenue of employment are labourers in the truest sense of the word, and in that sense I represent labour far more truly than does the leader of the Labour Party. The basis of the alliance opposite is an absolutely un-democratic one. It is absolutely opposed to every principle of democracy. The alliance is based upon an effort to secure for certain classes special privileges at the expense of the remainder of the community. The Labour Party desired to obtain special privileges for a certain class by means of a certain clause in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, which we, in the interests of the whole of the workers, thought it to be our duty to oppose. They sought to establish minority rule. We asserted that democratic principles demand that the rule of the majority should be respected, that we should endeavour to legislate in the interests of all, and that where a difference of opinion existed we should always allow the majority to decide. But that is a principle which the Labour Party through their legislation have denied. They have sought to turn what was intended to be a beneficent and useful piece of legislation for settling industrial disputes into an engine of political tyranny and oppression—a machine for the creation of industrial disputes. The fight on this side of the House has been against that principle which has been the guiding principle of the Labour Party in engineering the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill.

Mr. WATSON.—Some honorable members opposite were against the principle of the Bill, and I think that the honorable member was one of them.

Mr. JOHNSON.—No; I was not antagonistic to the principle of the Bill. The view which I expressed was this—and if the honorable member looks up Hansard he will see that I am right in stating it. I had no great faith in measures of this kind as being measures which would permanently ameliorate the condition of the workers. But I was willing to give them a trial—to make an experiment. They could only be palliatives at the best. I was prepared to accept the Bill as a temporary expedient. I expressed my opinion perfectly frankly and clearly, that such measures would not permanently improve the industrial condition of the workers of this or any other community; and that, whilst we were wasting time over such palliatives, we were neglecting to deal with the root of the evils which we sought to correct, and which would continue to grow in spite of our temporary remedial legislation.

Mr. MAUGER.—What, in the honorable member's opinion, is the root of the evil?

Mr. JOHNSON.—If the honorable member will go to the Library and look up some of the interesting books on political economy to be found there, he will get rid of a great many of those cobwebs of superstition which at present obscure his intellect, and at the same time obtain some useful light on this great subject, and I can assure the honorable member, he is in sad need of enlightenment on economic laws.

Mr. MAUGER.—Does the honorable member think that no one reads but himself?

Mr. JOHNSON.—I do not intend to occupy the time of the House by giving a dissertation of that kind when there are so many means of getting information to the honorable member's hand.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Lang will know, when he has been here a little longer, that No. 66 Bourke-street knows it all!

Mr. JOHNSON.—I shall learn, I suppose, provided I outlive the age of Methuselah. In regard to the coalition, I wish to make my position perfectly clear. I have never been an enthusiastic advocate of coalitions, nor do I view the present coalition with anything like ecstatic admiration. I should prefer, as a matter of fact, to be without it. So would other honorable members who are also parties to it, and who dissent from me in regard to my fiscal views. I am perfectly sure that I express their views equally with my own when I say that if the country had returned a verdict which would have enabled us to come to a straight-out vote on the fiscal issue, a more satisfactory condition of things would have obtained. But the country returned a verdict which made that impossible, but which at the same time did make it possible for the representatives of a small class in this Chamber to dominate legislation in such a way as was, in our opinion, against the interests of the country at large. It became evident at an early stage of our proceedings, that it would be necessary, if we were to combat that tendency, for some sort of alliance to be formed for the purpose of carrying on responsible government, and to check the mischievous legislation with which we were threatened. The only possible way to do that was to recognise for the time being, so far as the life of this Parliament was concerned, that the Tariff issue was at rest, and on that understanding, to allow honorable members holding similar views to come together, temporarily sinking their differences, though adhering to their opinions on the fiscal question. That is the basic principle of this alliance. I saw that I had three courses open to me. As a free man I had a choice of those courses. First I could be a party unto myself. In that case I should have been absolutely useless for any practical purpose, though as an independent member I should have been very useful to honorable members opposite in enabling them as a minority to go on with legislation which I believed to be disastrous. Then I had a second course open to me—to be one of the party of Socialists and protectionists seeking class legislation and endeavouring to impose new Tariff burdens. I, as an anti-Socialist—as one who all my life has fought against Socialism and for individual freedom—could not possibly take up that position. I was antagonistic both to the principle of Socialism, and to the principle of extreme protection sought to be imposed by the Labour Party through the instrumentality of the alliance. Then I had a third course—to support an alliance of two parties, who, although differing on the fiscal question, had come together to respect the verdict of the country, and to resist demands for imposing further burdens on the people. There has been no bond—no formal agreement—not even a joint consultation between these two parties, but merely a natural spontaneous co-operation against class legislation and minority rule, and in supporting such a party in present circumstances I am sacrificing no principle.

Mr. Johnson.

In fact, I am rendering the very best service which I, as an individualist, as a free man, as an anti-Socialist, and a free-trader could render to the country, to the cause which I advocate, and to the party to which I belong. That is my position to-day. I stand for equal rights for all, and for special privileges to none; in contra-distinction to the attitude of honorable members opposite, who deny equal rights, and stand for privileges for a certain class of the community. How could I for a moment support honorable members who took up that attitude? The position that I have assumed I am perfectly prepared to justify before my constituents. I am perfectly satisfied that the verdict of my constituents will indorse my attitude on the question. They realize as clearly as I do that the pressure of political circumstances has rendered a combination necessary to preserve the best interests of the country from falling under the baneful influence of legislation which would destroy industry, stop progress, and make for stagnation—which would ultimately be such a retrogression as to hold up this country in the eyes of the world as one from which those with energy, capital, and enterprise ought to keep away. That is the position I take. It is a position which I have fought for ever since I entered the House, and which I have since avowed in explaining my attitude to some of my constituents. And that is an attitude which has received their unqualified indorsement so far, and one which I am prepared to continue, and to further justify when the proper time comes.

Mr. CROUCH (Corio).—I regret very much that the Prime Minister is not present.

Mr. MAUGER.—Send for him; he ought to be here.

Mr. CROUCH.—Last night I was subjected to a bitter personal attack at the hands of the Prime Minister. Of course, I feel that since the right honorable member for East Sydney has taken the position of Prime Minister, certain good traditions of decency, fair play, and proper conduct have been practically relegated to the background. It was only last week, if I remember rightly, that the Prime Minister used, in regard to myself, an expression so indecent that Mr. Speaker, I believe, has directed that it shall be struck out of the Hansard reports. And yesterday he used another expression of an equally dirty nature. If the Prime Minister continues to indulge in such expressions it will be just as well that ladies should know when he is going to speak, so that they may realize that it is quite impossible for them to attend.

Mr. JOHNSON.—That is a bad construction to place on an innocent remark.

Mr. CROUCH.—The traditions of this House have remained unsullied in the hands of decent men until the Prime Minister assumed office. It is a common saying that if we scratch a Russian we find the Tartar, and I venture to say that if we scratch the right honorable member for East Sydney we find a larrikin. If I had no other ground for getting rid of the Ministry than the fact that a gentleman of his calibre—of his manners and sense of decency—holds the high office of Prime Minister, that of itself would certainly be some justification, and a great justification, for voting for their immediate dismissal. Since the right honorable gentleman came into office, this corner has been subjected to his bitter attacks, though previously all interjections from this portion of the House were received with smiles. The fact was, he wanted to cajole or get the support of the Labour Party, who then occupied the corner. Shortly after the right honorable member for Adelaide left the Government, the present Prime Minister approached the Labour Party and asked the latter to assist in removing the Government from office. He was only too eager to enter into coalition with the party he at present despises and condemns. But now anything from this corner is looked upon by the Prime Minister most severely. Honorable members who sit in the corner are personally attacked, and everything they say seems, in the mind of the Prime Minister, to have a personal meaning. I want to refer, in the first place, to the quotation which the Prime Minister made yesterday from a letter which appeared in the Melbourne Age of 9th September of this year, as follows:—

It is notorious that his accounts were publicly condemned as "cooked"; and that a disinterested board, appointed by the Government, consisting of the general managers of the leading banks in Sydney, supported this criticism by finding that public moneys had been misused, accounts doctored, and balances wrongly applied.

The Prime Minister used that quotation and added—

I say that if that were true, I should not stand in any public assembly of honorable men.

I am glad the Prime Minister has taken up that position, because I venture to say that I shall be able to show his brazen effrontery in attempting, not only to deny the existence of documents, but to use those who signed the report on which he apparently attempts to base his vindication, thus exhibiting his absolute disbelief in the existence of any intelligence in the House. He evidently thinks the public will not take the trouble to read the report for themselves.

Mr. MAUGER.—I beg to direct attention to the state of the House. This is an important matter, and Ministers ought to be present to hear the debate. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. CROUCH.—In the first place, I want to say that there is nothing in my attack which reflects on the Prime Minister's personal honour. I am not charging him, as I suppose honorable members will understand, with putting his hands into the Treasury and taking out sovereigns—I am not charging him with paying public moneys into his private account. That, I presume, will be understood by anybody except the Prime Minister, who tried to place that interpretation upon my letter. But, at the same time, I charge the Prime Minister—and I think I can prove the charge—with lavish expenditure of borrowed money. I also make the charge that his accounts were publicly condemned as cooked, that a disinterested Committee, appointed by the Government, supported that criticism by finding that the public funds had been misused, accounts doctored, and balances wrongly applied. I wish to deal with each one of those statements, in order to ascertain whether they cannot be justified.

Mr. LONSDALE. — Who appointed the Committee? It was a partisan Committee.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is not correct; two of its members were recommended by the right honorable gentleman himself.

Mr. CROUCH.—I am asked, who appointed the committee. I was just going to ask, who had the selection of the members of it? The Government of New South Wales appointed the committee, but the two banking members, Mr. T. A. Dibbs, the General Manager of the Commercial Banking Company of Sydney—an institution and a man of good repute—and Mr. J. Russell French, General Manager and Chairman of the Bank of New South Wales, were selected by the right honorable member for East Sydney himself to represent him upon the board. I know nothing about the other member of the Committee, Mr. Yarwood, except that he is a public accountant of repute, in Sydney, and he was appointed by the Government.

Mr. FULLER.—A political opponent of the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. CROUCH.—Apparently honorable members on the other side do not like this. Yesterday these men were all first-class men. When, in order to get a certificate of character to present to the people of Australia, in reply to what he called "slandorous statements" concerning him, the right honorable gentleman read a letter from these gentlemen white-washing him, they were all first-class men, though now Ministerial supporters are doing their best to discredit them. I take the Prime Minister on his own ground. In order to vindicate his position and his financial administration, the right honorable gentleman selected three men, and he yesterday placed before honorable members a document signed by them. As soon as it is clear that I am able to show who those men are, and the right honorable gentleman and those behind him become aware of the nature of the report of the Committee, and that it will justify every one of the statements made in my letter to the Age, Ministerialists say that "these men are no good. They were appointed by a Government adverse to the present Prime Minister." The honorable member for Hume informs me that two of the members of the Committee were nominated by the right honorable member for East Sydney to represent himself. That is to say, he had the nomination of two out of the three members forming it. The right honorable gentleman yesterday brought to this House what he called a justification, signed by the three members of the Committee. In the first place, we do not know the terms of the letter the right honorable gentleman wrote to those gentlemen. We may gather something of it from the statement made by Mr. Kirkpatrick, who says, "There is nothing against your personal honour." The letter from Mr. T. A. Dibbs, Mr. J. Russell French, and Mr. Yarwood is as follows:—

Dear Mr. Reid,

Referring to your note of the 10th inst. to Mr. Russell French, covering extract from a letter published in the Melbourne Age, our report, which is referred to, speaks for itself, and should not have given rise to any misapprehension.

In view, however, of the remarks in the extract in question, it is but just to you to state that we made no reflection whatever on your personal honour or integrity.

Who alleged that they did? No one made any statement with respect to the right honorable gentleman's personal honour, but only in regard to his action as Premier and Treasurer of New South Wales. The letter continues—

Nor did we intend to suggest any improper manipulation of the Treasury accounts by yourself, or the Treasury officials, as would seem to be implied by the terms "cooked" or "doctored," which appear in the letter.

This is the justification which the right honorable gentleman puts forward. He first submitted a clean bill of health from Mr. Waddell, who says that he knows nothing bad of the present Prime Minister. I suppose the right honorable gentleman was very glad to get that recommendation. Mr. Waddell personally approves of him, and thinks that there is nothing materially wrong with him. That is all Mr. Waddell said; but we find Mr. J. Vernon, and Mr. Kirkpatrick—the Auditor-General of New South Wales, and the Under-Secretary of the State Treasury—are also called as witnesses. I have here the actual report of the Committee, and I find that the Prime Minister is appealing in this question from the judges in the case, two of whom were selected by himself, to the very men who were the principal witnesses. The right honorable gentleman forgot to tell us yesterday, that what he submitted was the witnesses' evidence brought up again. The three judges, whose remarks are really condemnatory, by their faint praise and attempt to save the right honorable gentleman from the results of his own maladministration, had heard the evidence of the two men whose certificates the right honorable gentleman submitted to this House, and they still decided against him.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is that all the evidence they heard?

Mr. CROUCH.—I say that they were amongst the witnesses heard.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Where is the letter from Mr. Dibbs the honorable and learned member said he had?

Mr. CROUCH.—My honorable friends will have the letter quickly enough—too quickly for those who desire to defend the character of the Prime Minister. I propose to deal with the matter in my own way. At present I am dealing with the report brought up by the Committee. Although the Prime Minister is not present, I trust that both the Melbourne daily newspapers will give me fair play, in the endeavour to show conclusively, as I think I can, that my statements that the right honorable gentleman's accounts as Treasurer of New South Wales were cooked, that the funds were misappropriated, and the balance wrongly applied by him, are true. I shall then leave it to the Prime Minister himself to say if, in view of the facts, he feels that he can stand in any assembly of honorable men.

Mr. JOHNSON.—I thought the honorable and learned member was not going to attack the character of the right honorable gentleman?

Mr. CROUCH.—The right honorable gentleman attacks his own character. He has said that in certain circumstances he could not stand in any assembly of honorable men. I propose to mention the circumstances, and if, when they are mentioned, the right honorable gentleman chooses to stain his own character, I shall let him do so. I cannot read the whole of the evidence, which covers 263 pages, but I propose to read certain portions of the report—

As regards the division between the amount charged to "Loan Expenditure" and the ordinary and usual expenses of carrying on the Government of the colony, we find that the appearance of a surplus at the end of the first year (30th June, 1896), was produced, to some extent, by changing the date of the financial year from January-December to July-June, whereby the inclusion of a considerable amount of the annual expenditure proper, to the accounts of 1895-6, was avoided. Some of the items we refer to are as under, viz. :—

Treasury Bills redemption	75,000
Railway Debentures redemption, 53 Vic., No. 24	37,000
Naval expenses, say	13,000*
Interest on various trust accounts and other items	103,000*

Total £228,500

*Approximate.

That shows clearly that the Treasurer of New South Wales, the Premier of New South Wales, the present Prime Minister, in order to get a good balance-sheet to put before the people of that State, did not charge to its proper account each item of expenditure which should properly have been debited to a particular year, the object being to inflate his balance-sheet, and make it appear that he was a good financial administrator, when, as a matter of fact, he was not. The right honorable gentleman simply "cooked his accounts"—that is the plain way of putting it. The members of the Committee, as judges, proceeded with judicial calmness, and expressed their view in judicial language; but the man in the street, and honorable members here, on hearing the evidence, would say that the right honorable gentleman had "cooked his accounts." The Committee further report—

In addition to the above, the principle of treating part of the expenditure on services paid in 1895-6 as liabilities of previous years, was not one which should have been adopted if it was intended (which we think ought to have been the case) to have shown a true and actual twelve months' expenses against a twelve months' revenue.

The first showed that the right honorable gentleman had included in his income amounts which should not have been so included, because they were not properly receivable in the year, and that he had omitted from his expenditure amounts which he should not have omitted from a true account of the actual revenue and expenditure for the twelve months. I ask the House whether that does not prove that the accounts were "cooked."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the honorable and learned member's statement gave the whole truth, it might prove that; but we are getting from him a "cooked" account of the report of the Committee.

Mr. CROUCH.—I am quoting from the "Report of the Committee of Enquiry into the Public Accounts, together with the minutes of evidence, appendices, &c., appointed 2nd April, 1900, and printed under No. 7 report from Printing Committee, 2nd August, 1900." That report is signed by every member of the Committee. Another statement which it contains is this—

It seems to us that while the full year's revenue collected was put to the credit of 1895-6, the expenditure charged against the same was relieved to such an extent as to produce an alleged surplus of about £333,000 on the 30th June, 1896, whereas it is our unanimous opinion that, had the year 1895-6 been charged with a full ordinary twelve months' expenditure, there would have been a considerable deficiency. We unanimously estimate the same at not less than £550,000.

The Prime Minister had stated that he had a surplus of £333,000 on the 30th June, 1896, whereas the Committee, two of whom were appointed by himself, and one of whom is an experienced public accountant in New South Wales, said that there was a deficiency of £550,000. Am I justified, therefore, in saying that the Prime Minister "cooked" the accounts?

Mr. ROBINSON.—No. The honorable and learned member might perhaps explain the Contemporary Review incident.

Mr. CROUCH.—The honorable and learned member is referring—in my opinion, very improperly—to a statement which appeared in to-day's Argus, and I ask him if he has any charge to make against me to do me the courtesy to state it. I cannot but be conscious of the interjections of himself and the honorable member for Wentworth. I strongly object to alleged gentlemen—

Mr. ROBINSON.—This from the hero of the Albert Park incident!

Mr. CROUCH.—Perhaps these are Oxford manners, and must therefore be excused. When a man's sole claim to breeding is that he has been in the same shop, and has been shaved by a barber who once shaved the Prince of Wales, there is no more to be said. The report continues—

The above figures are based on those of the Treasury itself, and are without taking into consideration the fact that on the expenditure side the full payments in redemption of old liabilities, which, it appears to us, should have been made during that period according to law (31 Vic., No. 11), have been omitted to be charged to the extent of £68,292 10s.; while several small amounts have been put to the credit of "revenue" which ought rightly to have been considered as received in reduction of liabilities prior to the 30th June, 1895, when the change in system took place.

That is clearly a case in which balances were wrongly applied, which is another criticism to which the right honorable gentleman objects. The third statement to which he objects is that he was guilty of lavish borrowing and expenditure; but the figures given by the Committee show that during the five years in which he was Premier of New South Wales the loan indebtedness of that State increased by over £10,000,000. If that is not an instance of lavish borrowing and expenditure, to use the words of the charge, I do not know what further evidence is necessary to convict the right honorable gentleman of it. The report continues—

During the whole of this branch of our inquiry we have invariably, where we could conscientiously do so, given the Administration of that time the benefit of any doubt in connexion with any matters which have arisen; but we cannot help coming to the conclusion that the accounts of 1895-6 should have been submitted in such a manner as would have enabled the public to form a correct judgment of the effect of the change of system on that year's accounts. We recognise that the accounts, as they were submitted, after the change of system to what has been termed the "cash" basis, conformed to the programme sanctioned by Parliament—

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Hear, hear. It is Parliament that is there being criticised, not the Minister.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The honorable gentleman knows better than that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is true, anyhow.

Mr. CROUCH.—The report continues—

The accounts, as so made up, brought out a surplus; but, from a business point of view, we cannot see that any such surplus really accrued to the period, but the contrary, as we have shown, and we think this should have been clearly set forth at the time the accounts were submitted. In other words, the result of our inquiry shows that, under all the circumstances of the case, the issue of Treasury Bills, to the net amount of £1,024,700, as covering liabilities of previous years, and representing an ascertained deficiency at the 30th June, 1895, was unnecessary, and had the effect of considerably and unduly lessening the expenditure charged to the next ensuing year, and was, therefore, in our opinion, misleading, inasmuch as thereby the subsequent real condition of the finances was not made apparent.

If any further evidence of my charges is required, there it is. The Committee say that the real condition of the finances was not made apparent. I admit that I am not reading the whole report, but I am reading everything that fairly bears upon the case. The Committee were asked to answer the question—Whether the sum of £1,500,000 was transferred from Trust Funds to the General Loan Account, as alleged, by the Auditor-General?

To that question their reply was, "Yes." I will not read the whole of the report, it is too long, but it shows, amongst other things, that the Savings Bank funds were applied to ordinary loan accounts. I think I have said sufficient to show that the Prime Minister not only misused the public moneys, but also cooked the public accounts. Now for the sequel. In January, 1903, I attended the opening of the Kalgoorlie Water Works. The Prime Minister was, at the time, engaged in making a tour of Western Australia in the free-trade interest. He was not then favorably disposed towards the Victorian protectionists, whom he has now got into his clutches, and he spoke as bitterly as he possibly could against them, and made strong attacks upon the Victorian manufacturers. I was representing a protectionist constituency, and I was glad enough to accede to the request of a Western Australian newspaper for an interview to defend them. I thought that the statements which the Prime Minister was making against the Victorian manufacturers and workers were absolutely unjustifiable, and that the sooner a direct denial was given to them the better. The statements I made in the course of that interview are not of any great importance, so far as the present occasion is concerned. The Prime Minister answered my remarks at Kalgoorlie. He was then a great distance away from Sydney, and, as it was very unlikely that the reports in the Kalgoorlie newspapers would be circulated in New South Wales, he thought he could safely abuse the gentlemen who have now given him a certificate of character. This was not the first time that the right honorable gentleman had denied the statements made by the members of the Committee on Public Accounts in New South Wales, but his remarks were then stronger than ever before. He not only said that the report was of no good, but attacked the members of the Committee who were appointed by himself. I shall only quote a portion of his statement. He said—

When the charges of unfair financial administration were investigated by a committee appointed by Sir William Lyne, that committee reported that I had kept the accounts of the Treasury according to law, and that the accounts, as so kept, showed a surplus. That finding completely exonerated me from all imputations which had been made. The questions, with regard to the legislation of Parliament, are open to differences of opinion. The only serious one for the public to determine was whether I had adhered to the legislation that I had passed in managing the Treasury. This was found by Sir William Lyne's appointed committee. I had no confidence in that committee.

The right honorable gentleman has no confidence in any one unless they are prepared to make him the Prime Minister. He proceeds—because one of its members was a political opponent, and I had protested against his inclusion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Hear, hear!

Mr. CROUCH.—Might I ask who was the political opponent of the right honorable gentleman?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Mr. Yarwood.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—A great free-trader.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He was nothing of the kind. He stood at the elections as a supporter of the honorable member for Hume.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is not a fact.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Mr. Yarwood denounced the Prime Minister, up and down, at the previous election.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That is not correct.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. These conversations across the floor of the Chamber, specially when they so seriously interrupt an honorable member who is addressing the Chair, are entirely out of order. Therefore, I would ask honorable members who wish to place their views before the House to wait until an opportunity is presented to them to speak in the ordinary course.

Mr. CROUCH.—In justice to the honorable member for Parramatta, I must say that I appealed to him for the name of the member of the Committee of Inquiry who was supposed to be a political opponent of the Prime Minister. I would now like to ask him whether it is not true that the two bankers who were members of the Committee were appointed by the right honorable gentleman?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No.

Mr. CROUCH.—Or selected by him?

Mr. FULLER.—No. They were appointed by the honorable member for Hume.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Prime Minister took no exception to their appointment.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Prime Minister nominated them.

Mr. CROUCH.—The Prime Minister proceeded to say—

It transpired that another member, Mr. Dibbs, of the Commercial Bank, had judged the case before his appointment.

Of course, I knew my man, even though I had had only a few years' experience of the right honorable gentleman. I thought it very unfair to the members of the Committee that these statements should be made at a place like Kalgoorlie, far distant from Sydney, and I took care to communicate them to the chairman of the committee, Mr. T. A. Dibbs, the general manager of the Commercial Banking Company of Sydney, one of the principal financial institutions of Australia. The reply I received was dated 14th March, 1903, and read as follows:—

Most people do not attach much importance to what Mr. Reid says when he is out on the stump. In your clipping he says the Committee exonerated him from blame; then what necessity to say that I was a political opponent? I read the other day that, in answer to a deputation, he said that if he got into power he would disturb the Tariff as little as possible, and in the next sentence he said that he would make drastic alterations, statements made to please both sides. The best answer I can give you is to read the report of the Finance Committee, a copy of which you could get on application to the See Government. The committee were:—Mr. J. R. French, general manager of the Bank of New South Wales; Mr. Yarwood, a very able accountant; and myself. Mr. Reid appointed the bankers, Sir William Lyne appointed Mr. Yarwood. Let me refer you to the last Sydney Bulletin, which is worth your perusal, on Mr. Reid's ever-changing attitude in politics.

I send you a clipping taken from it (28th February) referring to the particular subject of your inquiry.

P.S.—The finding of the committee was adverse to Mr. Reid.

I do not know that it is necessary for me to proceed much further. It was said of George IV. that to the end of his days, he claimed to have been present at the Battle of Waterloo. He had told the lie so often that in the end he was persuaded that he was stating the truth. The Prime Minister has so frequently made misstatements and denials that I should not be surprised if he fully believed that the report of the Committee was favorable to him. When he stamped and screamed in this Chamber yesterday, and pointed to me and others, and spoke of the slanderous statements that had been uttered, I have no doubt he thought he was a much maligned man. No doubt it is quite possible for him to work himself up into such a state that he will believe anything. The fact that he made the statement to which I have referred in Sydney, that he repeated it in a much stronger form at Kalgoorlie, and at last—under the impression that I was not in possession of the letters which I have read—attacked me in this House evidences an amount of moral obliquity which is surprising. Honorable members have heard the statements which I have quoted, and I invite them to again study the letter from the members of the Committee which was read by the Prime Minister yesterday in his endeavour to refute the accuracy of my charges. That letter states—

Dear Mr. Reid,

Referring to your note of 10th inst. to Mr. J. Russell French, covering extract of a letter published in the Melbourne Age, our report, which is referred to, speaks for itself, and should not have given rise to any misapprehension.

I think I had better repeat those words—

Our report, which is referred to, speaks for itself, and should not have given rise to any misapprehension. In view, however, of the remarks in the extract in question, it is but just to you—

Evidently the Committee think that it is necessary to add something to be just to the right honorable gentleman, thereby implying that in itself their report cannot be favorable to him. The letter continues—

It is but just to you to state that we made no reflection whatever on your personal honour or integrity—

Who did? I was glad that the honorable member for Wide Bay pointed out yesterday that no such reflection had been made. At the same time I hold that for his political trickery and maladministration as Treasurer of New South Wales, the right honorable gentleman is deserving of the severest censure.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—The report says that he kept the accounts according to law.

Mr. CROUCH.—The letter continues—

Nor did we intend to suggest any improper manipulation of the Treasury accounts by yourself or the Treasury officials, as would seem to be implied by the terms "cooked" or "doctored," which appear in the letter.

I am very glad that the Prime Minister brought this matter forward, because now that he is at the head of the Commonwealth Government we know that he has a right to interfere in all Departments, and if he continues in office we need to be very careful indeed that he does not interfere with the Treasury.

Mr. ROBINSON.—He would not send an article to two different newspapers and ask for cheques from both.

Mr. CROUCH.—I cannot say straight out that the interjection of the honorable and learned member for Wannon is a lie, because that would be unparliamentary, but when he declares that I sent an article to two newspapers and requested cheques from both, I ask him if he has any sense of fair play? If he has, he will father that statement outside the House, and I will soon teach him manners.

Mr. ROBINSON. — The honorable and learned member runs away from a vote here, and he would run away outside.

Mr. CROUCH.—If the honorable and learned member will repeat the statement outside of the House I will give him some lessons in veracity which he very much needs. There are some men who have no manners, and who can be reached only through their pockets. I regret this unfortunate digression. Perhaps I have devoted too much attention to a State matter, but I do not think that the time has been wasted in exposing the present Prime Minister and his methods. Immediately after his assumption of office, the right honorable gentleman issued a manifesto to the people of Australia, in which he declared—

We thoroughly believe in progress, a fearless forward policy.

That declaration appeared in the newspapers of 22nd August last. I now wish to show the character of this "fearless forward policy." Personally I regard the Ministerial policy as one of the most watery and colourless that has ever been presented to any deliberative Assembly in the world. For example, the right honorable gentleman accepts all the amendments which have been made in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. He bids farewell to State rights, although he voted with the Deakin Administration to resist what he deemed to be an encroachment upon them. In spite of the position which he then took up, he now says, "We accept the Bill as it stands." Although he came into power over a clause in that measure, and although the Deakin Ministry were defeated upon another provision in it, he says "We accept the Bill as it stands." Despite the injury which he declared would be done to State rights by making the measure applicable to the railway employes and public servants of the States, he is now content to accept it in its present form. That represents his "fearless, forward policy." Then upon the question of preferential trade and Tariff Revision, he says that the Government take up the same position as did the Watson Administration. That is another evidence of his "fearless, forward policy." There are three Bills, however, with which he will proceed, and in regard to which he will nail his colours to the mast. In such matters he is simply reckless in his bravery. He says that he will proceed with the Papua Bill, the Trades Marks Bill, and the Fraudulent Trade Marks Bill—all non-contentious measures. But upon measures of a party character, we find how weak and colourless is the policy of the Government. I do not know whether honorable members have heard of the man who entered a restaurant, and after being supplied with chicken broth which he had ordered, handed it back to the waiter with a request that the chicken should be allowed to run through it again. That story reminds me of the "fearless, forward policy" which the Government have adopted. They had better let a little more courage run through it. This remark applies even to the High Commissioner Bill, which is absolutely a non-party measure. Unfortunately, the terms of the Labour-Liberal Alliance were disclosed upon the very day that the Prime Minister was to make his statement of policy to the House. The alliance decided that the appointment of a High Commissioner should be subject to the approval of Parliament. That was sufficient to make this fearless, forward policy-monger immediately double back, and announce that in order that there should be no interference with States rights, the Government had determined to allow the High Commissioner Bill to remain over until next session. If there is one thing more than another of which the Commonwealth Parliament has absolute control, it is the appointment of a High Commissioner; but the Prime Minister has determined to allow the Bill to stand over in order that he may, during the recess, consult the Premiers of the States in regard to the matter. On the one Bill, in regard to which there was the slightest possibility of opposition being shown, the right honorable gentleman backed down. Some of the protectionist supporters of the Ministry have fought well in the past, and I appeal to them to say whether this is the sort of craven leader that the fighting men of Victoria are going to accept in order that they may remain in office. This is one of those occasions on which angels should weep.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member is himself a good mourner.

Mr. CROUCH.—The interjection made by the honorable member reminds me of another matter, to which no reference has been made during the debate. The Ministry is not entirely a free-trade one. We have to remember that the Prime Minister was returned not merely as a free-trader, but as a free-trade and sectarian member.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member played the sectarian card fairly strongly at the last general election.

Mr. CROUCH.—Those are the two planks on which the Prime Minister was returned. He secured the votes, not merely of free-traders, but of others, because he promised Dr. Dill-Mackay that he would do certain things, and accepted the platform of a certain organization. The free-trade ticket was not solely responsible for the return of that solid phalanx of representatives from New South Wales, which we see on the Government side of the House. The cry related, not only to free-trade, but to the question whether there should be certain precedence given to ecclesiastics, and whether Roman Catholics should not be employed in the Public Service.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is all right; we do not object to that.

Mr. CROUCH.—Some persons may object to the introduction of this subject; but the distinct appeal which sectarian bodies made to the people of New South Wales, to almost entirely support free-trade candidates at the last elections, was outrageous and scandalous. I am told by those who are familiar with the conditions which prevailed in New South Wales—and the matter was mentioned during the Address-in-Reply—that one of the ablest members of the protectionist party in the last Parliament was defeated simply because of his religion, and because he would not subscribe—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I must ask the honorable and learned member, whether he proposes to connect the matter which he is at present discussing with the motion now before the Chair? Unless he can, he certainly ought not to proceed to debate the motion on these lines.

Mr. CROUCH.—I shall certainly connect my remarks with the motion, Mr. Speaker. If the Prime Minister was returned on certain grounds, and received the support of a certain following, because of promises which he made, he should be ready at once to fulfil those promises, rather than to sink them, as he has sunk everything else. If he intends to sink the particular pledges upon which, I contend, he was returned, he should inform the House of that intention. It seems to me little short of scandalous that at the last general election he largely used the influence to which I have referred. Perhaps it is not desirable to deal with this matter at greater length, but I strongly object to the combination of sectarianism and of free-trade, on which the Prime Minister was returned. It is a combination that should, at the very outset, be strongly reprobated.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In New South Wales the issue was not merely that of sectarianism and free-trade.

Mr. CROUCH.—I cannot forget that the Prime Minister, when leader of the Opposition, wrote a letter to an organization in New South Wales, in which he stated that throughout his public career he had always been opposed by a certain religious body, and that he would never forget that fact. That assertion constitutes one reason why he should not be allowed to remain in office one hour longer than we can prevent. I wish now to deal with the position of the seceding protectionists who have left this side of the House to take refuge under the wing of a free-trade Prime Minister. I regret already to observe a desire on the part of the Prime Minister to depose the honorable and learned member for Ballarat from the leadership of the protectionist wing of his supporters. Up to the date on which he issued his manifesto to the electors of New South Wales, the Prime Minister had always referred to the honorable and learned member for Ballarat as "the leader of the protectionist party"; but in that manifesto he shifted his ground, and endeavoured to introduce other leaders. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat had refused to join his Ministry, or to have anything to do with him; he had declined under any circumstances to enter the coalition as a Minister, and as the result of this the Prime Minister, in his manifesto to the electors of New South Wales, referred to "Mr. Deakin and Sir George Turner, and their supporters." Since then this free-trade Prime Minister has apparently taken up the position that he has a right to depose the honorable and learned member for Ballarat from the leadership of the protectionist wing of his supporters, and to appoint another leader. In accordance with this view, he now invariably refers to the Minister of Trade and Customs as "the leader of the protectionist party on this side of the House." I do not know what right the Prime Minister has to make a change in the leadership of his protectionist wing. If I were in the position of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, I should certainly object to his efforts in that direction; but we find that the honorable and learned member is taking them very quietly. He is, so to speak, taking them "lying down." I should like to know what the Minister of Trade and Customs has to say to the statement made last night by the Prime Minister, that there is no longer any coalition, and it would also be interesting to learn the views of the honorable member for Eden-Monaro.

Mr. MAUGER.—The Prime Minister said that the Deakin party had refused a coalition.

Mr. CROUCH.—And that there was no coalition on that side of the House. That statement was distinctly made by the right honorable gentleman.

Mr. POYNTON.—He said that it was now a voluntary association.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member should quote the next sentence.

Mr. CROUCH.—If the honorable member will supply me with it I shall be happy to read it. In his manifesto to the people of New South Wales, the Prime Minister said that the appearance in office of a caucus-tied Labour Administration, supported by a small minority in the House, raised constitutional and national questions which—

I think fully justified the junction which has taken place between myself and my supporters, and Mr. Deakin and Sir George Turner and their supporters, a junction which leaves all our supporters free from any surrender of principle.

Evidently, on the 22nd August, 1904—the date of this manifesto—he did not think it necessary to endeavour to depose the honorable and learned member for Ballarat from the leadership of the protectionist wing on the Government side of the House; but, judging by his present attitude, and from certain indications afforded us by the speech made by him last night, I feel satisfied that he will do his best to gradually draw away from the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, and so to secure an entirely undivided party. If his protectionist supporters cannot be absorbed by the free-trade wing he will endeavour to eject them. I can clearly read for them “the handwriting on the wall.” The Prime Minister is doing his best to induce the honorable and learned member for Ballarat to finally leave him. He certainly does not wish to lose his support at this stage, but if a dissolution occurs at an early date, the Prime Minister will take up an entirely different attitude in regard to the terms of the coalition than that which he assumes at the present time, when he absolutely relies on the support of some of the protectionist members of this House.

Mr. HIGGINS.—As soon as he gets into recess he will sell them.

Mr. CROUCH.—The Prime Minister, for some weeks past, has been touring the country and talking of the restoration of responsible government; but he knows that the honorable and learned member for Ballarat—and this is why he does not relish the position occupied by the honorable and learned member—has him completely in the hollow of his hand. If the honorable and learned member chooses to say to the Prime Minister, “Do this,” or “Do that,” he must obey or leave office, and a dissolution would then at once take place. The right honorable member is seeking to undermine the position of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. He is never grateful for services rendered. That is his record, and I certainly think it will be his record, so far as the honorable and learned member for Ballarat is concerned. That he should be grateful to a man is his best excuse for disliking him. In regard to the protectionist position, I may say that at the last election I was in favour of fiscal peace. I was returned on the principle of fiscal peace. But then we had this condition and circumstance obtaining: that there was a protectionist Prime Minister in power. That altered the position very materially. As long as a protectionist Prime Minister was in power, I do not think I should have advocated any change in the Tariff without going to face my electors again. I made fiscal peace so prominent in my programme that I could not honorably have changed my vote in this House without resigning.

Mr. EWING.—Why, then, does not the honorable and learned member resign?

Mr. CROUCH.—The position is altogether changed. A free-trade Prime Minister is in power, who certainly was not chosen by the electors. In fact, the electors declared against him. At the last elections the contest was not between the present Prime Minister, the leader of the Opposition, and the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. It was distinctly between the honorable and learned member for Ballarat and the Prime Minister. So far as the electors of Australia could say that the present Prime Minister should not occupy that office, by an overwhelming majority they said it. It seems to me to be a blot upon our democratic institutions that a man whom the country so overwhelmingly condemned and rejected should have attained to the position of Prime Minister—in my opinion, by a long course of juggling and trickery. In my belief the Prime Minister will take the earliest opportunity to sell the Protectionist Party. Indeed, he has already given indications in that direction. On the last Thursday in August—I cannot give the exact date—he spoke to a Farmers' Conference in Melbourne, and he then made use of this statement—

I was Premier for five years in New South Wales, during which the Labour Party had me in the hollow of their hand. And what was the result? I got my free-trade policy passed by protectionist labour men. You can always come upon me with a deal of that kind.

Here was this Prime Minister, having consummated a coalition with certain seceding protectionists, stating about a fortnight after the coalition was formed, and after he had got certain protectionists in his Ministry, that he passed his free-trade policy in New South Wales with the assistance of protectionists, and that "You can always come upon me with a deal of that kind." If that is not a statement which should make those honorable members, who were previously with us in the Protectionist Party, pause in their career — if they are really protectionists—and prevent themselves being used by the present free-trade Prime Minister, as he used the protectionists in New South Wales, I do not know that any more public warning could be given.

Mr. EWING.—It was not the Protectionist Party, but the Labour Party in New South Wales that the Prime Minister used.

Mr. CROUCH.—The right honorable gentleman said, "I got my free-trade policy passed by protectionist labour men."

Mr. EWING.—Yes; labour men.

Mr. CROUCH.—If, after a warning of that sort, the protectionists who are supporting the Prime Minister can continue honestly and honorably to do so, I am very much surprised. A little while ago, I asked the Prime Minister what his position would be in reference to giving a preference to local contractors. He refused to answer, but made some sort of a joke. I should like to point out to those protectionists who have seceded from the Protectionist Party, that the Prime Minister said that he would never rest until the policy of the Protectionist Party was stamped out. It was not so long ago since the Prime Minister called the protectionists cowards. During the Tariff debates, he accused the honorable member for Mernda, in this House, of discreditable actions in trade. The right honorable gentleman continually interjected remarks about starch during the speeches of the honorable member. After his references to the weight of the packages sold by the honorable member's firm, after his statement that the honorable member was really making his money out of the poverty of the people who used his starch, and after the series of accusations which the Prime Minister made against him during the Tariff discussions, it seems to me that the honorable member for Mernda is a very funny protectionist if he is prepared to follow, as he seems to do, the right honorable gentleman. There is one other position which the Prime Minister takes up in his manifesto. He says that he is strongly against Socialism. Since the issue of that manifesto, he has addressed several meetings against Socialism. He thinks that Socialism is one of the worst things in the world. He defines it as the nationalization of industries. Unfortunately, we have the honorable member for Wilmot stating that, although the leader of the Opposition is a Socialist, he finds that the Prime Minister is also a Socialist. Yet the Prime Minister goes up and down the country denouncing Socialism. That is the ground upon which he endeavours to retain his position. History does not pass away from our memories so soon. We have had only four years of Federal parliamentary life. Statements have been made in this House by the Prime Minister, which are reported in Hansard, and which show that he was formerly very anxious to get the Labour Party to vote with him. The Prime Minister was going a good way in the direction of Socialism then. On the 21st May, 1901, when this Parliament met for the first time, and we were discussing the Address-in-Reply—and he was not then indulging in any funnyisms, but seriously placing his political intentions before the country—he said—

We say—"If you will encourage new forms of industry, make Government industries of them. If you believe that you can fashion industries, try a few experiments—Government experiments, and let us see how they get on. Then, if there is failure, no one else can be blamed, and the experiments can be dropped."

On the 15th October, 1901, when he knew he could not carry a vote of want of confidence without the support of the Labour Party, he said—

I have always been one who would like to see the iron industry firmly established, but my method of effecting this would be by giving it direct encouragement from the national exchequer. My reason for so doing would be that as it is a national industry the nation should pay the expense of encouraging it.

I do not go so far as the Prime Minister as a Socialist; but I object to his going around the country speaking against Socialism when we remember that only two or three years ago he was ready enough to agree to almost any nationalizing of industries if he could only get the support of certain persons. Then what do we find this anti-Socialist, to the horror of some of his supporters, and certainly to the horror of the conservative group in the Government corner, saying in regard to the Papua Bill, in which there was a most Socialistic experiment—

Mr. POYNTON.—Clause 20.

Mr. CROUCH.—That is so. To the surprise and horror of those I have mentioned, the present Prime Minister said that that clause was accepted by a large majority of the House, and he did not think he ought to disturb it. There was a fearless policy! There was anti-Socialism! This clause was actually moved and agreed to by the present Prime Minister, and it stands to-day in the Papua Bill, as I hope it will stand for some time, though it gives up a principle which the right honorable gentleman outside the House is only too ready to advocate. I do not wish to speak at any length on the question of preference to unionists. When that question was discussed I was, to a certain extent, "sand-bagged," and could not say all I desired; but it is just as well that the people of the country should recognise where the difference is. Both sides of the House were agreed that there should be preference to unionists, and the only difference between honorable members on this side and the Ministerialists was that we held that the preference should be unencumbered by any proviso which would make it unworkable. The desire was to recommit the Bill, in order to pass a really workable clause; and there is not the slightest question that those who voted against the recommitment of clause 48 desired that preference should be given to unionists. That provision was in the original Bill, introduced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, and the principle is supported absolutely and completely by the present Prime Minister, and even by those five representatives of the Victorian Employers' Federation who sit in the Government corner. But it ought to be distinctly understood that the difference between the Ministry and the Opposition is not as to whether there shall be preference, but only as to whether the provision giving preference shall be workable or combined with conditions which will make it practically impossible. I have already referred to the Deakin party, who are still following the Prime Minister. In his manifesto the right honorable gentleman stated that he would adhere to the position he assumed in the negotiations with the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. But, in the first announcement he made to the House, the Prime Minister went back on that position, and said that so far as preferential trade was concerned—and this was certainly the most important plank of the Deakin party at the last election—he was going to take up exactly the position of the Watson Government, who, until approached by England, were not going to do anything in the matter. What was the platform agreed to at the meeting at which the joint proposals were considered? It was that the question of preferential trade should wait until the British Government had spoken, as is shown by the following:—

It is recognised that no proposals affecting trade relations within the Empire can be looked for from the mother country during the life of the present Commonwealth Parliament, but the maintenance of a truce for that period is not to prevent the acceptance of statutory concessions offered to us by any other part of the Empire.

The Prime Minister has confined his opposition entirely to refusing to do anything in regard to preferential trade until the United Kingdom makes approaches; he neglected altogether the latter part of the paragraph—but the maintenance of a truce for that period is not to prevent the acceptance of statutory concessions offered to us by any other part of the Empire.

Already the Deakin party are in process of being "sold," and this they will find out and be sorry for. They are dealing with a very astute man; and they will recognise that it is impossible to follow a free-trade Minister and expect him to endeavour to conserve a protectionist policy. The sooner they get into office a man whom they can trust as a thoroughly honest man, who regards his political engagements as binding on him, the better it will be for them; and unless they can achieve that end they had far better sit in Opposition, and endeavour to remove the present Government from office. The Ministry has been christened the "sand-bagging" Ministry, though I do not know that that is a good description. It might really be properly called the "Yes-No" Ministry, simply because on the fiscal question we have four members of the Government saying "Yes" and four members saying "No." Or it might be called a "black-white" Ministry, because we have five saying "black" and three saying "white."

Mr. MAHON.—What about the free-trade Minister who gives protectionist preference in the Post Office?

Mr. MAUGER.—The Minister is going to consider that matter on its merits.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I was "game" to give a decision, and the late Postmaster-General was not.

Mr. CROUCH.—I do not want to call the Ministry by any of the names I have suggested, because it will sufficiently condemn them as unreliable and incompetent in the eyes of the people of Australia if it be simply called the Reid Ministry.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I desire to make one or two remarks concerning a matter to which the honorable and learned member for Corio has alluded, and which relates to the keeping of the accounts of New South Wales by the present Prime Minister. I venture to say that the honorable and learned member for Corio, by the statements which he has made to-day, has altogether disproved his allegations made outside this Chamber. Instead of showing that there had been any "cooking" or "doctoring" in connexion with the accounts of New South Wales, the honorable and learned member, out of his own mouth, has proved that everything was done with the sanction of the New South Wales Parliament, and at the behest of that Parliament, and done in a legal and orderly way. What was the matter about which all the controversy has arisen? It has been stated that the honorable member for Hume appointed an impartial and disinterested Committee. The whole matter has reference to the administration of the Dibbs-Lyne Government, and to an old deficiency which they left, and to which the Reid Government succeeded on coming into office in New South Wales. It relates to a deficiency which had accumulated under the previous Administration, and which amounted to £1,500,000. The present Prime Minister, before proceeding to deal with the deficiency in the way to which objection has been taken, actually reduced it from £1,500,000 to £1,100,000. I propose to quote a few sentences from a speech made by the Colonial Treasurer of the day, Sir John See, bearing upon this very matter. That honorable gentleman, in his Budget Speech, admitted that this deficiency had arisen under the administration of the Government of which he was a member, and he said—

So far as can now be ascertained the deficiency is about £1,200,000, and I propose to ask authority to issue Treasury Bills to cover this deficiency. The then Premier estimated that the deficiency for 1893, and previous years, was £1,500,000 and this he considered would be the amount to be so dealt with.

When we took office, one of the first things the present Prime Minister did, was to re-arrange the whole system of public accounts. Instead of perpetuating the old credit system, by which accounts of years' standing were carried over to succeeding years, so that no one could tell what was the condition of the public accounts, the right honorable gentleman introduced what is now known as the cash system. He altered the close of the financial year from December to June, and in doing that, he said that, instead of taking over this deficiency of previous Governments into his accounts, he would do as Sir John See had proposed to do, and wipe it off by funding it. The whole controversy that has arisen, as between the bankers and the right honorable member for East Sydney, and as between the honorable member for Hume and the right honorable gentleman, is as to whether he ought to have funded the accumulated deficiency, or whether he ought to have loaded his new cash system with it. The right honorable gentleman said, "I have quite enough to do. I am taking £800,000 a year in taxation off the people of this country, and I cannot afford to take over this old liability into my new accounts." Furthermore, he said, "I do not think it would be fair to the new system if I were to do so. We have a new cash system. Let us have a fair start, so that the system may stand on its merits." With that object in view, the right honorable gentleman funded the accumulated deficiency. The whole controversy which was waged, and which has been waged ever since, and all these charges of "doctoring" and "cooking" accounts, have arisen, because the right honorable member for East Sydney came in a straightforward way to the Parliament, and asked it to give him authority to fund the deficiency, and so wipe it off his accounts altogether. I have here the New South Wales Act authorizing the whole transaction. It is entitled "An Act to authorize the issue of Treasury Bills, to cover the deficiency debt up to 30th June, 1895." That amounted to £1,100,000.

Mr. MAUGER.—Who introduced that measure?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It was introduced by the right honorable member for East Sydney, and the New South Wales Parliament unanimously passed it. I think there were one or two criticisms only, but there was no question at all as to whether the measure proposed a proper way of dealing with this very difficult matter. That was done by the right honorable gentleman.

Mr. CROUCH.—Nobody has disputed that. The honorable member is dealing with something which is altogether outside the question.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am afraid the honorable and learned member has not read the report which he has quoted so extensively. If he had he would know that that is the whole point of the controversy.

Mr. CROUCH.—The Committee found against the right honorable member for East Sydney.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Of course they found against the right honorable gentleman. They simply said that he should have brought over the old deficiency into his accounts.

Mr. CROUCH.—They said much more than that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—This is what they said, and it is the whole point of the controversy between the bankers and the present Prime Minister. That right honorable gentleman said, "I do not think that it is fair to load the new cash system with this old deficiency, for which I am not responsible, but which Sir William Lyne and Sir George Dibbs have accumulated. In starting a new system I desire to begin with a clean sheet." The bankers said that this old deficiency should still have been carried forward, and should have been liquidated from succeeding revenues. That was the whole question in dispute.

Mr. MAUGER.—You cannot say that you begin with a clean sheet by merely wiping off your books a debt which has not been paid.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Sir John See and Sir William Lyne proposed the same thing.

Mr. WEBSTER.—To pass it on to posterity.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Precisely. That is what was done, and that is precisely what other Governments had done before. I am not justifying it, but pointing out that the criticism is not a criticism of the right honorable member for East Sydney, but in effect of the Parliament that sanctioned what he proposed.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Who took the lead in the matter?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have already told the honorable member that the right honorable member for East Sydney took the lead, but he was simply carrying out the intention of the previous Government, as I have already shown by the quotation I have made from the New South Wales Hansard.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—Sir William Lyne suggested it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There never was any question about the legality of the transaction. The New South Wales Parliament gave its consent to the whole proceedings, and, therefore, what the honorable and learned member for Corio has quoted is not a condemnation of the right honorable member for East Sydney, but of the whole Parliament of New South Wales. Honorable members have only to look up the New South Wales Hansard of the time to learn how the Parliament of New South Wales regarded that criticism. Although the report was tabled with a flourish of trumpets by Sir William Lyne, no report was ever more flat and stale, or fell more unprofitably on the table of any Parliament House than did that report, notwithstanding all the trouble which had been taken to produce it. Now, as to the genesis of the Committee: We have heard much about its being a disinterested Committee. Do honorable members know the genesis of the whole matter? When the present honorable member for Hume was in Opposition he was attacking the Reid Government, week in and week out, upon these financial matters. He was being fed up at the time by a public servant, who afterwards became an adverse witness before the expert Committee appointed, and also became its secretary. The very man who had engineered the whole thing was made secretary to the Committee. This was the same Mr. Martin whom the honorable member for Hume wished to foist upon the Federal service, and the honorable gentleman would have been successful in doing so, only that his then colleagues declined to make the appointment he wished to have made. Of course the honorable gentleman wished to reward Mr. Martin for his political services. This was the man who engineered the whole thing, and he became secretary to the Committee, and gave adverse evidence when the Committee was considering the matter. Now, as to the composition of the Committee itself: Mr. Yarwood was one of the gentlemen selected by the honorable member for Hume. Only just previously Mr. Yarwood had run in a constituency as a supporter of that honorable gentleman, and as a straight-out opponent of the present Prime Minister and his land and income taxation. It is amusing to me to hear members of the Labour Party cheering references to Mr. Yarwood, whose chief object was to discredit the only man who had been game to stand up and fight the big property-owners of New South Wales.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Who is the right honorable gentleman fighting now?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am fighting for fair play just now, and I am putting this matter in its proper light. I challenge honorable members to contradict what I am saying. I have nothing to say against the two bankers who were members of the Committee. There is no doubt that they were smarting at the time for the very same reason. They did not like the income tax, and they did not like the land tax. They were probably at the time the bitter political enemies of the right honorable gentleman, and he was warned by some of his supporters that it was not wise to appoint such gentlemen, one of whom it has since been proved had expressed opinions adverse to his system of finance. It is well known, for instance, that, long before his appointment to the Committee, Mr. Dibbs had told the present Minister of Home Affairs, in no unmistakable terms, his opinion of the finance of the right honorable gentleman, and we know that when he entered upon the inquiry, he was as much biased as a man could be against both the right honorable gentleman and his system of accounts. When the honorable and learned member for Corio says that these gentlemen were appointed by the Prime Minister—

Mr. BAMFORD.—He said "nominated."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think that the right honorable gentleman simply agreed to them over the table of the House. Every one who knows him must be aware that he is not the most suspicious man in the community; that he is always disposed to put the best construction upon the actions of those with whom he comes into contact.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is well to hear that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the honorable and learned member does not know that that is a fact, he does not know the Prime Minister very well. I doubt if there was another man in the Ministry who would have consented to the appointment of those two bankers, in view of all the political circumstances. It only came out afterwards that Mr. Dibbs, who has written to the honorable and learned member for Corio in such an impartial strain, had said beforehand, that he was opposed to the right honorable gentleman's system of accounts. Let honorable members read that letter, and see if it is the letter of an impartial man. It is rather the letter of an opponent, and of a bitter one at that.

When these facts came out in the New South Wales Legislative Assembly, the right honorable gentleman determined that he would be judged fairly, and another board was appointed, to which the honorable and learned member for Corio made no reference. Although he has boasted so much of his fairness, he was careful to quote only from the report which suited him, and to ignore another report which exonerates the Prime Minister.

Mr. CROUCH.—I ask the honorable member to believe that I did not know of the second report.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is a fair answer to make. The Prime Minister determined that the second board should be one in regard to whose composition there could be no cavilling; and he therefore asked the president of the Institute of Accountants to name an accountant, and the acting president of the Incorporated Accountants of Australia to name a second accountant; and he then asked these two accountants to name a third. No more honorable course than that could have been taken. Mr. J. E. Bowes was named by the president of the Institute of Accountants, and Mr. Thomas Davis by the acting president of the Incorporated Accountants of Australia; while Messrs. Bowes and Davis named Mr. Richard Teece, the general manager of the Australian Mutual Provident Society. The directors of that society, however, withdrew Mr. Teece from the inquiry after he had begun his work, thinking, I suppose, that the manager of a public company like theirs should not be concerned in the squabble. Messrs. Bowes and Davis then selected Mr. Vane, of the firm of Miles and Vane. All three gentlemen stand at the head of their profession. The Prime Minister did not appear before them, but he gave them the free run of the accounts of the Treasury and of the Auditor-General, and put the various Treasurers' Statements before them. In their report they admit that on the first six months' financing there was a deficiency of £151,000, but taking the four years' revenue and expenditure, including all extraneous items, they report that the surplus was £261,000. The Prime Minister had stated that he had a surplus of £147,000 on the four years' working; but the accountants make up the difference in this way. During the period under review, he had advanced £188,000 repayments of which were made during the term of office of his successor. A fair review of the financing for the whole four years, however, showed him to have a surplus of £261,000. Honorable members will recollect, in addition, that during those four years his Government had remitted to the people of New South Wales £3,000,000 worth of taxation. The honorable and learned member for Corio has also spoken of the loan expenditure during the right honorable gentleman's term of office; but all these matters were brought under the cognizance of the people of the State, and the strongest argument that could be used to defend our system of finance from the public platforms was to show the difference between the financing of the right honorable gentleman and that of the honorable member for Hume, and of Sir John See. It was sufficient to read the bare figures, to convince the people of that State that the Reid Government carefully husbanded their resources, while succeeding Governments recklessly squandered the public money in the most extravagant way.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member for Corio has similar material to fire off against the honorable member for Hume. He loaded both his barrels.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I hope that on the next occasion when the honorable and learned member makes an attack of this kind, he will first read all the information on the subject available to him, and not content himself with a jaundiced and prejudiced report to prove that the accounts of New South Wales were "cooked" and "doctored" by the Prime Minister. The honorable and learned member himself "cooked" and "doctored" the report of the Committee by the way in which he quoted it. The whole question at issue was whether the Prime Minister should carry on the deficiency of his predecessors, to be liquidated out of future revenue, or do as the honorable member for Hume and Sir John See proposed to do, fund it, and make a fresh start with a new system.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That was a very ready way of getting rid of the difficulty.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not say that it was the right way, but to begin with, the Prime Minister was carrying out the intention of his predecessors, and there is a great deal to be said for his determination when creating an entirely new cash system, to give it a fair start, instead of loading it with previous deficiencies. Although he funded those deficiencies, he instituted a sinking fund, and during the four years, paid off over £1,000,000. The honorable member might have quoted that fact, but he conveniently forgot it. The first thing that the next Administration did was to suspend payments into the sinking fund, and none have been made since. That was done by the men who instituted the inquiry.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The Reid Administration starved the roads of the country, and their successors had to make up the leeway.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The answer to that statement is that there is less money being spent upon the roads of New South Wales to-day than when we left office.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That is no reply; two wrongs do not make a right.

Mr. HIGGINS.—More New South Wales politics.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—This time the subject was introduced by a Victorian representative.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Cheered on by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Any one taking an impartial view of matters as they affect this Parliament must, I am sure, be very much disappointed—I make no secret of my disappointment—with the position of Federal affairs. We have had three crises during this year. Three times we have had a political stocktaking, and here we are at it again.

Mr. POYNTON.—And likely to be so, too.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then all I can say is that we had better surrender the political estate to the liquidator outside as quickly as possible. The course now being pursued is paralyzing the whole industrial and political life of Australia, and is certainly doing us no good in the eyes of people abroad.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The old "gag."

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member and the other members of his party helped to put out two Governments.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Did not the honorable member help to put out any Government?

Mr. POYNTON.—Yes.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member was as eager as any one to put out the Deakin Government.

Mr. POYNTON.—I was not eager to put out the Government, but I was anxious to secure the insertion of a certain provision in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill.

Mr. MCCAY.—So were we.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The present position seems to be a curious commentary on the popular idea that all our political troubles would be ended if we only adopted a system by which Ministers would be personally responsible to the House. All I have to say is that the present position of affairs represents upon a miniature scale the conditions which would obtain under that system. The House is full of parties—full of coalitions, and that is precisely what would happen under a system of non-party government. We have too many parties now, and they are too inextricably mixed up to do anything of a permanent character so far as this Parliament is concerned. Honorable members opposite have referred to the coalition on the Government side as an unholy combination which embraces men of widely divergent opinions, and I wish to place my position very clearly before the House. I hope that honorable members will believe me when I say that I do not care very much for the present coalition. I hope that is plain. At the same time I like it a little better than the arrangement which has been entered into by honorable members opposite.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That is quite natural.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It may be, but I shall give my reasons for taking that view. One of my objections to the coalition is that it is only half a coalition.

Mr. WILKS.—My objection is that there is not enough of it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member has hit it off exactly. The coalition does not embrace a sufficient number of honorable members. It is not the combination that we expected. As a matter of fact, the Protectionist Party has been split in two and the wriggling that has been going on between the two rent parts has been very amusing. What we anticipated was that it would be a genuine coalition, and that, as the whole of the free-traders joined it, the whole of the protectionists would come in on the basis of that fiscal peace which I believe was promised by every protectionist on the platform at the last election.

Mr. MAUGER.—The protectionists would not agree to that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In my opinion the arrangements made by the Prime Minister might have been of a different character. For instance, although he has only a few protectionists among his supporters, he has taken five fiscal-sinkers into his Cabinet.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is a good name.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—In the Cabinet there are only three fiscal militants as against five Ministers who believe in sinking the fiscal issue. Again, if I had been in the position of the Prime Minister, as a free-trader, I should not have handed the Customs Department over to the control of a protectionist. I say that candidly and frankly.

Mr. FRAZER.—This is interesting.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think that the Minister of Home Affairs might very well have been placed in charge of the Department of Trade and Customs.

Mr. MAUGER.—What difference would that have made?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I think it would make a great deal of difference.

Mr. MAUGER.—Would a free-trader favour the importers?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Not at all. The difference is this: A protectionist would have a bias towards his own fiscal system, and a free-trader would have a bias towards his side of the question—call it an unconscious bias if you like. Take a case in point. A few days ago the Minister of Trade and Customs received a deputation with regard to the duty charged upon chocolates. He told the deputation that wherever there was a duty on the border-line he would give them the advantage of the higher duty. I suppose that the honorable gentleman did what he honestly believed to be right, and I do not quarrel with him upon that ground. I fancy, however, that if the Minister had been a free-trader he would not have stretched matters in that direction. I wish to say, further, that I do not agree with the granting of preference to local tenderers. I thought that the question of preference had been crystallized in the Customs Tariff Act. The whole question was debated for two years, and whatever preference was to be given should have been embodied in the statute in the shape of Customs duty. I earnestly hope that this question will be decided upon lines exactly opposite to those which are being adopted by some Ministers at present.

Mr. MAUGER.—They have not the pluck to do that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No preference should be given beyond that provided for in the statute.

Mr. MAUGER.—It is so provided for.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Recent decisions show the contrary. Ever since the Tariff has been in operation it appears to have been the rule in the Post and Telegraph Department to give local tenderers the benefit of a duty of 30 per cent. upon goods which the statute says shall carry only 15 per cent. In my view a 15 per cent. preference, added to a 15 per cent. duty, is equivalent to a 30 per cent. duty.

Mr. MAUGER.—No. A 15 per cent. preference is equivalent to a duty of 15 per cent.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—A 15 per cent. preference, plus a duty of 15 per cent., amounts to 30 per cent. I have a very decided objection to any Ministry increasing the Customs Tariff of the country by mere administrative acts.

Mr. MAUGER.—Is not the preference equivalent to a duty of 15 per cent.?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not understand the honorable member. But whilst I make these criticisms of the position of honorable members upon the Ministerial side of the Chamber, I certainly do not see any justification for the statements which have been made by honorable members opposite. When I view the ragged protectionist regiment which occupies the Opposition corner benches, and which has allied itself with the Labour Party and pledged itself to the programme which has been outlined, I am quite content to remain where I am. Only the other evening the honorable and learned member for Indi referred to Ministerial supporters as “a sexless combination.” That was his way of rounding off a peroration. He expressed the hope that an end would soon be put to this “sexless combination.” I suppose that when he employed the word “sexless” he referred to the fiscal complexion of honorable members upon this side of the House. I think that I do him no injustice in assuming that. I say that if he wants to view a “sexless combination,” he had better look at home, and look as hard as he can in that direction. If he desires to gaze upon people who are fiscally sexless, he had better turn to his own side of the Chamber. Take the honorable member for Darling as an example. He has occupied a seat in this House for four years, and was a member of the New South Wales Parliament for many years previously, but I defy anybody to say whether he is a protectionist or a free-trader.

Mr. SPENCE.—He is here all right.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He is absolutely sexless so far as the fiscal question is concerned.

Mr. SPENCE.—Wait until it comes up.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—When it was under discussion, the honorable member was most irritatingly impartial in his votes. He was a protectionist to-day and a free-trader to-morrow throughout the whole of the debates. I repeat that before levelling such a taunt the honorable and learned member for Indi had better look at home. I do not make these statements in derogation of honorable members opposite, because they have never made a fetish of the fiscal question. They say that they were returned as labour members, which is a straightforward declaration. At the same time, they must admit that, according to the dictum of the honorable and learned member for Indi, they are fiscally sexless, and if he wishes to find a party which has no virility and no distinctive traits on this question, he had better look at the other side of the House. The honorable member for Wide Bay said last evening that nobody had ever known him to proclaim himself a free-trader. Yet this is the combination with which this great fiscal apostle is anxious to ally himself, in the hope of securing more protection.

Mr. MAUGER.—We are protectionists upon this side of the House by two to one, and the position is just the reverse upon the other side.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Does the alliance intend to raise the fiscal question?

Mr. MAUGER.—As soon as ever we can.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I hope that the honorable member is speaking for the combination.

Mr. MAUGER.—We intend to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the operation of the Tariff, as soon as possible.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable member is speaking for himself.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I thought he was. The other evening he said that the alliance had been formed upon a sound protectionist basis. I should like to hear the honorable member for Maranoa and others upon that point. I venture to say that they would sound a very different note indeed. What is the criticism which has been levelled against the Government by the leader of the Opposition? In the first place he referred to the postponement of the High Commissioner Bill. He said that that measure was desperately urgent, and that the sooner a High Commissioner was appointed the better it would be for Australia. I interjected that I did not believe that anything was spoiling in that regard. What I meant to convey was that action could be deferred whilst an effort was being made to see that the people of Australia are not charged anything additional for the conduct of their affairs in London. I hold that opinion very strongly, and I will not vote for the appointment of a High Commissioner unless I can see some chance of saving the States the expenditure which would be involved. "But what," I ask, "is the policy of the combination upon this point?" They have a most definite declaration upon it. From it I learn that "the selection of the High Commissioner is to be subject to the prior consent of Parliament, the economizing of existing State agencies, and the full utilization of the Federal staff for the benefit of the States." How can these points be considered unless by conference with the States?

Mr. SPENCE.—Hear, hear!

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then why do honorable members opposite object so fiercely to the proposal of the Government, which would give effect to the very letter of that arrangement?

Mr. SPENCE.—The Government propose to leave the decision of the matter entirely to the States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They propose no such thing. The Prime Minister distinctly stated that he would postpone the introduction of the Bill until he had consulted the States, with a view to ascertaining if a reduction could not be effected in their staffs.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Suppose they do not consent.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Suppose that they do.

Mr. MAUGER.—Perhaps "yes," perhaps "no."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the States act senselessly they will not consent, but if—as I believe they will—they act with an ordinary amount of prudence, they will give their most cordial consent to any proposal of the kind.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—What is the policy of the Ministerial combination, if they do not consent?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have already told the honorable member my policy in regard to the matter. I am not prepared to increase the expenses of the people of Australia in London at the present time. I now turn to another item in the programme of the Opposition alliance, from which I learn that preferential trade is to be discussed by the joint parties at an early date. That is a very safe declaration.

There ought to be no trouble in regard to that matter. Personally, I am quite prepared to join the alliance to discuss it. If they will inform me when it is to be considered, I shall be happy to take a hand with them. There is another matter, which goes to the very crux of the political combination opposite. The honorable and learned member for Indi is tirelessly proclaiming that his only object in seeking an alliance is to depose the Prime Minister, with a view to securing more protection for the industries of Australia.

Mr. TUDOR.—A very laudable object.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Let us see what definite provision is made for it.

Legislation (including Tariff legislation) shown to be necessary: (1) To develop Australian resources; (2) to preserve, encourage, and benefit Australian industries, primary and secondary—

That is a grand object with which everyone is in agreement—

(3) To secure fair conditions of labour for all engaged in every form of industrial enterprise, and to advance their interests and well-being without distinction of class or social status—

That sounds very democratic, but it is also very indefinite. I do not know of any honorable member who is not prepared to subscribe to the item in the programme that I have just read, but the point is that the members of the alliance are not bound to anything. It is provided that when they are called upon to discuss that which will best advance the interests of the people, any member of the combination may—

Agree with the members of his own party to be bound by their joint determination, or

(b) Decide how far the particular circumstances prove necessity, or the extent to which the proposal should be carried.

Mr. REID.—"Yes-no."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is to say, taking up the parable of honorable members opposite, that the honorable member for Flinders, to whom they are constantly alluding, I do not know with what justification, as the personification of conservatism—

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable member does not know him.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Under the terms of the alliance the honorable member for Flinders and the honorable member for Kooyong would be at liberty to freely express their own individual views, and to vote according to those views and yet be members of the combination.

Mr. SPENCE.—We are the party of freedom.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is quite right. As a member of the party he is bound only in regard to one object. That object was made unmistakably clear last night by the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, when he said, "We are combined together for the purpose of removing the right honorable gentleman."

Mr. REID.—A very laudable object.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Opposition are solid on that question.

Mr. WEBSTER.—It is a very laudable object.

Mr. REID.—It would, if successful, create a vacancy.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then the position is this: That the members of the Labour Party in the Federal Parliament, who, from its inception, have been declaiming against the system of the "ins and the outs," declaring that they would not remove any Government merely for the sake of removing it, desire to oust the Ministry solely because of a feeling of revenge towards one member of it, although that right honorable member's proposals are identical with their own.

Mr. THOMAS.—He said that he was in office to fight us.

Mr. REID.—We heard all about that last night.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the Labour Party shape its final course of action on the mere statement of an individual?

Mr. GROOM.—If it be a Ministerial declaration.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If that be so, it seems that the members of the party have come down to the ruck of very ordinary politicians, and have lost those high political ideals with which they set out.

Mr. THOMAS.—We lost them after the honorable member left us.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Government will not carry out our programme; if they would it might help them.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Have they not been carrying it out? They have taken up the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill.

Mr. WEBSTER.—They have, and they have also taken up the provisions in regard to the railway servants and public servants of the States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I shall have nothing to say later on in regard to that matter. I was glad to hear the admission made last night by the leader of the Opposition that, save in regard to the difference between two amendments, the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill was his own measure in every particular. That clears our course to a considerable extent. Another matter to which the Opposition take exception is the attitude of the Government on the question of old-age pensions. It may happen that when all the preliminary work has been done in connexion with a reform of this kind, those who did it will be put out, and some one who never lifted a finger to assist the movement will be pitchforked into office and given all the credit attaching to the achievement of that reform. That has happened, and may occur again. The man who, for purely political purposes, jumped on the flood tide, now receives all the credit, while those who did the work and prepared the way for the reform are made to suffer for their actions.

Mr. THOMAS.—The Prime Minister said that he would not give us this reform for 200 years.

Mr. REID.—I never said anything of the sort.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Another mistake on the part of the newspapers?

Mr. REID.—I was always in favour of old-age pensions, and was turned out of office for spending money in furtherance of the principle.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There is only one other item in the programme of the alliance to which I desire to refer, and that is the paragraph providing for the appointment of a Tariff Commission. This is a troublesome question. It has already given rise to difficulties among members of the party, and they have now agreed to send the whole question of Tariff revision downstairs to be buried in the vaults of the House. Should it ever emerge from the vaults, after investigation by the Royal Commission, members of the alliance will be perfectly free to split into a thousand fragments in dealing with it. To put such a programme seriously before the intelligent electors of Australia is, to my mind, to perpetrate a fraud upon them. It is a sham—a part which, at all events, a great many honorable members of the Opposition were not expected to play.

Mr. THOMAS.—We never anticipated that the honorable member for Gippsland and the right honorable member for East Sydney would sit side by side on the Treasury benches.

Mr. REID.—We are not worried, and why should the honorable member worry about the matter.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I desire to refer to some remarks made last night by the Minister of External Affairs. The honorable and learned member has gone out of his way on two occasions to make a bitter personal attack upon myself, and I wish it to be understood that, what I am about to say to-night will be said in self-defence. The honorable and learned member's vituperative speech has been scattered over the whole of the electorate which I represent, and I desire to send a little statement after it. I have never done anything to provoke the honorable and learned member. So far as I am aware, I have never crossed swords with him; but he took care, two or three weeks ago, to make some bitter personal accusations against me, and repeated some more last night. Here is what the honorable and learned member said on 12th ult.—

The honorable member, with his wiles, and his turns, and his tricks, and his subterfuges, and his appeals for votes—

Mr. HIGGINS.—Who said that?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—This is what the honorable and learned member's late colleague, the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, said concerning my humble self.

Mr. HIGGINS.—It is impossible.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He also said of me—

The honorable member has never kept a solitary pledge made by him during his life.

Mr. SPENCE.—I did not understand the honorable and learned member to be referring to the honorable and learned member for Parramatta when he made that remark.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member had better not begin to defend him. At a later stage he said—

At the same time, he will try to persuade those credulous and unhappy men in his district that he is still in favour of compulsory arbitration, and that he would give them preference. If he succeeds, he will achieve a great victory. If he stood alone and had not the advantages of a ticket and the press behind him, he would never do it.

There stands behind him a press, without whose aid he could never for a moment hope to come into Parliament again.

Mr. GROOM.—When was this said? Last night?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No, previously, but this is the first opportunity I have had to reply to it.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member did not say it last night.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I did not say that he did.

Mr. POYNTON.—But the honorable member has said that the honorable and learned member for West Sydney repeated it last night.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I say that he said some things last night that were equally bad. These will do for my purpose to-day. As to my being a creature of the press, I wish to say that honorable members in Melbourne know what a pet I am of the press of this city. I have had the good fortune over here to be broadly and squarely opposed by one newspaper, the Age; while the other newspaper, the Argus, is not for me at all. That is my position here; and I am bound to say this also—that much as the Age opposes me, it, on the whole, has treated me better than the Argus. Honorable members will judge from that how much of a pet I am of the press here. As to my own State, I merely wish to say that there is no honorable member in the Federal Parliament, nor a politician out of it, who has been treated with so much consideration and kindness by the press of Sydney, as the honorable and learned member for West Sydney has been. I challenge contradiction of that statement. No honorable member has been treated with anything like the consideration that he has been by the press of Sydney.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Therefore, he knows how valuable it is to the honorable member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I confess that I do not know the value of it, as he does; and I have never taken the steps that he has taken to get the press at my back. I have never gone whining at election time into the editor's room to get him to support me, as the honorable and learned member has done. At the last election, the honorable and learned member went into the editor's room at the Sydney Daily Telegraph office, and asked to be given the support of that journal.

Mr. MAHON.—Was the honorable member there?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No, I was not there. I say that I have never done that sort of thing yet.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—I dare say the honorable and learned member for West Sydney has never done it either.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It is well known that he has done it. I want to say something more.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Did he not go into the office of the Sydney Morning Herald also?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He tried to get the Herald to put him in the free-trade bunch, and when he found that he could not do it he went and got the support of the man whom he has so bitterly denounced, and asked the right honorable gentleman to help him.

Mr. REID.—And he rang me up on the telephone to tell me that they had not put him in the bunch.

Mr. MAHON.—Has not the Prime Minister any more private conversations to record?

Mr. REID.—After last night, that is a fair thing.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I want to say, Mr. Speaker, referring to the gibes of the honorable and learned member for West Sydney about a "ticket," that, however much I have been on the ticket of the Free-trade Party, the Free-trade Party have never paid any of my election expenses. He cannot say that.

Mr. McDONALD.—My "crowd" pay all mine, and those of nearly every other labour man in Queensland.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Did the honorable member ever get any one else to subscribe, apart from the labour people?

Mr. McDONALD.—No.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is the gravamen of my remarks. About this "ticket": I do not know which ticket the honorable and learned member for West Sydney referred to, but the honorable and learned member for Corio denounces the Prime Minister as being a sectarian Prime Minister. That is a nice thing for an honorable member to hurl across the Chamber.

Mr. TUDOR.—Does not the honorable member think it is true

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Do I think it is true? I am going to say this: that I know honorable members opposite who are just as anxious to get on the ticket referred to as any man can be. The honorable member who fulminated in that way last night was equally anxious to get on, and asked to be put in the Protestant bunch.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—What kind of politics is this, anyway?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I had that statement on the authority of a man whom I implicitly believe.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is more likely that the honorable member wrote to them, and asked them to leave the honorable and learned member for West Sydney out of their bunch.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What? He wrote and begged of them to put him in it.

Mr. GROOM.—Wrote?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I ought not to say "wrote"; I understand he went. That is a statement made by a man whom I would as readily believe as I would believe any statement of the honorable member.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable member will not tell who he is.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Let things develop a little further, and we will tell the honorable member who he is.

Mr. POYNTON.—Dill Mackay?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No; not Dill Mackay. The honorable member was wrong that time. But the information is absolutely authentic; honorable members may take that from me.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member has no right to make a statement of that kind unless he is prepared to give the proof of it to the House.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I admit that I have not. No one in this House has a monopoly of that kind of conduct but the honorable member who spoke last night. In the course of his speech he hardly said a single thing that was accurate.

Mr. POYNTON.—Did he say anything about the sectarian business?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He jibed at me about a "ticket." That is quite enough for my purpose, and I have given my answer to it. He is the man who goes after "tickets." No man goes after them with the same vigour and fervency as he does.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—This is a scurvy kind of attack.

Mr. McCAY.—What about the six pot-ter's' statement last night?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That was a denunciation of Government policy.

Mr. McCAY.—It was a dishonorable statement.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member for West Sydney stated that but for this kind of thing I should never be returned to Parliament. I have only to say that my political life will stand investigation alongside his, or that of any other man on the Opposition side of the House. There are honorable members on this side of the House who know that I did not desire to enter political life at all. I only reluctantly entered it at the last moment. I did not even wish to enter the Federal Parliament. I hope I am not egotistical in saying that I sacrificed a great deal in entering it, and would not have come except for the very earnest solicitations of the Prime Minister.

Mr. REID.—And probably the honorable member would have been in the New South Wales Ministry to-day if he had not come here.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable and learned member for West Sydney went on to say that he wanted to know how it was possible for a man like the honorable member for Parramatta to be in the embraces of the honorable member for Koo-yong and the honorable member for Flinders? All I have to say, in reply to that, is that however much honorable members on this side may differ in political opinion—and I admit that there is a difference; a very decided difference, in political opinions, as between some of my honorable friends and myself—I can take their word where I should decline to take the word of the traducer of last night. At any rate, if they made a statement to me, I should be sure it was a fact. I could not say the same of the honorable and learned member. And the honorable and learned member said that I left the Labour Party for fiscal reasons, whereas he knew, or ought to have known, better than that when he spoke. He knew that there was not a tittle of truth in the whole statement, or he ought to have known, for he was one who was most persistent on the deputation which tried to induce our party to sign the pledge. I shall tell honorable members why I left the Labour Party. I never did leave the Labour Party inside the House; my fault in the eyes of honorable members opposite was that I stuck to the party inside the House. But the party outside the House bundled the whole party over.

Mr. WEBSTER.—And we regret that the honorable member left the party.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I never left the party in the House, and the only complaint was that I would not leave them and go with another party outside. And why would I not go with the party outside? It was because of a pledge which, in my opinion—and which honorable members themselves have admitted since—was not a fair and proper pledge to ask a man to sign. Honorable members who are strongest now in the present Labour Party were most bitter and unrelenting in opposition to the pledge we were asked to sign. I objected to the pledge because I wanted some consideration given to my constituents as well as to myself. I did not believe in going into a caucus and being bound up by that caucus to action which might be in diametric opposition to the wishes and opinions of my constituents. "Oh, but," said the leader of the Opposition, "all we ask the honorable member to do in that case is to resign his seat and go to his constituents again." But does it end there? If it did end there the transaction would be very simple. But if a man dares to differ in opinion from those honorable members, they pursue him relentlessly ever afterwards. They do not allow for differences of opinion; they call a man who dares to differ from them in opinion—as I have been called in this Chamber—a "renegade," a "rat," and all that kind of thing. That is the freedom these honorable members allow a man to think for himself.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—That is not peculiar to any party.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And yet the honorable and learned member says that it is a simple matter of leaving the party and going to one's constituents. If that ended the matter there would not be much objection. But it becomes not a matter of opinion, but a matter of which we have had only too much evidence in this debate from the lips of the ex-Minister of External Affairs—a matter of deep and abiding, bitter, personal rancour. What we wanted to do when the crisis took place was to make our platform broader instead of narrower. We wanted to merge the party into a democratic party—to get into our ranks many men in the House who wanted to join with us. But the Labour Party outside, while we inside wanted to make the platform a little broader—just as the Labour Party in this House are doing now, in some respects—insisted on its being made ten times narrower, and so the difference of opinion took place. It was not a matter of the fiscal question at all, and the honorable member knew that when he said so.

Mr. FISHER.—Is the honorable member referring to 1894?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes. The members of the deputation who had charge of the negotiations with the party outside included the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, the honorable member for Bland, and though I do not know that there were any more members of this House, there were five or six other Labour members. The favorite doctrine of the leader of the Opposition at that time, when he came to discuss the matter inside, was that we should vote together on every occasion, if possible—that the exception should be when we did not vote together—so as to preserve an attitude of solidarity and soldier-like precision. Of course, he and his supporters have got away from that position long ago, and are themselves forming an alliance of their own; and I shall be very much surprised if that alliance is not repudiated by those outside. Now as to the attack on myself and others in connexion with the preference question. Some of the organizations in Sydney have trade records or newspapers which are run by the organizations, at the head of which, acting as secretaries, are the labour members in his House. Week by week those honorable members are “piling” us secretly, and we do not see what is said unless we happen to get hold of one of those trade newspapers. Now I want to send out something after the poison which the honorable and learned member has already sent out about this matter of preference. I say, gain, that we on this side have every reason to be obliged to the leader of the Opposition for his frank statement yesterday, that the only difference between the position of the Government and his own is the difference between the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella and the amendment which the Labour party themselves submitted. The honorable and learned member for Corinella proposed that the matter should be decided by a mere majority, while the Opposition amendment is that there should be a substantial representation of those affected before preference should be given. The amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella was as follows:—

That the following words be added:—“And provided further that no such preference shall be directed to be given unless the application for such preference is, in the opinion of the Court, proved by a majority of those affected by the award who have interests in common with the applicants.”

And the amendment, of which notice was given by the present leader of the Opposition, was as follows:—

Omit the whole proviso, insert—

“The Court, before directing that preference shall be given to the members of an organization, shall be satisfied that the organization substantially represents the industry affected in point of numbers and competence of its members.”

The leader of the Opposition admits, in most unmistakable terms, that no Judge would read his amendment as meaning any other than a majority requirement. Here is what the honorable member said, and I wish to have it recorded in Hansard—

The practice in nearly every case, in all the Arbitration Courts, has been to grant a preference only when the majority, reasonably ascertained, is in favour of such preference.

Mr. McCAY.—The impossible was achieved then.

Mr. SPENCE.—It means the majority of those working.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Darling is wrong. The quotation proceeds—

I am not so foolish as to anticipate that the practice laid down by the Arbitration Courts of New Zealand and New South Wales will be departed from by the Judge appointed to the Federal tribunal. Any one who imagines that the Judge in the Federal Court would lay down a new line of procedure—that he would grant preferences to unions which manifestly represented only a minority of those employed in the industry or the district in respect of which the preference was asked—cannot have paid any attention to the general procedure under legislation of this kind.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable member is afraid of that, and so he wants to “gag” the Judge.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am not at all afraid.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable and learned member for Corinella was.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What I have said proves up to the hilt the soundness of my position. I shall have the greatest pleasure in quoting the leader of the Opposition in the interpretation of our position. He said—

The Government do not desire that preferences shall be granted to minorities.

Nothing could be clearer or more emphatic than that. The Hansard report goes on—

Mr. GROOM.—The amendment contains the words “substantially in numbers.”

Mr. WATSON.—In numbers and competency—not numbers or competency. Both requirements are insisted on. The Court, if it followed the precedents which have been created in New South Wales and New Zealand, would be bound to interpret the words as implying a majority. In New Zealand it has been insisted that a majority, so far as that can be reasonably ascertained, shall be shown to be in favour of the granting of a preference before it can be given.

Mr. McCAY.—That is exactly what my amendment means.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Put the two amendments side by side before any impartial man. For the leader of the Opposition to say that the difference between the amendments makes the Bill worthless to unionists is distinctly wrong, and the honorable member ought to know, if he does not, that what he says is so much dust thrown in the eyes of the unionists of the country—that it is not a fair statement of the position.

Mr. SPENCE.—The unionists take a different view.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I dare say they do, and the reason is, that they have only had the honorable member's version.

Mr. SPENCE.—No, they have not.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They have had the version which the honorable member and other labour members have so industriously driven into them. They have not heard the other version of the matter yet. I shall take care that the opposite view is given to them also.

Mr. WEBSTER.—If they are similar why should the honorable member object to the first amendment?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The first amendment was that moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. McCAY.—And approved of by a majority of the Committee.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That was not the first but the last amendment.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Now I come to the statement of the leader of the Opposition last night in justifying the Socialism of the Labour Party. My position in public life on this matter has always been the same. In common with honorable members who differ from me on this economic question, I have been striving, as I believed, and still believe, honestly to try to do something which shall be for the uplifting and elevation of the working classes. I have, therefore, never taken public exception to their economic theories, but I wish to say now that the more I look into this question of Socialism the more I am convinced that it could not be for the benefit of the workers in particular, and that it could not be for the benefit of the community as a whole.

Mr. FISHER.—Is the honorable member speaking of Socialism as a political science or as an abstract matter?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am speaking of it as a political science—as a political system.

Mr. SPENCE.—Can the honorable member give us some definition of it?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I propose to do so if honorable members will wait. Unfortunately I cannot give honorable members any Australian definition of Socialism, because we cannot get honorable members to bind themselves down to any accepted definition.

Mr. WILSON.—They are "Everything by turns, and nothing long."

Mr. MAHON.—What is the honorable member's leader's definition of it?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Kennedy is the only man I know of in the Labour Party who says, "We are Socialists, and we are going for Socialism all the time."

Mr. REID.—We respect the honorable member for it, too.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The leader of the Opposition confines himself to finesse upon this basic fact of the whole situation. This is what the honorable gentleman said last night. Referring to farmers and their requirements, he said that they asked for reduced grain freights. I should like to know if asking for a reduction of freights is Socialism. Farmers ask for a reduction of freights all over the world. They are asking for that every week in the Old Country, where the railways are not owned by the States.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Through Parliament?

Mr. POYNTON.—If the people as a whole have to meet the deficiency, it is Socialism.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have yet to learn that this can be accounted Socialism.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It depends on one's stand-point entirely.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I admit that.

Mr. SPENCE.—I thought that the honorable member was himself a Socialist.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am very sorry that the honorable member should think so.

Mr. SPENCE.—I still think that the honorable member is a Socialist.

Mr. REID.—Let the honorable member try to induce the honorable member for Parramatta to share his money with him.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Then the honorable gentleman says that the farmers ask for wire netting to enclose their holdings in order to keep out vermin. Why do they do that? If the States cleared their own lands of vermin the farmers would never have to ask for wire netting from the States. It is because the farmers are afflicted with vermin, bred on the uncultivated lands owned by the States, that in sheer self-defence they ask the States to repair the damage due to their neglect.

Mr. McCAY.—They only ask for loans.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If they asked for this assistance altogether as a gift it could not by any possibility be construed to be Socialism. The leader of the Opposition further said that farmers ask for cold storage, starving stock rates, and agricultural colleges, and he claims that all this is Socialism.

Mr. SPENCE.—What else is it? It is done by the community.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I shall tell the honorable member what it is if he will but wait a moment. The leader of the Opposition also said that the farmers ask the State for a grant for shows, and that that is Socialism. I may tell the honorable gentleman what he does not tell the farmers of Victoria, and I hope I shall make very clear the position of those who profess to be Socialists. The leader of the Opposition, if he were honest with the farmers of Victoria and elsewhere would say, "We agree to give you these concessions; we believe in them. But remember that, while we are giving you wire netting to keep vermin off your land, it is only as a temporary expedient. What we aim at in the parliamentary arena is to try to acquire the lands to be owned by the State."

Mr. THOMAS.—Does not the single-taxer desire that?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am putting the position fairly, I hope. The leader of the Opposition should also say to the farmers of Victoria and elsewhere, "While we will help you to export your produce, at the same time we are inaugurating a system and steadily pursuing it, as circumstances permit, which will acquire from you the ownership of your cows, and put them into the hands of the State." That, I think, is a fair statement of the Socialists' position.

Mr. REID.—Make the farmers milkers at so much a day.

Mr. MCCAY.—Surely a cow is one of the "means of production."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Do honorable members opposite deny that that is the Socialists' position? I do not know that I could put it any more fairly than that.

Mr. McDONALD.—"All means of production, distribution, and exchange of wealth" will express it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Here is the exposition of Socialism given in the German Erfurt Programme, given also in the Fabian Essays, and also by Mr. Webb.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member has gone outside Tom Mann now.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do not know whether these authorities will be considered good enough, but I confess that I cannot find any more representative authorities on this question.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member's leader says that he is a Socialist.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What has that to do with the point I am putting? I am not even saying that Socialism is wrong.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The right honorable gentleman will define it for the honorable member. Is it "Yes" or "No" this time?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable and learned member address that question personally to me?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The answer is "No." Is that plain enough?

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member says "No," and his leader says "Yes."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Socialism, according to the authorities to whom I have referred, is the gradual abolition of private property in, and private control of, the instruments and materials of production, land, distribution, trade, loan, capital, and public debts.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—And cows.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—My honorable friend will find that cows are included in that. The honorable member, therefore, need not jibe at cows. Therefore, I say that when the honorable member for Bland puts these things forward as the programme of Socialism he is putting forward what he knows very well to be an attenuated and tentative form of Socialism, and if he honestly told the farmers what the intentions of the socialistic party are, they would see that they are miles in advance of the statement which he made in his speech last night. The criticism of the Prime Minister was a right one. He told the honorable member for Bland that he did not represent the movement in favour of this collective ownership of the means of production, as it was crystallizing outside.

Mr. REID.—A co-operative Commonwealth!

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—My position is this: Decry it though we may, the desire for private gain leads, in my opinion, to private enterprise, and is at the present moment the chief incentive of our people to effort and progress in the industrial arena.

Mr. THOMAS.—Does the honorable member really believe that?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I do. I am afraid that if the strain were lifted off humanity we should lose a great deal of its embellishment, a great deal of its civilization.

Mr. THOMAS.—Then the honorable member knocks Christianity on the head.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is very wide of the mark in saying that. In any case, he is not an authority on the subject.

Mr. THOMAS.—Neither is the honorable member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am merely humbly expressing my own opinion. It seems to me that if we removed the one we should remove the other also. My position differs from that of honorable members opposite in this: I want to apportion as fairly as I can the strain and the effort which go to build up the civilization of to-day, and the results which they accomplish. Honorable gentlemen opposite say, "Merge the individuals, and treat them in the mass." I, on the other hand, wish to preserve the individuality of the nations and of the people to the fullest extent. I admit readily that there are excrescences upon the individualistic system, which are like great warts or wens on the physical body, and my effort is to get rid of them, to purify the individuality of the people as applied to industrial pursuits in every way that I can. But I shall do nothing in the direction of endeavouring to destroy that individuality—to "crib, cabin, and confine it." That I believe would be the inevitable result of the socialistic doctrine. The honorable member for Barrier accuses me of throwing away Christianity. That is a nice thing for an honorable member to say in a House of Parliament. The other evening he said, during a discussion of this subject in a church in the suburbs, that as a system, Socialism has nothing to do with Christianity. But when I tell him that I am opposed to Socialism, he says that I am throwing away Christian principles.

Mr. THOMAS. — No, I did not. The honorable member said that the great motive power of the race was competition.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I said that the element of private gain was the great industrial motive power. I am speaking of the economic system pure and simple. The honorable member must not read into my remarks a meaning which I did not give them. I believe that it is possible to gradually superimpose the moral ideal upon our purely economic systems, and I shall strive as earnestly for that as will my honorable friend. I do not see why there should necessarily be a divorcement between that great power which makes for righteousness, and that other great power by which we supply our human wants. I am earnestly with the honorable member, and will do my best for the uplifting of all who have to toil for their daily bread. It is because I believe that the socialistic system which has been preached from the hilltops would in the end lead to an intolerable tyranny with our present human nature, so that it would of itself break down, that I am not able to support it. It is a popular thing to paint dreams; but these Arcadian projects always tumble down before the logic of facts. There are certain laws sweeping through the universe which will take no account of expedients of this kind, and that nation and those people will live the longest and fare the best—

Mr. HIGGINS.—Who are most greedy!

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No such thing. I have never said anything which leads to that conclusion.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The inference from the honorable member's remarks is that the only safety for humanity is in greed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have said quite the contrary. The sweep of natural laws is a fact to be reckoned with, and all your Parliaments cannot ultimately defeat and overthrow them. If we can work with them, if we can harness and guide them, so that they will move our way, we shall be following the path to industrial peace and permanent prosperity; but if we go in the teeth of them, and attempt to scotch them, we shall be courting disaster, disintegration, and decay.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I do not feel at all at home in these debates; I hate them. I have never liked a debate upon a crisis, and I like this debate least of all. As a rule, I do not speak on these occasions, and I should not speak now, but for the fact that I feel it my duty to do so. I do not think that these discussions are made more agreeable by the perpetual dragging into this Parliament of New South Wales quarrels. I do not blame one party more than another; but if the representatives of New South Wales knew how heartily sick the representatives of the other States are of this perpetual dragging in of New South Wales squabbles of olden times, they would stop it.

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable and learned member should read that lecture to the honorable and learned member for Corio.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I have said that no one party is more to blame than another; but as an outsider I do not think that it adds to the dignity of our debates to have discussions between former leaders of parties in New South Wales as to who was right and who was wrong on some particular occasion. There is something which I feel bound to say at the beginning of my remarks, because I find that there has been some misconception. Personally, I am strongly and intensely in favour of an alliance. I feel that anything which will tend to bring the progressive parties of Australia together is something which I should support, and one of the best means I see for bringing together the progressive parties of Australia is an alliance of this sort. There must be differences between men who think for themselves. When there is a general body of sentiment in favour of legislating for the benefit of the people, those who believe in State interference should be ranged on one side, whilst those who are opposed to it should be arrayed on the other. After a good deal of thought, trouble, and worry, I have come to a conclusion diametrically opposite to that indicated by the honorable member for Parramatta. He is subject to that unfortunate, and, to my mind, miserable, feeling that the only hope for humanity is to be found in following the dictates of greed.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Nothing of the kind; I repudiate that entirely.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member apparently holds that the only way for humanity to be prosperous is to follow the lines of competition and to be submissive to the laws of greed. I stand amazed when I think that the best things which humanity has done have been accomplished, not under the impulse of greed, but under influences operating in the opposite direction. It was not in any spirit of competition that Isaac Newton made his discoveries; it was not in order to gain money that Faraday made his contributions to science, nor was it any such mean motive that impelled John Howard to do as he did. I believe that the honorable member started out on his political career with a desire to help the people, and that that is still his object; but he has unfortunately strayed into the wrong path. I think, with all respect to him, that owing to those associations to which I need not refer, for fear that I should be called to order, he has diverged into a wrong course, and has adopted wrong principles. In justice to my late colleagues, and to the party who supported them so loyally, I feel impelled—without at all violating Cabinet secrets—to tell honorable members my experience of those with whom I was associated in office. The Prime Minister has several times alluded in the most pointed manner to the late Ministry as a caucus-tied Labour Administration. What he means by that, if he means anything, is that the Ministry as an Executive body, a Cabinet responsible to the country, deliberating for the benefit of the country, could not act freely without consulting the labour caucus. Now, if any one is in a position to say whether that is true or false, I think it is myself, because I was the only member of that Administration who was not a member of the caucus. I should have felt the position intolerable if I had been called upon to discuss with my colleagues matters in which I felt that they were not free agents.

Mr. WILKS.—They submitted matters to the caucus before they discussed them in Cabinet.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member is quite wrong. I do not intend to use words similar to those employed by the Prime Minister, but content myself by saying that the honorable member is absolutely wrong. As he knows, I cannot go further into detail, but I may say that there was never a case for discussion in which I did not feel that my colleagues were absolutely free agents—willing, ready, and able to listen to reason, and willing, ready, and able to be bound by it. Whatever may happen hereafter, I should be a coward and a poltroon if, having had that experience, I were not to say that the statements made and repeated, particularly on the platform, by the right honorable gentleman, are absolutely without foundation.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member was very fortunate, because his colleagues always followed him.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The right honorable gentleman is quite wrong. I did not occupy a position similar to that which he filled in Western Australia, where the Parliament followed him abjectly for ten years, and no one dared to say him nay. My relations with the members of the Cabinet extended over only three or four months, and I can testify that there was perfect harmony, and complete independence and freedom of discussion amongst us. I think that this debate will do good in one respect, if in no other. Although it seems to wander a great deal, and although from one point of view there is not very much discussion of principle, still, it is gradually forcing on public attention the nature of the labour pledge; and the more that is emphasized, the better. Those who will not read the pledge have assumed that a labour member is bound by any decision of the caucus. I am free to speak independently upon this subject, and I ask any fair-minded man whether the pledge means what has been urged against it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Has the honorable and learned member signed the pledge?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I have already stated that I have not signed it, and it is because of that fact that I am the more free to speak regarding it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the honorable and learned member has no objection to the pledge, why does he not sign it?

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is my business.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I admit that that is an answer.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I decline to attach to ultimate theories the same amount of importance that I do to matters that are within the range of present action. If I agree with every present purpose of a party I am ready to try to act with it. I do not mind if the members of that party happen to differ from me as to the ultimate goal to be attained. I believe that in practical politics it is ten times more important to see that one agrees with his comrades in their present proposals, rather than that he should assure himself that his ultimate ideas and theirs are upon all fours. The labour pledge, to which I have referred, reads as follows:—

I hereby pledge myself . . . if elected to do my utmost to carry out the principles embodied in the Federal Labour Platform, and on all questions affecting the platform to vote as a majority of the parliamentary party may decide at a duly-constituted caucus meeting.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Who is the judge as to what affects the labour platform?

Mr. HIGGINS.—The labour platform contains, for instance, a plank relating to the "maintenance of a White Australia." That is the first item that catches my eye. No man need sign the platform, of which that is a plank, unless he believes it is a proper thing; but if he signs it, the question of the machinery to be employed in order to effect the object is a mere matter of detail. So far as that plank is concerned, all that a member of the party binds himself to do is to act, as the majority of the caucus may decide, in regard to all questions affecting the maintenance of a White Australia. It is a mere question as to how the object is to be best attained, and a man must be pig-headed if, on a question of machinery, he is not willing to submit his judgment to that of the majority of his comrades. That has to be done in the Army, and in business, and in every other walk of life.

Mr. PAGE.—The right honorable member for Swan had to do that in the Cabinet.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The advantage in the case of the Labour Party is that they have a written as distinct from an unwritten platform, and I think that honorable members will agree that they have been wise in adopting a written platform. So far as I have been able to watch the labour movement, it has been the only safeguard of the party. If they had not had a written platform, and had not compelled their selected candidates to sign it, they would have had a number of false friends, who would have edged round, and said, "We did not mean this or that," and who would have made all sorts of qualifications. As far as I can judge, the Labour Party internally is freer than is the party which is led by the Prime Minister. What do we find? Every one of the New South Wales representatives who came here to vote with the right honorable gentleman still votes with him, and when some of them attempted to speak upon the occasion of the recent crisis, they were not allowed to do so. They were pulled down by the tails of their coats. Upon the other hand, we find the honorable member for Perth differed from the late Administration upon the wisdom or otherwise of making the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill applicable to oversea shipping, and voted against the Government proposal. Upon the question of free-trade versus protection, the members of the Labour Party are at liberty to vote as they choose. Can the same be said of honorable members who, with the Prime Minister, come from New South Wales?

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—It can.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Can it be said of these honorable members who follow the honorable and learned member for Ballarat? They were pledged to fiscalism in that case—

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Does the honorable and learned member mean to say that, individually, those members always voted with their party?

Mr. HIGGINS.—No. I say that the only member from New South Wales who was kicking over the traces was brought into line by the framing of a motion which suited him. I refer to the honorable member for Dalley, who is now Government whip. He could not support the Prime Minister until a motion was framed for which he could vote.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—How often did the "bridge-builders" frame motions?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I have nothing to do with bridge-builders. I say that, if there is a party which is bound so tightly that it cannot move without the permission of its leader, it is the band of twenty-two or twenty-three members who have come into the House with the Prime Minister, as the representatives of New South Wales.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Upon two occasions they saved the Barton Government from defeat on important questions.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am not discussing the doings of the Barton Administration at the present time. The Prime Minister—and I say this with all respect to him—has done a great deal to embitter debate in this House, and in the country. I never knew a more skilful coiner of phrases than he is, and I never knew of any case in which epithets were so virulently coined, with a design that they should sting. I have heard him speak of a body of honorable men as "political puppets." I have heard him say to the members of a Ministry, which consisted chiefly of men who had been wage-earners, when their supporters were addressing the House—"Another day's pay!" That remark was withdrawn, it is true, but only when it was too late. The wasp had put in his sting.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—Has the honorable and learned member never noticed what is said by honorable members opposite?

Mr. HIGGINS.—Nothing was so vulgar, mean, or contemptible as a taunt of that character, thrown across the floor of the House. That sort of thing will never be forgotten. Nothing in the way of retaliation by honorable members upon this side of the Chamber could equal it. I will mention another kind of expression which the Prime Minister thinks will sweeten discussion in this House. I invite honorable members to notice how he concludes his manifesto to the electors of New South Wales. I presume that he thinks he can say to them what he would not say to the people of Australia. He declares—

I want to rescue Australian politics from the grasp of an arrogant minority which seeks to bend national power to selfish ends.

If that statement means anything at all, it means that the Labour Party is endeavouring to use the power of the Australian Government for the selfish ends of its members. If it does not mean that, the Prime Minister should speak more explicitly. When he describes these men as "selfish," I wish to know what becomes of the grand theory advanced by the last speaker that the only motive power of industry is selfishness. As far as I understand, if there be anything at the root of the Labour Party, it is a desire to inculcate unselfishness. They may be right or they may be wrong, but to say that these men, who are as honorable as the Prime Minister himself—although they have not the title of "right" before their names—are simply working for selfish ends, is a grotesque parody upon veracity.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He did not mean it personally.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Then what does his statement mean? I have known clever twisters of phrases, but I have never met the equal of the Prime Minister in that respect.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—He is a perfect wriggler.

Mr. HIGGINS.—The honorable member for Parramatta declared just now that it was characteristic of the Prime Minister to put the best construction upon everything that everybody else did. It was for that reason, I suppose, that he spoke of the members of the late Administration as working for "another day's pay," as being "political puppets"—which means that they can be pulled in any way the strings may be pulled—and as "an arrogant minority working for selfish ends." The Prime Minister, for the purposes of this debate, and of obtaining the vote of the most reactionary party in Australia, has accused the Labour Party and the late Government of being Socialists.

Mr. MAUGER.—What is that?

Mr. HIGGINS. — May I say that it scarcely lies in the mouth of the right honorable gentleman to abuse this thing called Socialism? I have never gone so far in my expressions in regard to Socialism as he has. What did he say recently?

My quarrel is not with the theory of Socialism.

Let honorable members reflect upon the meaning of those words. The Prime Minister acted as chairman of a meeting at the Athenæum Hall at which Mr. Max Hirsch delivered a lecture. In the course of his remarks the right honorable gentleman said—

He admitted that there were socialistic things which were among the best things in Australia to-day. Such were their post and telegraph offices and railways.

I suppose that the control of these Departments by the State will be admitted to be socialistic in character by all honorable members save the honorable member for Parramatta. The Prime Minister affirms that his quarrel is not with the theory of Socialism. That means that he is open to be convinced as to this or that method of improving the condition of the people by means of State initiative. The statement that he has no quarrel with the theory of Socialism was made in one of those speeches in which the right honorable member has sought so unfairly to reflect upon the Labour Party and its friends, and to gather round himself certain anti-progressive sympathies. I trust that he will be fixed to it. It is very hard to pin him down to anything, but at least let us fix him to that assertion. Very few of us have gone so far as he did in making it. The right honorable gentleman went on to say at this meeting that—

He was open to be convinced as to this or that method of improving the condition of the people by means of State initiative.

Let us compare the two statements—that he has no quarrel with the theory of Socialism and that he is open to conviction. Open to conviction by what or by whom? Does he mean that he is open to conviction by votes or by reason? If he means that he is open to conviction by the number of votes he can obtain, I have only to say that a person who can employ language of that sort is the most dangerous kind of politician that Australia could have. He went on to say, in answer to the question, "Why don't you join the Labour Party?" that—

He wanted to be satisfied, in each case, that the change proposed would be a good one.

I have never known even the most extreme member of the Labour Party—and I have watched their doings very closely for a long time—to go further than that. The right honorable gentleman is open to be convinced, but he desires to be convinced that in each case the change proposed would be a good one. Although in this speech he pronounced so strongly in favour of Socialism, the whole tenor of his attack—and it was a bitter attack—on the Labour Party last night was that the members of it were socialistic. In which speech was he really giving us his mind? Is the right honorable gentleman a Doctor Jekyll and a Mr. Hyde? Has he two personalities, so that when speaking in the Athenæum he is socialistic, and when speaking in this Chamber, in an attack on the Labour Party, he is anti-socialistic? He says that Socialism means the—Destruction of private enterprise, destruction of individual liberty.

He said himself that he approved of the Post and Telegraph Department being administered by the State, and also of the railways being administered by the State, and he admits that they are socialistic enterprises.

Mr. WILKS.—He also said that the Railway Commissioners were emblematic of individualism.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am not going to mention everything that the right honorable gentleman has said. It is difficult to pin him down to anything in particular, but here we have a clear statement made by him.

Mr. WILKS.—He said that the railways should be conducted by Railway Commissioners on business lines.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am not going to be diverted by the honorable member from the point with which I am dealing. The Prime Minister approves of the railways and the Post and Telegraph Department being administered by the State, and admits that they are socialistic enterprises. Notwithstanding this admission, he condemned Socialism as being destructive of private enterprise, and destructive of individual liberty. If he meant destructive of private enterprise, so far as private enterprise is injurious to the public, I should be socialistic; if he meant destructive of individual liberty, so far as individual liberty means anarchy or injury to the public interest I, too, should be socialistic. But what is the use of this mere phrasing? Not only is the leader of the Government socialistic in principle according to his own statement, but I have heard the Minister of Defence say, in this Chamber, "I am a collectivist, sir."

Mr. McCAY.—I know what the honorable and learned member is referring to, but he is not quite correct.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am sure that the honorable and learned member will not contradict my statement.

Mr. McCAY.—It is not quite accurate.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I was sitting on the same bench as the honorable and learned member on the occasion in question, and was startled to hear him say, "I am a collectivist, sir." I have never known him publicly to renounce that principle. The main difference that I have been able to discover between the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition is that when the latter is beaten upon a proposal he continues to fight on upon the same lines to attain his object; but when the Prime Minister is beaten he takes up the proposals of the other side and fights for them. Let us take, for instance, the insertion of the provision in the oversea mail contracts that the steamers engaged in the service shall employ only white labour. Let us also take the matter of the six hatters and the fiscal issue. If there was anything which characterized the right honorable gentleman's utterances before the elections it was his aversion from protection, his hatred of the clause in the mail contracts providing for the employment of only white labour, and his hatred also of the prohibition against the introduction of contract labour into Australia. According to the Argus of 10th December last, he said that—

He was not going to have any fiscal peace until he had pulled down the present high duties.

He now whines for fiscal peace. Then, again, on 14th December last, he spoke against the provision for the employment of only white labour on mail steamers and against the way in which the six hatters had been treated. I particularly desire to support this motion, in order to relieve the right honorable gentleman from a very painful position. He is expected, as Minister of External Affairs, to carry out a law of which he disapproves. I do not think that it is fair to place him in such a position; his conscience is too tender to let him rightly administer that law. I listened to-day to the explanation which he made with a show of much indignation, and the sum and substance of it was, "I did not carry out the law with regard to the six potters; it was carried out by the late Minister of External Affairs." If he did not carry out the law he ought to have done, and he must do it. And it is because we do not trust the right honorable gentleman to act against his conscience in this matter that we want to remove him from office. I was very careful to ask the right honorable gentleman on the 3rd September a question as to what he would do in a case like that of the six hatters, and he said explicitly—

If I have the power to alter the Act in a certain direction—

Of course he was referring to the contract provision—

I will do so the moment I discover the fact.

The point is this: Are we safe in allowing a man to administer the Immigration Restriction Act against his own conscience?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He said last night that he was not against the law at all.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I say that he is against the section with regard to contract labour.

Mr. McLEAN.—Does the honorable and learned member think it is safe to trust a free-trader to administer protectionist doctrines in the Customs Department?

Mr. HIGGINS.—I shall leave that question to be answered by the honorable member, who put a similar question with regard to the present Minister of Trade and Customs. I say also that it is not right to allow a Ministry to hold office who deliberately permitted an ill-framed and ill-drafted clause to remain in a Bill when conducting the business of the House. I refer of course to clause 48 of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. The present Ministry will go down to posterity as "the short-lived clause 48 Ministry." The whole of their policy is a proviso to clause 48. They got into office by refusing to allow that clause to be recommitted so as to be amended. It is admitted by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, who is nothing if he is not frank, that that proviso is ill-drafted and difficult of interpretation. That statement is contained in Hansard of the 12th August, page 4233. Although the honorable and learned member admitted that the clause was likely to lead to difficulties of interpretation, he would not allow it to be brought into Committee to be amended.

Mr. WATKINS.—The Prime Minister said the same.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That was the question upon which the recent crisis occurred. I cannot understand why any honorable member should have refused to allow the clause to be recommitted so as to improve it unless there was some other reason. The only reason for refusing to recommit the clause was in order to put out the Ministry.

Mr. WILKS.—The late Prime Minister said that the clause as proposed to be amended was exactly the same as the clause as it previously stood.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Yes, but the Committee were not bound to adopt the amendment tabled by the Government. That amendment might never have been moved. The point is that there was admittedly a faulty clause, which ought to have gone back into Committee so as to be amended. But honorable members opposite were afraid to do that, because—I say it with all respect—they knew that if that were done they could not get the vote of the honorable member for Dalley. Not only that, but the honorable member for Moira, who is a man of practical experience, and knows how these provisions would apply, say, amongst shearers and others, spoke with great thought and care upon the amendment of the present Minister of Defence. He said, as reported on page 2640 of Hansard, that he had looked into the amendment and thought it was unworkable.

Mr. KENNEDY. — I said that I had not looked into it.

Mr. HIGGINS.—No; with all respect, the honorable member said this:—

I have said that I have not studied the amendment proposed by the honorable and learned member for Corinella, but, from what I have heard of it, it would be open to objection, inasmuch as it would make it necessary to obtain the opinion of the majority of the workers in any particular industry.

So far as the matter was vital the honorable member perfectly understood the proposal. He understood that it would mean that it would be necessary to ascertain the opinion of the majority of the workers in any particular industry; but he said—

If people are compelled to go beyond that to find out the absolute number of workers in any particular industry that they may be able to prove to the Court that they have a majority of those employed in the industry behind them, their task would appear to be an almost impossible one.

That is just what we have said right through. It is because we felt that the task would be impossible, and that the proviso would render the Bill a sham, that we said that we would insist upon taking it back into Committee. The point with regard to Ministers—and it has been put in various forms—is that they have no common principle. We sometimes hear of a rope of sand. I cannot find even a rope of sand in the case of the honorable gentlemen upon the Treasury bench.

Mr. TUDOR.—They have no principles.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I will not say that they have no principles, but they have no distinctive principle. They have splendid principles—especially the Prime Minister—only their principles are upon opposite sides, and are exerted upon opposite occasions. There has been a great deal of talk with regard to fiscal peace. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat, in speaking to the electors as Prime Minister, put before them very distinctly the policy of fiscal peace and preferential trade for a White Australia. The Prime Minister complains that he is not allowed to get fiscal peace. What right has he to complain? He was against fiscal peace. He only begins to complain that he has not got fiscal peace when he finds that he is beaten. What happened, so far as I understand it, was this: That the honorable and learned member for Ballarat put before the people of Australia the policy of fiscal peace. The Prime Minister said, "Let us have no fiscal peace; let us fight." Therefore, unfortunately for the repose of this House, and for its chance of doing good work, we had to look to a revival of the Tariff question. A number of members were elected in New South Wales upon issues quite different from those which prevailed in the rest of Australia. The country being, rightly or wrongly, mainly protectionist, sent to Parliament a majority of protectionists. Then when the Prime Minister found that there was a danger of the Tariff being disturbed from the protectionist side he said, "Let us have fiscal peace."

Mr. McLEAN.—A great many of the fiscal peace advocates were free-traders.

Mr. HIGGINS.—That is not so in the case of Victoria, but in the case of New South Wales the vast bulk of the members elected were against fiscal peace, and for what is called free-trade, but what is really anti-protection. The position reminds me of nothing so much as of a little boy flicking a big boy with a whip. When the big boy asks for peace and does not get it, he takes the whip and uses it. Then the small boy begins to whine for peace. So far as I am concerned, I do not feel in any way bound to leave the Tariff as it stands. If I find that injury is being done to any industry by the Tariff, I feel perfectly free to act in the direction which shall seem best for that industry. I am decidedly in favour of fiscal peace; but the difficulty is that the other side would not give fiscal peace. The country had to send protectionists into this Parliament, and that having been done, the House is in a most disordered state in this respect. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly free. If a man will not accept a compromise, I am in no way bound by it. In conclusion, I may say that I do not like these crisis debates; but one of the great objects I have in voting for the motion is to get a dissolution.

Mr. WILKS.—Honorable members over there seem very "struck" on dissolutions.

Mr. HIGGINS.—I am afraid that the honorable member for Dalley will have to look forward to a very early and peaceful dissolution, so far as regards his politics. The three parties in this House are nearly even, and there is a most unstable equilibrium.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—There are five parties.

Mr. HIGGINS.—If this Parliament lasts much longer we shall have five or six parties. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat, in his speech made early this year, said that the system of three parties would not do; but I venture to say, with all kindness and respect, that if he had chosen to accept the position as it was, we could have got on very well. He could have continued to lead the Government, with the support of a consistent and powerful body in the Corner. The honorable and learned member will, I think, bear me out in the statement that I deprecated his making the question of the inclusion of the public servants in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill a vital one. I may be wrong, but I think that from his point of view he was of opinion that the clause, if inserted, would be invalid. But if so, what harm could there be? Why should the clause not have been left in the Bill? At all events, the position is as we find it. The honorable and learned member has been in this Parliament the King-maker—King-maker Deakin. He was able to oust the late Government, and he is able to oust this Government by throwing his weight in the scale. There are no prophets so successful as those who can bring about the fulfilment of their own prophecies—those who arrange the inevitable; and if the honorable and learned member adopts the principle for the rest of this Parliament of always voting against the Government in a crisis, he can show that his prophecies are right. But although the honorable and learned member had not a majority of absolute followers from the beginning of this Parliament, there were a number of men who would have assisted him in any reasonable progressive measures. For my part I feel that the honorable and learned member has the root in him—that he has good, progressive principles, and has always been a friend of progressive legislation. As one who has followed him on previous occasions, I should be only too happy to see him leading, as he ought to lead, a really progressive Ministry. I desire, so far as I can, to have parties rearranged into the progressive party and the retrogressive party—into the party who want to obtain good conditions of life for all—not merely for the workers—and the party who are at the present time timid with regard to State interference. The only thing now is for the electors to determine whom they will have. Let us get a good, healthy whiff from the country over this House of ours; we want fresh air in several respects, but in nothing so much as in our proceedings. What amazes me is that in the very first speech the present Prime Minister made after taking office, he admitted that a speedy dissolution was imperative—that the House could not be carried on without a dissolution. The only excuse for his taking office was that he could carry on the business of the country with this House; yet at the very first chance, when he met the House, he said that the business could not be carried on unless there was an appeal to the people.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON.—That was under certain conditions.

Mr. WATSON.—Unless at the mercy of the Opposition, he could not carry on—that was the Prime Minister's statement.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Most honorable members, I think, have come to the conclusion that there must be a dissolution very soon, and the Prime Minister, in all fairness, ought to hand over the responsibilities of office before the dissolution takes place. The right honorable gentleman obtained office on the representation that he could carry on in the present House, and he has no right to get a dissolution and hold office, and "call the tune" to the country.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The late Government held office without a majority.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We had a majority on the issue on which we got in.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The late Government never had a majority.

Mr. HIGGINS.—We had a majority on the issue on which we got office. What

I say is that it is the duty of the present Prime Minister, who got office on the distinct representation that he was able to carry on in the present House, to put this House into the same position as it was in before he took the responsibilities of office, and let the new Ministry say whether or not there shall be a dissolution.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Who will be the new Ministry?

Mr. HIGGINS.—The right honorable member for Swan is, I think, hardly interjecting fairly. I have not the responsibility of saying who shall be the new Ministry; and the right honorable member, with his ten years' experience in Western Australia, ought to remember that it was not for him to say, nominally, who were to be the Ministry in that State. I only say that we should have a dissolution soon, so that the country may determine whether we are to have a sham Arbitration Bill or a real Arbitration Bill, and whether we are to have a sham White Australia or a real White Australia?

Mr. ROBINSON (Wannon).—I am as glad as is the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne that this motion has been tabled. I think it will do much to declare the position of parties, and clear the political atmosphere. I also agree with the late Prime Minister, the honorable member for Bland, that the issue which will be put before the electors is a clear-cut issue. If I may be permitted to give my statement of that issue, I will say that, on the political side, it is a question of free versus machine politics.

Mr. THOMAS.—I think we have heard that before.

Mr. ROBINSON.—No doubt; and when the honorable member has heard it a thousand times possibly he may understand it. On the industrial side, it will be a question of enterprise and progress versus a Co-operative Commonwealth or Socialism. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne has told us that he believes the motion will result in a dissolution. I think it highly probable that it will, and I, personally, intend to act upon that assumption.

Mr. HIGGINS. — The honorable and learned member had better do so.

Mr. ROBINSON.—For the socialistic party with which the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne is now allied, I should say that no time could be better chosen for the attack which has been made. The members of that party know full well that an election, late in November or early in December, means the disfranchisement of thousands of farmers in the State of Victoria and in the southern part of New South Wales.

Mr. FRAZER.—This is a second edition of the Argus.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I know from personal experience, gained in the last election, that many farmers and their wives were then unable to record their votes because they could not get away from their work at a time when, after passing through seven lean years, they had a good crop to garner. Honorable members who are acquainted with farming districts will know that that statement is correct, and that an election at that time of the year must involve the disfranchisement of many farmers. Nevertheless, I hope that the producers will respond to the call on them, and will do their duty and record their votes, even though it should mean, as I am sure it will, personal loss and inconvenience to them. The members of the late Government have formulated this attack upon the present Prime Minister and his Government, and, so far, the "ragged regiment" in the Opposition corner has not yet expressed its views. We are still waiting for an expression of the views of the corner party, which by interjection we have been told has formed an alliance with the Labour Party on a sound protectionist basis. I believe that before this debate concludes it will be seen that whatever alliance has been formed, it is not quite correct to say that it is on a sound protectionist basis. The honorable member for Bland made a gentle but rather feeble attack upon the present Ministry. He was followed by the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, in an attack which was as venomous and rancorous as the attack by his leader was weak and feeble. I am glad to know that the honorable and learned member for West Sydney did not go unpunished; that while he has made three bitter, malicious speeches in this House, directed mainly against the Prime Minister, from whom he has received many a favour, the honorable member for Parramatta dressed the honorable gentleman down to-day in a manner which I should think has been rarely equalled in any Parliament. After the exposure of the honorable and learned member's tactics and practices, and after the explanation of the Prime Minister to-day, I think there will be a great many members of this House who in future will require proof by affidavit of any statement which the honorable and learned member may see fit to make. While I say this, I must admit that the late Government took office in a dignified and quiet manner. Nothing in their life became them so well as their assumption of office. They assumed office without any unnecessary boasting, and in a courteous and dignified fashion. But their manner of leaving office was very much the reverse. Although my acquaintance with politics has been remarkably short, I have had the privilege, if it can be called a privilege, of seeing four Governments go to their doom, but I have never yet seen a Government go out of office with so much squealing and howling as we have heard from the late Labour Government. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat, I think, summed up the position to a nicety when he declared that the late Ministers were like a lot of little boys who were hauled out of a tart-shop before they were quite full.

Mr. MAUGER. — The honorable and learned member did not say that.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I think that was a very happy expression, because a more undignified exhibition of puling and weeping over the loss of office I never witnessed, nor I think did any other honorable member. What is the principle upon which the late Government were defeated? We were told that it was upon a question of principle—the question of preference to unionists. The actual facts of the case must not be forgotten, and as we are told that a dissolution is impending, I trust I may be permitted to restate them. I was one of those who opposed preference to unionists in any shape or form. I did so because I believed then, as I believe now, that it is wicked and immoral to give the stronger a preference over the weaker, which is what the proposed provision for preference to unionists would do.

Mr. HUME COOK.—No.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Why did the honorable member for Bourke, who now interjects, change his vote on that question?

Mr. HUME COOK.—I did not change my vote.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member changed his vote. He voted, in the first instance, for the amendment moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella. And he then went back upon it without a word of explanation.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I did not change my vote. Why does not the honorable and learned member correct that statement?

Mr. ROBINSON.—The statement is absolutely correct, and the honorable member knows it. The amendment then moved by the honorable and learned member for Corinella was intended to assure the country that preference should be granted only to organizations which comprised the majority employed in a particular trade.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I did not change my vote on that either.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That was a distinctly democratic proposal, because it provided for majority rule. It is a proposal which the present leader of the Opposition has practically indorsed, for, if honorable members will refer to the honorable gentleman's speeches upon the question, they will find on page 4046 of Hansard, that he is reported to have said—

The Government do not desire that preference shall be granted to minorities.

And on page 4047 he is reported to have said—

So far as I have been able to ascertain, the New South Wales Court has never granted preference to a union which did not appear to have a majority within the district to which it was to apply.

That shows how little attention the honorable gentleman could have paid to the doings of the New South Wales Arbitration Court, because nothing could be further from the facts. I have before me a series of letters which have appeared in the Sydney Daily Telegraph, forming a correspondence between certain writers, including Mr. George S. Beeby. Mr. George S. Beeby is a barrister of Sydney, who has been employed by the trade unions, and has appeared in more arbitration cases than all the other solicitors and barristers put together. He almost invariably acts for the trade unions in cases before the Arbitration Court, and in a letter he says —

On looking through the records as closely as time will permit, I find that in no case has preference been refused.

There is, therefore, not a single case on record in New South Wales in which it can be shown that preference has been refused. Four instances are referred to in the correspondence in which preference was given to distinct minorities in a trade. In the case of the Painters and Decorators Association it was shown that the total number of painters on the books of the Association was 356, of which number 87 were unfinancial, leaving 269 financial unionists. The number of men in the trade, as stated by the president of the Painters Association was 1,200. That was the case in which one-fourth of the employés were given a preference over the majority engaged in the trade. Then there was the case which I have quoted in this House before, of the Saddlers' employés, where it was shown that there were forty financial members in the union out of a total of from 1,200 to 1,600 employed in the trade, and these forty were given preference over the great bulk of the employés in the trade.

Mr. REID.—That is the sort of democracy honorable members opposite are fighting for.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That is the sort of democracy they desire, and would like to see brought about. When the honorable member for Bland stated that the New South Wales Court only gave preference to a majority, it is clear, as the records of the Court show, that he was absolutely incorrect.

Mr. WATKINS.—The honorable and learned member would not trust the Court, then?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I desire that in the Bill itself we should direct the Judge to abide by majority rule. The honorable member is not prepared to abide by majority rule; he wishes for minority rule when it favours himself.

Mr. WATKINS.—Why do we not put that provision in every law?

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member for Bland told us in his attack upon the Government that they have no policy for the future. He said that they had a policy prepared, to see them into recess, but that they have no policy for next year and for the future. I think we may spend a few minutes profitably in discussing the policy of the Labour Party for next year, and their socialistic proposals for next session. I think it will be of the greatest interest to the whole community, and particularly to that section of the community which earns its living on the soil. In the first place, the honorable member for Bland attacks the present Prime Minister because that right honorable gentleman adopts a conciliatory attitude towards the States. The honorable gentleman claims that the Federal Government should take up a definite attitude, and go through with their proposals, whether the States like them or not. For instance, on the question of the appointment of a High Commissioner, the honorable gentleman says that the Federal Government should bring in their measure, appoint the High Commissioner straight away, and force the States Governments to retrench, whether it suits them to do so or not. The honorable gentleman did not propose to consult them in any shape or form. The honorable gentleman said that his Government would bring in a measure to provide for old-age pensions, and that he would not consult the States on that question.

Mr. WATSON.—I did not say that.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable gentleman need not be in a hurry; I have his speech before me.

Mr. WATSON.—I did not say that we would not consult the States.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable gentleman said that his Government intended to introduce a measure next session to provide for old-age pensions, whether the States liked it or not. He said that the Navigation Bill would be the first measure introduced next session by his Government, and that then an Old-Age Pensions Bill would be introduced, whether the States liked it or not.

Mr. WATSON.—That is right.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The first question with which we are confronted, in considering a provision for old-age pensions, is: Where is the money to come from? It cannot be got through the Customs, because, as has been stated over and over again, to raise £1,500,000—which I think would be necessary to provide for old-age pensions—£6,000,000 would have to be collected through the Customs.

Mr. TUDOR.—What about direct taxation?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am coming to that. I shall not leave that matter untouched. I can assure the honorable member. The honorable members for Barrier and Yarra have advocated a Federal land tax. The honorable member for Yarra told us last night that he would levy a Federal land tax to provide the money for old-age pensions.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable and learned member is himself a single-taxer.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That is not correct.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable and learned member was at one time. Has he changed his coat?

Mr. ROBINSON.—If it will do honorable members opposite any good, I shall make a declaration here which I have made elsewhere. Having been brought up, as some honorable members who know my circumstances are aware, in a rigid protectionist atmosphere, when I escaped from that atmosphere I naturally went to the other extreme. With years of discretion I have adopted what I believe to be a more reasonable and moderate course. I saw clearly that, under the Federal Constitution, the Customs must be the source of revenue for the Federation, and that direct taxation must be left to the States, and the Federal Government must not impinge upon them in that respect.

Mr. TUDOR.—I suppose the honorable and learned member would like to see that in the Constitution.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I think there is an implied bargain with the States that the Federal Government shall restrict itself to indirect taxation from Customs and Excise for Federal purposes. If ever there was any implied bargain in a contract, I think that bargain is implied in the Federal Constitution.

Mr. TUDOR.—Nothing of the kind.

Mr. ROBINSON.—There can be no doubt that honorable members opposite advocate Federal direct taxation. They desire that there should be a Federal land tax. If we look at the speeches of candidates of the Labour Party at the last election, we shall find direct and definite statements to that effect. For instance, Senator Findley, who was one of the four labour candidates for the Senate at the last election, said—

The time had gone by for playing with the land question. What they wanted was a Federal land tax.

Mr. Robert Solly, who was also a labour candidate for the Senate at the last election, and is now a member of the State Parliament of Victoria, said—

They wanted to tax the whole of the land in the State. The Federal elections were a class fight, and the Labour Party must win, and must dominate everything, because labour produced everything.

Those are clear and definite statements from two candidates selected by the labour organizations, and they show that it is a part of their policy to bring about Federal direct taxation. That is a plank in the policy of the Labour Party for the future. Will it serve to reconcile the producing interests with government by the Labour Party? In connexion with another proposal which has been foreshadowed we find the same desire to attack the States. It is proposed in the first place to override their wishes in regard to the appointment of a High Commissioner. It is proposed by the Labour Party to take away one of their sources of revenue from direct taxation, and in connexion with the proposal for a monopoly of the tobacco industry exactly the same effect is intended. Honorable members must recollect that at the present time three-fourths of the revenue derived from Customs and Excise on tobacco is returnable to the States, whilst if the tobacco business is made a Federal monopoly, not one penny of revenue from this source will be returnable to the States. The members of the Labour Party, therefore, propose to take away an existing source of taxation which the States Governments have in respect of the direct taxation of land, and they also propose to take from the States Governments a great deal of the revenue which they at present receive from indirect taxation in the shape of Customs and Excise duties on tobacco. I should like to know whether the tobacco monopoly is the policy of the alliance on the other side. We were told that it was going to be considered in a few months. The honorable member for Bland told us that his Government would introduce a measure next session to take over the manufacture and sale of tobacco and make it a national monopoly. I ask the honorable and learned member for Indi, as I have asked him before, what is his attitude upon this question? What is the attitude of the "ragged regiment" upon it? Is the fragment of the Protectionist Party which is joined to the Labour Party going to swallow the proposal for a national monopoly in this or in any other trade? It is a matter upon which the people require and deserve enlightenment. There is a great deal more in it than the establishment of a national industry. It means a definite march forward on the road to Socialism. The leader of the Opposition has recently told us that the policy of his party was one step at a time. They are going to monopolize the wholesale trade first, and the retail trade afterwards, and thus gradually nationalize all industries. We therefore desire to know whether the seceding protectionists are in favour of the establishment of a Government monopoly in tobacco.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Is not irrigation a step on the road to agricultural Socialism?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I shall be able to show the honorable member, from an irrefutable source—the organizer paid by these gentlemen to go round the country, Mr. Thomas Mann—that that is not so. If the Commonwealth is going to impose a land tax, and to obtain the profits arising from the nationalization of the tobacco industry, its expenditure will go up by leaps and bounds, and prodigality and extravagance will result. We know what happened in New South Wales after the imposition of the Federal Tariff. There a prodigal Government, which lived solely by the breath of the Labour Party, in two or three years wasted millions of pounds of public money. The coffers of the Treasury were filled by the duties returned by the Federation, and in addition money was recklessly borrowed and extravagantly spent. There was no remission of taxation; but the rate of borrowing which prevailed when the present Prime Minister was in office in that State was doubled or trebled, and the expenditure of the State went up by leaps and bounds. The Government then in power in New South Wales during its whole existence held office at the pleasure of the Labour Party, which could at any moment have stopped the borrowing. The members of the party in this Chamber prate about being opposed to borrowing; but when in New South Wales the Labour Party had power to stop it, no party could have been more regardless of the profligate expenditure of borrowed money.

Mr. WATSON.—The Labour Party in this Parliament is a different party from that in the New South Wales Parliament.

Mr. ROBINSON.—It is the same political party. Its existence is due to the same political organizations, and to the same wire-pulling.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member ought to know a little about wire-pulling.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I have seen some wire pulling on the other side. I saw some of it in connexion with one honorable and gallant member, who challenged me to mortal combat this afternoon. In regard to that matter, if I am allowed the privilege of the challenged party, and have the right to chose the weapons, I shall defend myself against him with a squirt. Were there no wires pulled in connexion with the honorable and learned member's vote upon the question of political unions? The majority of the late Government was reduced to one on that occasion.

Mr. WATSON.—No wires were pulled.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The Government needed all the wire-pulling that could possibly be indulged in then, and we saw Ministers of the Crown openly and flagrantly engaging in that occupation.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The honorable member does not know anything about it.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member ought to be the last to interject. In connexion with the debates upon the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, he made a number of interjections, which showed he was thoroughly in sympathy with the amendment proposed by the present Minister of Defence; but at the last moment he cast his vote against it.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The honorable and learned member has made that statement before, but it is not correct.

Mr. ROBINSON.—It is correct.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The honorable and learned member cannot find any record of it in Hansard.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Another point on which the electors require to be enlightened is the banking policy of the late Government. At page 1284 of Hansard, Mr. Watson is reported to have said—

We intend to introduce during next session a Banking Bill, dealing particularly with the note issue, and containing, certainly, a section on the lines of the Canadian provision, that insists upon 40 per cent. of the cash reserves of the banks being held in Government notes.

That is a most important proposal, and one which we shall be entitled to discuss at the forthcoming election. It is also a subject upon which a great deal of light requires to be thrown. The proposal was that they should be empowered to go to the banks and take from their reserves £8,000,000 in sovereigns and bullion, and put down inconvertible and unrepresentable notes in their place. In the Senate last week, Senator de Largie declared that that was a proper proposal to make.

Mr. HUME COOK. — Has it ever been made anywhere else?

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable member is referring to the precedent of Canada, which has absolutely no application to our circumstances. If he took the trouble to read the statistics showing the amount of banking reserves held in Canada at that time, and the condition of Canadian banking, and considered the possibilities of the Canadian banks holding their gold reserves a few miles away in New York, he would understand that the conditions there and here are totally dissimilar.

Mr. WATKINS. — The banks gladly accepted the Government securities at the time of the banking crisis.

Mr. ROBINSON. — I wish honorable members to consider this position. At the time of the banking crisis in 1893, about £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 was drawn from the banks within a very short time. Many of us know what that meant. It involved the closing of many of the banks and financial institutions, and resulted in the forced realization of many securities, the selling up of many a farmer in the country districts, the bankruptcy of many a storekeeper in the towns, and ruin and disaster all round. Does the honorable member for Bourke suppose that £8,000,000 could be forcibly extracted from the coffers of the banks without bringing about disaster? Does he think that the banks would part with £8,000,000 of coin and take I.O.U.'s in exchange, without a run upon the banks resulting, and bringing disaster in its train? Does he imagine that the bank reserves are kept to look at. Can he not see that this large sum of money is kept in the coffers of the banks because it is absolutely essential for the purpose of carrying on banking and currency operations?

Mr. HUME COOK.—The banks were ready enough to accept the Government I.O.U.'s at the time of the crisis.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am not aware that the Victorian banks received any assistance from the Government at that time.

Mr. WATSON.—They got assistance from the New South Wales banks, which had the Government's I.O.U.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Only to the extent that for a few months their notes were made inconvertible.

Mr. WATSON.—More than that. The honorable and learned member is quite wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON.—In Victoria the banks did not receive any support from the Government, beyond the fact that they were told that they could have a holiday extending over five days.

Mr. HIGGINS.—And they were glad to have it.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The honorable and learned member makes an interjection that is quite worthy of him, because it is so casuistical. The banks did not take advantage of the offer of the Government. The Union Bank, the Bank of Australasia, and the Bank of New South Wales did not want the holiday. They kept their doors open throughout, and told the public that they could go on drawing till they were tired.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Six of the leading banks did take advantage of the holiday.

Mr. ROBINSON.—So far from the offer of the Government conferring any benefit upon the banks, it only increased the public distrust, and accentuated the run that was causing some institutions to totter.

Mr. WATSON.—The banks accepted Government assistance in New South Wales.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The assistance in that case took the form of making the bank notes inconvertible for a few months.

Mr. WATSON.—The Government did more than that. What about the Treasury notes?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Some Treasury notes were put out, and the issue of Treasury notes in the present case is to form the pretext for appropriating £8,000,000 of the bank reserves. The proposal involves a direct and unmitigated spoliation of the banks.

Mr. REID.—The banks already pay for the privilege of issuing notes.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Exactly; they pay a note tax that mops up from 90 per cent. to 95 per cent. of the profits arising from the issue.

Mr. HUME COOK.—That has never been proved.

Mr. ROBINSON.—It has been proved, and the fact could be demonstrated to the honorable member if he had the capacity to understand the statistics upon the question. When money could be obtained at 3 per cent., the banks were paying a note tax of 2 per cent., and, in addition, had to bear all the printing and other incidental expenses. It can be seen, therefore, that their margin of profit was a very small one. Now that money is a little dearer, their profit may be slightly higher. If it be desired to make the banks contribute a little more to the Treasury, the note tax could be increased by 1 per cent. or $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. That would be a straightforward method of dealing, but it would not be fair to go to the banks and demand from them money that belongs to the people of the Commonwealth. The States have a large number of loans to convert very shortly. Within the next six or seven years, loans, amounting to £20,000,000, will mature, and will have to be renewed. What prospect shall we have of a successful conversion of these loans in the markets of the old world if our financial institutions are made the subject of a policy of the kind proposed. Two or three of the large banks have their head offices in London, and we could scarcely expect the financiers of the old world to permit us to renew our indebtedness if we deliberately robbed our banks of their reserves. The renewal of our loans would be practically impossible. The States securities would be depreciated in every shape and form, and the Treasurers would be confronted with enormous difficulties in their endeavours to arrange matters upon a sound footing.

Mr. POYNTON.—Who robbed the widows and orphans of Victoria?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Perhaps the honorable member knows; I do not.

Mr. POYNTON.—It was the financial institutions.

Mr. ROBINSON.—This, then, is the banking policy of the late Administration. I suppose we may gather, from the silence of the "ragged regiment," that they also are prepared to swallow the labour policy in regard to that matter, and to join in an attempt to take £8,000,000 in sovereigns or bullion from the coffers of the banks of the Commonwealth. Any such attempt must necessarily mean increased difficulty to the States Governments if they wish to convert their own loans, whilst on the other hand it must greatly hamper the efforts of the Federal Treasurer to consolidate and convert the States debts. A few days ago I asked a question which I desire to repeat on the present occasion, because it is most important to my constituency, and also to others. I desire to know what is the policy of the alliance in respect to the inclusion or otherwise of the farmers in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill?

Mr. WATSON.—To which alliance does the honorable and learned member refer?

Mr. ROBINSON.—To that which is now endeavouring to dislodge the present Government. When I submitted my amendment in favour of exempting agriculturists from the operation of that Bill, the present leader of the Opposition, who was then Prime Minister, is reported in Hansard, page 1917, to have said—

The Government will oppose the amendment by every means within their power.

They did oppose it in a straightforward way by every means in their power, because they believed, and still believe, that the agricultural industry should be brought within the scope of that measure. They believe in regulating the hours, wages, and the conditions of employment upon farms, just as they do in prescribing them for industries conducted in cities. On the other hand, I see a very wide difference between the huge aggregation of capital, and the employment of a large number of men under one roof in a city industry, and the farming industry, which in the vast majority of cases is a family industry. But there were two or three seceding protectionists who voted with us upon that occasion.

Mr. MAUGER.—"Seceding protectionists?"

Mr. ROBINSON.—Yes. Perhaps if I say seceders from the leader of the Protectionist Party, I shall meet the views of the purist for Melbourne Ports. There were four or five protectionists, or at the very most seven, who voted with us upon that particular amendment. Those honorable members, therefore, constitute only about one-fifth of the alliance party. Under such circumstances, what possible hope is there that the farmers of the Commonwealth will be exempted from the operation of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, should the alliance come into power? We know perfectly well that the honorable member for Bland is not likely to deviate one iota from the policy which he has previously laid down in this respect. I should like to know whether that is not so?

Mr. WATSON.—I shall be replying in a day or two, I suppose.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I should like to know the views of the honorable and learned member for Indi, who was good enough to pair in favour of my amendment—

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable and learned member should manufacture a policy for the Government, not for the Opposition.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I think that I am in a position to sum up for the benefit of the producers, the socialistic policy of the Opposition.

Mr. WATSON.—The producers are always asking for Socialism, so that they ought to be satisfied.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I think that policy may be summed up under four headings. The first is, a Federal land tax; the second, decreased States revenues as the result of the establishment of a Government tobacco monopoly; the third, bank spoliation; and the fourth, the inclusion of farmers within the scope of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. These headings, I think, fairly and accurately represent the policy of the Socialist Partv, because I have already shown that their chosen representatives have advocated Federal land taxation, whilst we know from the honorable member for Bland himself that he is in favour of the establishment of a Government tobacco monopoly, of taking over £8,000,000 worth of reserves from the banks, and of bringing the farmers under the operation of the measure to which I have referred.

Mr. WATKINS.—Do not the farmers believe in a Government Bank?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I shall deal with that matter in a few moments. The programme of the present Administration, when contrasted with that of the Opposition, is good enough for me as a country representative. It is true that there may be points upon which I should prefer the Ministry to act differently, but I have no hesitation in supporting their policy, and I believe that the electors of every country constituency will record their votes in favour of it, as opposed to the policy of the Labour Party. Upon the political side, I enter my emphatic protest against caucus, or machine politics. I do not wish to repeat the two apt quotations which I made on a former occasion from speeches by the honorable member for Bourke and the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. All I desire to say is that one of those gentleman has declared the policy of the labour caucus to be "worthy of Tammany Hall, or Russia," whilst the other has described it as "a fraud." As was pointed out by one of them, the successful candidates of that body are practically nominated by twenty or thirty wire-pullers.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Who pulled the wires in the case of the Wannon election?

Mr. ROBINSON.—I do not know.

Mr. HUME COOK. — I know something about it.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I took it as the greatest compliment in my life when the former representative for Wannon personally waited upon me, and asked me to contest that election. I never felt so proud as when he came to my office and requested me to become a candidate.

Mr. MAUGER.—That was not the only wire which was pulled.

Mr. HUME COOK. — There were better wires than that. Will the honorable and learned member tell us about them?

Mr. ROBINSON.—Even Federal Ministers are not free agents in this House. Looking through that very interesting publication called the Tocsin, a copy of which I endeavour to secure each week, I find a full statement of the labour pledge.

Mr. REID.—The Tocsin! Is that a poison for rabbits?

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is Rough on Rats!

Mr. ROBINSON.—I find this clause in the labour pledge—

No member of the Federal Labour Party shall accept office in the Federal Government except with the consent of a duly constituted caucus meeting.

That is a proviso which, in my opinion, is directly subversive of Ministerial responsibility. It is directly subversive of the policy of responsible government, as we know it to exist in Great Britain and elsewhere, where the Prime Minister selects as his colleagues those who are best fitted to take office. The labour pledge provides that the members of the party shall not take office without the consent of the caucus, and therefore they are bound hand and foot in that respect.

Mr. CULPIN.—That is not correct.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Give us the Reform League pledge.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I have never signed a Reform League pledge, nor have I seen one. Like the honorable member for Bourke, I do not believe in pledges. That was the position which he took up at the last general election, but I do not know what will happen at the next. Judging by a statement that I saw in last week's issue of the Tocsin, he will have to be in favour of pledges. A well known member of the Western Australian Parliament, Mr. Walter James, who was in this Chamber a little time ago, appropriately described the Labour Party platform, by saying that it consisted of 25 per cent. of practical politics, and 75 per cent. of bird lime. The projected alliance is the bird lime which is going to snare the honorable member for Bourke, and one or two others on the Opposition side—

Mr. WEBSTER.—The Government platform consists of 95 per cent. of bird lime, and 5 per cent. of theory.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I must ask my honorable friend, who has been silent during the last few hours, to restrain himself. I think it will be found that the alliance is after all merely bird lime, and that those honorable members who think by resorting to this little game to secure themselves from the opposition of labour candidates will sooner or later be very rudely disturbed. An article which appeared in the issue of the Tocsin—the selected organ, I believe, of the Political Labour Council of Victoria—of 19th May last, when there was a projected coalition between the Labour Party and some honorable members opposite, contained the following statement:—

Although the proffered terms—

Mr. HUME COOK.—That was to be an alliance with the whole Protectionist Party.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Well, I will say the whole party.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The honorable and learned member ought to be accurate.

Mr. ROBINSON.—In this article it was stated that—

Although the proffered terms of coalition can only be surmised, we may safely assume that one condition would be the withdrawal of all opposition to Liberal candidates at the next general election, the self evident effect of which would be to prevent an increase of Labour representation.

That was the surmise which the Tocsin formed as to the terms of the coalition projected in May last. There is a similar proviso in regard to freedom from opposition in the present alliance agreement. The article from which I have quoted went on to state with reference to the Watson Government that—

Their power to promote the nation's interest and advance the people's cause, would be ruinously discounted if associated with Ministers supported by members whose policy differed materially from, even if it did not directly conflict with, that unanimously indorsed by labourites.

In that case the Tocsin opposed the projected coalition or alliance, while in last week's issue of that newspaper, which I unfortunately forgot to bring with me this evening, it was stated in the most definite and unmistakable terms that no alliance was going to prevent the labour leagues, if it was so desired, from opposing those who joined with the party. I also saw a report of a recent meeting, at which the honorable member for Yarra was present, and at which a resolution was carried stating, in effect, that the alliance did not mean that those who joined with the Labour Party for this particular purpose would be protected from a labour attack at the next election.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The honorable and learned member will see when the next elections come round.

Mr. MAUGER.—Surely the honorable and learned member is not worrying about us.

Mr. ROBINSON.—This is the bird lime, and those who are now allying themselves with the Labour Party will have to enter the labour cage and be chained, or their political necks will be wrung without the slightest compunction.

Mr. MAUGER.—Why worry about us? The honorable and learned member should look after himself.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I am not worrying about the honorable member; I am merely showing what is the effect of machine politics. Machine politics must be detrimental in their effect, and I am sure that the honorable member for Melbourne Ports shares that view with me.

Mr. MAUGER.—Do not worry over us.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I object to the industrial part of the Labour Party's programme, because it is a policy of clear and distinct Socialism. In a would-be jocular strain, the honorable member for Bland and the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne have referred to the position of the farmer, saying that he and every one else who asks for Government interference in any shape or form is a Socialist. I propose to disprove that statement in the most conclusive fashion.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable and learned member is modest as usual.

Mr. MAUGER.—He must think that he is in Court.

Mr. ROBINSON.—I have here a quotation from a book entitled The Labour Movement in Both Hemispheres. The author is Mr. Tom Mann, the accredited organizer of the Victorian Political Labour Council and of the Trades Hall.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—A mighty good man.

Mr. REID.—But the Labour Party do not like him to be quoted in this House. He is all right on the Yarra bank.

Mr. FRAZER.—We like to hear of him here better than the right honorable member likes to hear of Mr. Walpole.

Mr. REID.—I do not know him.

Mr. HUGHES.—It does not pay the right honorable gentleman sometimes to know him.

Mr. ROBINSON.—Let me show how clearly and convincingly Mr. Mann deals with this question. He says—

Let there be no mistake. I do not mean vague expressions of a desire to see the worker well cared for, or a willingness to municipalize gas, water, electricity, transit, &c., plus an occasional indorsement of State action in matters formerly confined to private enterprise. All this amounts to very little indeed unless such measures are used as so many steps towards the realization of the collectivist State. By a collectivist State I mean a State wherein there will be no room for any private receiver of rent, interest, or profit—

Mr. MAUGER.—Dr. Clifford says exactly the same thing.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The writer proceeds—where the total work to be done will be rightly apportioned over the total number to do it; and, therefore, a State where all able-bodied persons will be called upon to do a share of work.

Mr. MAUGER. — Charles Kingsley says the same thing.

Mr. McLEAN.—No rent to be paid for 66 Bourke-street.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. I recognise that in a debate of this kind a little extra latitude must be allowed to honorable members. I have allowed that increased latitude throughout the debate, but it seems to me that since the honorable and learned member for Wannon has been addressing the Chair, and on one or two other occasions to-day, the liberty to interject has been abused. Honorable members interject again and again, and several have been interjecting at the one time, thus rendering it almost impossible for the honorable and learned member who has been addressing the Chair to give expression to his opinions. I ask honorable members in the first place to restrain themselves, and if for the moment they forget to do so, when I call the House to order, that immediate observance of the Standing Orders which is necessary must be rendered, otherwise I shall be driven to the very unpleasant duty of naming honorable members.

Mr. ROBINSON. — Mr. Tom Mann gives a quotation from the Fabian Essays to make his meaning absolutely clear, and it absolutely touches the point that we are now debating—

Although Socialism involves State control, State control does not imply Socialism—at least in any modern meaning of the term. It is not so much to the thing which the State does as to the end for which it does it that we must look before we can decide whether it is a Socialist State or not. Socialism is the common holding of the means of production and exchange, and the holding of them for the equal benefit of all.

“Equal benefit of all”—of the skilful and the unskilful, of the industrious and the slothful. In the Tocsin of the 4th February last, Mr. Tom Mann published a signed article, in which he said—

The fight will be for labour all over the State; the goal, a “co-operative Commonwealth,” i.e., a Socialist State. There must be no time wasted over those who “are as good as labour men,” and the labour man who is not a collectivist had better be well advised and hurry up and learn his lesson correctly, as in a short time there will be no room in the Victorian Labour Party for any one unable to appreciate, indorse, and work for what is already known, and in every other country declared to be the workers’ hope, viz., Socialism, full fledged without equivocation, or deviation or minimizing from what has been clearly and definitely avowed by the more intelligent of the workers of the world any time this twenty years.

There is the doctrine of that party—a doctrine of straight-out Socialism, a Socialism which seeks to take over every industry in the Commonwealth, and to apportion the returns from those industries equally among all sections of the community.

Mr. TUDOR.—That doctrine was preached 1900 years ago.

Mr. KING O’MALLEY.—2,000 years ago.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am sorry to have to name the honorable member for Darwin and the honorable member for Yarra, both having transgressed within a very few minutes the rule which I laid down just now. I hope that the breach of the rule will not be repeated.

Mr. ROBINSON.—That proves conclusively out of the mouths of the Socialists themselves that they know the difference between State control or State interference in various matters, and a socialistic State. The Socialists want to take over the whole of the industries of the Commonwealth of every shape and form and apportion the results from those industries equally between all sections of the people. How do they propose to attain that result? My esteemed leader quoted last night from the Brisbane Worker. It was a very effective quotation, but there was another portion of that same paper, which, I think, he might have quoted, and if he will pardon me, I will do so. It is this:—

In the political manifesto formulated by the general council of the A.L.F. in 1890 it is declared “That the present industrial system, commonly called the competitive system, is destructive, pernicious, and altogether evil, and must be replaced by a social system which will not leave it to the power of one man to take advantage of the necessities or disabilities of another, and which will provide for all workers opportunity to avail themselves of the bounties of nature, and to partake fully of the fruits of civilization, and to receive the full benefit of their share of the common toil.” That declaration still points the way to labour’s goal . . . The ballot is in our hands . . . Extend the functions of collective effort, State and municipal; narrow the domain of private enterprise and individual greed. By leaps and bounds, if possible, little by little, if it must be so, but somehow—all the time. Taking all we can for the people, and giving as little as we can—that is how the co-operative Commonwealth will finally be brought to pass.

Taking all and giving as little as possible—paying as little as possible for what a man has justly acquired ! Then it goes on to say—and I would especially like to bring this passage under the notice of honorable members—

Unless, indeed, the robbers, made desperate by threatened dispossession, should provoke the sterner courses.

That is a threat of this party, that if those who are already in possession of wealth, by legal and moral means, should resort to other methods of resistance, repressive action is to be taken against them. Therefore I contend that there is between us a clear-cut issue, which an honorable member upon this side of the House can accept with a light heart. It is an issue which sets us against a socialistic State, established by spoliation in every shape and form, a direct attack by spoliation on the banks, a repression of State activities, with possibly an impoverishment of the States by taking away from them some of the sources of taxation which they now possess, and a bringing of the great producing interests—which have to face the competition of the world—under the hard and fast rule of an Arbitration Court. I say again that that issue is, to my mind, clear-cut, and it is an issue which I, for one, shall have no hesitation in facing. If we are to have an election, as has been promised, let us see that this question is put fully and clearly before the people. Let not my honorable friends on the Opposition benches flinch from their proposals. Let them not flinch from proposing a Federal land tax, from taking £8,000,000 of money from the banks, from bringing the farmers into the Arbitration Court, from depriving the States of the revenue from the tobacco trade. Those four proposals alone are good enough for us to work on, and when we see that these particular proposals are only steps in the direction of a co-operative Commonwealth, or socialistic State, I do not think we have anything to fear from our electors. On that matter, I should like to read a remark which was made by the honorable member for Bland. Honorable members will recollect that we had a May Day demonstration in Victoria, and that certain resolutions were passed. The movers and supporters of those resolutions went to the honorable member for Bland, while he was Prime Minister, and presented them to him in the usual way. He made one of his tactful speeches to this deputation, who desired that all the instruments of industry should be owned and controlled by the whole of the people. He said—

We have ticked off certain definite proposals which we have recommended to the people, and each of these, being a step in advance of the last, is always carrying us forward, and clearing the way for still another step.

Clearing the way for yet another step—for that co-operative Commonwealth, that socialistic State, which these gentlemen advocated on May Day, and do advocate on the platform and in the press ! Therefore, the position which I must take up, as one who believes in individualism and enterprise, is clear. And I believe that Australia is one of the brightest examples of what individual effort can do—because without individual effort this country would never have been colonized at all, the pioneers would never have cleared the forests, the farms would never have been laid out, and the cities would never have been built. As one who believes in individual effort, I say that those who agree with me must be in diametrical opposition to the Socialist Party, and its programme, as outlined by its authorized leaders.

MR. HUGHES.—By way of personal explanation, I wish to say that I am informed that in the early part of to-day's sitting the Prime Minister made a personal explanation in reference to the statement which I made last evening in relation to six potters who were employed by a man in Sydney, and who were brought here in contravention of certain of the provisions of the Immigration Restriction Act. I have had an opportunity afforded me by the right honorable gentleman to peruse his remarks, and I notice that he says that he sent word of his intention to make this explanation to me. I can only say that I never received any word from him.

MR. REID.—I left word with two honorable members, who said they would try to find the honorable and learned member. He was not here.

MR. HUGHES.—What I intended to say last night, and what I think I did clearly say was this : I was quoting a statement made by the right honorable gentleman, at a public meeting, regarding the contract section of the Immigration Restriction Act, which, he said, allows a respectable working man from England to be kept on board ship a prisoner on reaching the shores of Australia. He declared that he would take that section out of the Act, if he had the power. I was pointing out that the right honorable gentleman had an opportunity to do this, or something similar to this, immediately on his coming into office, and that as a matter of fact there was now, under this particular section, a prosecution ordered. The right honorable gentleman says that I deliberately made a different statement outside to the press. But if I did, it shows clearly enough that I wanted to be perfectly fair in the matter, because I at once gave all the information in my possession to the press, and it appeared concurrently with the remarks I made in the House.

Mr. REID.—There is a difference between the two statements. It would have been better to have had that information in the same document. Hansard is not the Age.

Mr. HUGHES.—The information I gave appeared to-day in a morning paper, side by side, I presume, with the right honorable gentleman's remarks. I say most emphatically that my statement was clear—the reference was unambiguous. Whether the right honorable gentleman gave instructions to prosecute or not is quite immaterial. The fact was that on the 18th August he came into power, and on the 21st September he said he had not seen the papers. All I have to say is that that is not my fault, but his; he had ample opportunity to see the papers, and to take any steps he pleased to alter or undo anything that had been done. We are to assume that he came into power to restore responsible government; but what the right honorable gentleman does now is to say that I did this, and that therefore he takes no responsibility. I think that under the circumstances, his explanation does not affect the situation at all, because he very well knows that, though he is endeavouring to show that it was I, and not he, who took action, he, as Minister for External Affairs, has now to take the whole responsibility. The whole of the responsibility is on the shoulders of the Government of the day. The right honorable gentleman knows very well that it is possible for him now to give instructions that would cause all this business under the section of the Act to cease. In the circumstances I am very much astonished at the right honorable gentleman taking exception to being saddled with responsibility for his action. He said most deliberately that if he had an opportunity he would take the section out of the Act, and that he would administer the Act in his own way. And now he practically continues the administration of his predecessors, whom he denounced and declared to be dangerous to responsible government, and endeavours to crawl out of his responsibility by saying that he had not seen the papers.

Mr. REID.—I should like to say that I did not complain of the words the honorable and learned member has just quoted, but I complained of the following words which are in Hansard, and which he has corrected:—

The Prime Minister has declared himself against the policy of a White Australia. But I ask him what he is going to do, not in the matter of the six hatters, but in the matter of six potters, whom he is now prosecuting in Sydney.

I also wish to direct attention to the words—

... under the régime of the right honorable gentleman, instructions have been given to the Solicitor-General of New South Wales to file against the man who brought them here an information. . . .

That is referring to an order given by the honorable and learned member himself. Further—

Yet the right honorable gentleman now proposes to deport these six unfortunate potters—at any rate—

here is a slight recovery—

that could be done under this section—and to imprison the unfortunate man who brought them here—to paralyze his industry, and drive out our own flesh and blood.

The honorable and learned member's own action.

Mr. HUGHES.—Undoubtedly; an action which the right honorable gentleman indorses.

Mr. REID.—Then further, there are the words—

The right honorable gentleman is pledged on this question. "If I have an opportunity," he said, "I will strike this iniquitous section out of the Act," and the first thing he does, when he has the opportunity, is to give instructions for a prosecution under it.

That is not true.

Mr. HUGHES.—It is true.

Mr. REID.—What?

Mr. HUGHES.—Did not the right honorable gentleman indorse what I had done?

Mr. REID.—I shall leave the matter at that; the words are sufficient for the public.

... and the first thing he does, when he has the opportunity, is to give instructions for a prosecution under it.

I want to add the following, which the honorable and learned member is reported in Hansard to have said:—

The right honorable gentleman not only gives orders for a prosecution under the Act, but he says, "I am now with men who believe in this Act, and I am not going to say one word against it any more."

Does the honorable and learned member see that he represents me as having given orders for a prosecution under the Act? The honorable and learned member knows what orders for a prosecution are. May I suggest that the honorable and learned member corrected the report in Hansard, in order to make it say that I prosecuted? I have the correction of the honorable and learned member. I could not see the proof until the honorable and learned member had corrected it; but as in type at first it read:—

But I ask him what he is going to do, not in the matter of the six hatters, but in the matter of six potters, against whom he is now levying an indictment in Sydney.

The honorable and learned member took out the words "against" and "levying an indictment," and put in the word "prosecuting."

Mr. SPEAKER.—I shall read standing order 60, which governs the matter of a personal explanation. It is as follows:—

A member who has spoken to a question may again be heard, to explain himself in regard to some material part of his speech which has been misquoted or misunderstood, but shall not introduce any new matter, or interrupt any member in possession of the chair, and no debatable matter shall be brought forward or debate arise upon such explanation.

It would be quite impossible for me, under that standing order, to allow a debate to arise on the question. Whether the remarks which the right honorable the Prime Minister has made are in the nature of a debate I am not quite sure; I am not certain they are not. But whether they are or not, I am certain that any further remarks, either by the honorable and learned member for West Sydney or any other honorable member, on the question would be in the nature of a debate, and therefore I cannot permit further remarks to be made.

Mr. WATSON.—May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that you very properly allowed the Prime Minister to explain a second time, and if the honorable and learned member for West Sydney desires to make any further explanation in regard to the statement just made by the Prime Minister it would be only proper to allow him to do so.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am quite sure the Standing Orders would support me in permitting what is fair, but I point out that now each honorable member has had two opportunities to make a statement. The honorable and learned member for West Sydney made a statement yesterday, and another this evening; and the Prime Minister made a statement shortly after half-past two o'clock, and has now added some words to that. So that if I prevent any further debate, as the standing order requires me to do at this present stage, I shall not have dealt unfairly with either honorable member.

Mr. HUGHES.—I only wish to make a reference to the statement by the Prime Minister that I altered the unrevised proof by striking out the words "levying an indictment" and inserting "prosecuting." I do not deny that I did so; but I ask the right honorable gentleman, as a lawyer, whether the alteration makes any real difference. I merely wish to say that in my opinion the alteration makes no difference—that the gravamen of the whole question is whether he is responsible for the prosecution or indictment or not. Under the circumstances I can say no more.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth).—I rise to take part in this debate with a feeling, which I dare say is shared by many honorable members, that our methods of government are not by any means an unqualified success. Apart altogether from the regrettable bitterness which is now being introduced into our parliamentary debates, for the first time in the history of the Commonwealth, I think the fact that we shall shortly have had three Governments displaced in the course of a few months is an achievement of which none of us are in the least degree proud. It seems to indicate that, after all, this system of party government is very short of an ideal one, and I believe that the people of the Commonwealth have reason to cast about for some definite improvement. I have given some consideration to this aspect of the question, and have come to the conclusion that reform is very urgently needed. The most practical and advantageous reform would be to adopt the system of electing our Ministries. I know that to suggest the adoption of such a system to the old parliamentary hands, is to have it pooh-poohed as impracticable, as leading to all sorts of intrigues, and as open to criticism in many other respects. But it is no new thing. It has been in operation in Switzerland for some considerable time, and I believe that it could with advantage be adopted in Australia. We adopt that system in the selection of our Speaker, and I feel sure that, if we used it in connexion with the selection of our Ministers, we should obtain equally good results. In making Ministers responsible for administration, and the Parliament as a whole responsible for policy, we should be adopting a system which would lead to the expedition of public business, and would do away with a good many of the objectionable features of the present method of Government. In connexion with this debate, I find myself in a very unpleasant position. I have the conviction that what is regarded as a minor issue, is more important than the general question which we are debating, and, to my mind, the minor issue involves the progress of the movement to which I belong. In discussing this matter, I am in antagonism to the majority of the members of my party, which is at all times an unpleasant situation, and I feel the position very keenly, because on every other occasion I have been able to act harmoniously with the majority. It is only because the particular matter at issue between us appears to me to be so very important that I am obliged to deal with it to-night as incidental to the larger question which we are discussing. It is, of course, well enough known that I have taken up a definite attitude on the question as to whether the Labour Party should or should not enter into an alliance with some other party, and, as generally follows when one who is in the minority takes up such an attitude, all sorts of objectionable and despicable reasons have been assigned for my action. It has been said that I am a disappointed office-seeker, and that I am a free-trader first and a labour man afterwards; hence my attitude on this matter. So far as the first charge is concerned, I do not intend to traverse it. I am satisfied to leave a contemptible slander of that kind to be dealt with by members of this House, and especially by those who have been longest associated with me. Although an insinuation of that kind is sometimes very useful to close the mouth of a guilty person or of a coward, I am determined, in spite of it, to perform to-night a duty which I feel I owe to my electors and to the labour voters throughout the Commonwealth. I feel confident that every member of the party with which I have had the honour to be associated since the inception of Federation will give the lie to the charge that I am a free-trader first and a labour man afterwards. No member of that party has more anxiously endeavoured to place the fiscal issue in its true relation to labour politics than I have, and I think that before I proceed much further I shall be able to show that I am still true to the position which I have hitherto occupied in relation to that much-vexed question which has caused so much trouble in the labour movement, and which we are now beginning to get past. I am glad to say that I do not stand alone in connexion with this particular matter. Protectionists and free-traders alike have united to do their best to oppose the so-called alliance. It has, therefore, nothing to do with the fiscal issue. A little while ago I felt obliged to enter my protest against the action of the party, and I shall read it now as an indication of the attitude which I took up, and also as giving the basis of my objections to the alliance:—

Melbourne, 10th September, 1904.

To the Hon. Secretary, Federal Labour Party.

Dear Sir,

As I shall be unable to be present at the meeting on Wednesday, I desire to enter my protest in writing, against the alliance which has been entered into with a section of so-called Liberals.

A few weeks ago, our party carried unanimously a refusal to entertain an alliance of a similar kind. None of the majority of the Labour Party, who have since voted for the present alliance, have shown any justification for this remarkable change of front.

As one of the minority, I contend that no majority, however large, has any right or power to force upon a single dissident such a serious innovation, for which no authority exists either in the platform or in any resolutions of Conference.

In any case, such a new departure in policy should not have been made until the labour organizations and labour electors of the Commonwealth had been placed in possession of the proposals, and had been given reasonable time to consider them.

It has been a very general conviction, even outside labour ranks, that our movement contained within itself elements of popularity which, in conjunction with the democratic Federal Constitution, assured ultimate success. We have already arrived within easy reach of a straight out labour majority, and the movement should not at this juncture have been practically placed in the hands of a few outsiders, some of whom have been amongst the bitterest critics and traducers of labour men and labour methods.

Therefore, holding, as I do, that the action of the majority of the Federal Labour Party in entering into this alliance is hasty, unauthorized, and contrary to the interests of the labour movement, I entirely repudiate the said action, and refuse allegiance to the Liberal-Labour alliance, or any section of it as such.

Finally, as the affairs of labour, in connexion with Federal politics have reached a stage when further public silence would only facilitate the ruin of the movement, I propose to publish this protest, and also hold myself free to take any further action which the interests of the labour movement may require.

Mr. JOHNSON.—A proper and independent stand to take.

Mr. REID.—At any rate it throws a great deal of daylight upon the subject.

Mr. FOWLER.—I may be charged with playing into the hands of my political opponents. Necessarily I must abide by such a charge; but I feel sure that those who have the interests of the labour movement at heart will acquit me of any such intention, and will recognise with me the necessity for plain speaking at a serious crisis like the present.

Mr. JOHNSON.—Hear, hear. We can appreciate honesty on any side.

Mr. FOWLER.—I feel sure that in doing this I am performing a duty which I owe to the labour movement, and as I have already indicated, I intend to conscientiously carry out the policy which I have deliberately adopted, and by every means in my power prevent even the appearance of an alliance which, I am sure, is fraught with no good to the movement in which I am interested. As regards the charge that I am a free-trader first, and a labour man afterwards, I have yet another indication to show that the charge is false. The honorable and learned member for Indi has placed on the business paper a notice of motion proposing the appointment of a Commission to investigate the fiscal issue. I am willing to vote for that motion, and I go even further. I tell the honorable and learned member, the House, and the country, that if the investigations of the Commission show that any particular trade is not parasitical, that it is not living on others, and that the workers in it are being unduly exploited by outside competition, and particularly by cheap labour, I shall concede to it and to them the utmost protection required.

Mr. PAGE.—Will the Prime Minister in-dorse that?

Mr. REID.—I think that the honorable member for Perth will exercise his judgment wisely on the facts, and I, like him, shall look at the facts.

Mr. FOWLER.—I think that I have shown conclusively that the fiscal issue plays no part in my objection to the proposed alliance.

Mr. REID.—Has the honorable member pledged himself to a revision of the Tariff in a protectionist sense, before the Commission is appointed?

Mr. FOWLER.—Certainly not. I have pledged myself to a very definite line of action, and I am prepared to carry out that pledge. I have mentioned the matter as proof of my bona fides in connexion with my objection to an alliance which appears to me to be contrary to both the policy and the principles of the labour movement, and especially of the Federal labour movement. I am willing enough to admit that in connexion with State politics, alliances of the kind suggested may be necessary, and even desirable. In some of the States the labour movement is confronted with what are at present insurmountable obstacles, and as the movement must progress, if it cannot get over the obstacles, it is perfectly legitimate and proper to go round them. If the members of a State Labour Party find others, like themselves, anxious to get round a particular obstacle which they cannot surmount, I think that they will be acting wisely in uniting their forces, so that each may arrive at their common goal, and, having got there, proceed on their several ways. But in Federal politics there is no need for any alliance of the kind. We have an absolutely democratic franchise, and a Constitution which, if not absolutely democratic, at least gives us two Houses which are thoroughly amenable to popular influence. With those conditions we have the entire basis of any action which a Labour Party ought to take. We are, under these circumstances, in a position to win our way rapidly, so long as we adhere strictly to our principles. I take it that even at the present time we are well within reach of that state of affairs which has been so anxiously hoped for and worked for—a straight-out labour majority in the Federal Parliament. It appears to me nothing short of fatuousness for the party to suddenly swerve at this particular juncture from the well defined policy, enunciated time and again by the leading members of the party in this House, and in another place, that there should be no alliance. It is to me incomprehensible that in view of those statements, which have been repeatedly made, and in view of the success which we all hope to attain within a very short space of time, we should join hands with a few gentlemen who, however amiable, are by no means going our way. So far as the motion is concerned I am quite at one with the honorable member for Bland, in my desire to fight Conservatism. I have always opposed Conservatism, and from the time I was able to form anything like an opinion upon political matters my mental trend has been in the direction of Socialism. I am not afraid of the anti-socialistic agitation. On the very first platform I occupied, when I entered upon the Federal campaign, I avowed myself a Socialist, and I have never concealed the fact that I believe in Socialism. On the other hand, I have done all in my power to advance that movement, which, I believe, makes for the betterment and happiness of mankind in general.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What is the honorable member's particular brand of Socialism?

Mr. FOWLER.—I can readily see that it is something different from that of the honorable member, which has been so much refined away that a microscope would have to be used to discover it. In Western Australia we are not afraid of Socialism. Even the right honorable member for Swan, who, in theory, is violently opposed to Socialism, is, like many other good men, better than his words, and has been a zealous worker in the cause, with the very happiest results to the State. Take, for instance, the Coolgardie waterworks scheme, which forms a notable instance of the success of Socialism, and redounds to the honour and credit of the right honorable gentleman. The success which has attended that undertaking has caused a later Premier of Western Australia to emulate the right honorable gentleman in giving the State still further instalments of Socialism. We now have State mining batteries and a State hotel, and I believe that it is intended to increase the number of hotels. Both the batteries and the hotel have been conducted with unqualified success.

Mr. REID.—That is a better kind of Socialism. I can understand that hotel—equal shares in the cellar.

Mr. FOWLER.—The Prime Minister was, I think, particularly unfortunate in the remark he made a few nights ago with regard to certain kinds of Socialism. He said that he believed in Socialism that was applied in a business-like way. There is no such thing as genuine Socialism that is not applied in that manner. No wild, chimerical proposition can easily be branded as a socialistic scheme. As a matter of fact, Socialism means the bringing down of a workable proposal to a definite business-like basis. We have advanced far beyond the region of Utopianism, and Socialism, if anything, is eminently practicable. If any so-called socialistic scheme could not succeed in a business-like fashion, I am certain that most believers in the principle would drop it. Let me refer to a most striking instance of the application of the principle of Socialism, in connexion with municipal institutions. It is in the domain of municipal action that Socialism—at least in English-speaking communities—has achieved its greatest degree of success. I can remember that, when I was a young man in Glasgow, every now and then there was an outbreak of indignation in connexion with the way the tramway system was being conducted. The employes were worked for brutally long hours, they received shamefully low wages, the public were badly served, and apparently the only people who derived any benefit were the shareholders in the company. At last the Glasgow municipality took over the system. Within the first six months they reduced the working hours of the employes very considerably, and increased their pay; they reduced the fares by exactly one-half, and at the end of the six months they had several thousands of pounds to the good, which went into the public Treasury. From that day on to the present time, the system has been conferring greater advantages on the public, and has been contributing more largely to the municipal treasury. I think that at present a clear profit of £80,000 per annum is being made.

Mr. REID.—Does the manager of the trams receive no larger salary than the men who clean out the cars?

Mr. FOWLER.—That tramway system is managed upon business lines, and the right honorable gentleman has not acquired a knowledge of even the A B C of Socialism, if he pretends that the humblest worker and the business manager of a scheme of that kind receive the same remuneration.

Mr. WILKS.—It depends upon the brand of Socialism of which the honorable member is talking.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member might as well talk about a particular brand of private enterprise.

Mr. FOWLER.—Socialistic schemes, in order to confer advantage on the community, must be worked on business lines and ability, and brains must be paid for; and for the right honorable gentleman to talk as he does about Socialism is to altogether mislead the people as to its meaning. I am surprised that he did not devote some attention to the well-worn topics of confiscation and free love. These matters are often hurled in the teeth of Socialists, and although they have been proved to be utterly inapplicable, I suppose that honorable members will continue to drag them forth for some time to come. I have indicated my belief in Socialism. I believe that the labour movement is essentially socialistic, and that it has no meaning if Socialism is not its basis. I welcome the new line of cleavage which is dividing political parties in the Commonwealth. We have, on the one side, those who call themselves individualists, but who are in reality Socialists of a kind—Socialists who believe only in that Socialism that will operate to their own particular benefit, or the advantage of the class to which they belong. The Socialism of those connected with the Labour Party must be applied all round for the common benefit. That is the form of Socialism which I indorse, and for which I believe the labour movement stands. It is because I see this new line of cleavage between the so-called individualists upon the one hand, and the socialists on the other, that I deplore exceedingly the position which has been taken up by a majority of members of the Labour Party. It seems to me that in a very short time the trend of events would have driven into our ranks those who believe with us politically, and would have compelled those who do not believe with us to have joined the ranks of the opposite side. That is a consummation for which I have wished and fought in my own way. It seems to me that a magnificent opportunity has been missed, or almost missed, by the leaders of the labour movement by neglecting to adopt the attitude of welcoming to the ranks of the Labour Party those who are willing to join us, and of saying to those who refuse to do so, "If you are not with us, you must be against us." The door of admission to the labour movement is still wide open, so that anybody who cares to do so may enter. For us to leave our entrenchments, to advance into the open, and to welcome those who will not come to us, leaving our distinctive weapons behind us, is to take a step which I venture to believe is very dangerous to the movement indeed. One inevitable result of the suggested alliance will be to make the Labour Party moderate. I believe that I have been branded in some of the newspapers as a moderate labour member, and with being almost conservative in instincts. But I repudiate emphatically any suggestion that "moderation" ought to be the watchword of the labour movement. When the leaders of that movement are praised for their moderation, the friends of labour will regard them with suspicion. I say, therefore, that those who are charged to a large extent with the responsibility of formulating a policy for the labour movement ought to be very careful indeed when they find themselves commended for their moderation. The labour movement is undoubtedly upon its trial at the present time. Those who ask us to be moderate will never give us a vote. Are those who believe in us as a party which will do honest work for the benefit of the masses likely to praise us for our moderation, when that moderation means leaving them in the slough in which they are wallowing at the present time? Is it not a fact that the great enemy which we have to fight is lack of faith in the bona fides of the labour movement on the part of the masses of the community? Is not the trouble which we frequently experience with our own people a more or less indefinite suspicion that we are merely self-seekers—that we only desire to develop the Labour Party for our own good. If we in our moderation do nothing which will be of any particular advantage to those who send us here, I claim that that suspicion will be justified, and a very short shrift will be given to the labour movement by a majority of the community. We are told by way of justification for this alliance that the Labour Party remains unchanged, that its principles are unaltered, and that there has been no departure from the old position. So far as the distinctive planks of the labour platform are concerned, I say that the hatchet of the trimmer is very much in evidence indeed. I contend that in this respect no parliamentary party has a right to allow any of the planks of the platform which has been formulated by the various organizations in congress to be whittled away in the least degree. They have been carefully considered, they are essentially workable, and when we find significant modifications introduced into them as the basis of this alliance, what can we conclude but that those charged with responsibility have to some extent forgotten the duty which they owe to the electors who sent them here? During the course of a recent speech one honorable member objected that the Government were solid on the Trade Marks Bill. I am very much afraid that this alleged alliance is not even solid upon that measure. I feel sure that there are some members of the alliance who will not be able to see eye for eye with members of the Labour Party upon the very important proposal submitted by Senator Pearce in another place in reference to registering a trade union brand. Similarly, in regard to other matters, very radical alterations indeed have been made. One of the distinctive planks of the labour platform, which I believe every member of the party regards as very important, and one that has the enthusiastic support of every man who votes for a labour representative, is that of old-age pensions. It stands in our platform in that form—"old-age pensions"—no more, no less. Those words are all-sufficient—definite enough for anybody. What is the position when we come to consider the basis of the alliance? There I find that the old-age pensions proposal has something tacked on to it of a very significant character indeed. In the alliance programme it reads—

Old-age pensions on a basis fair and equitable to the several States and to individuals.

I ask any member of the Labour Party what that means. Is there a single member of the party who can explain that addition to the plank as it originally stood?

Mr. FRAZER.—The honorable member does not desire a scheme for old-age pensions upon an inequitable basis?

Mr. FOWLER.—We did not propose to establish an old-age pension scheme upon an inequitable basis, but I say that when qualifying words are introduced in a particular way we must endeavour to discover the reason for their introduction. That reason does not exist within the ranks of the labour movement. It will probably be found to arise from the fear in the minds of our alleged allies that additional taxation will require to be levied to give effect to a proposal of that kind. As a result, it will probably be found to supply an easy hole through which any member of the alliance can crawl who is charged with attempting to saddle a certain portion of the community with taxation which he thinks it ought not to bear. That is the only meaning of it. It has really no meaning whatever to any member of the Labour Party; it has no relevance to any action that we have taken or have proposed to take, and it certainly does not stand in the agreement at the instance of any member of the party. I have no doubt that the honorable and learned member for Indi can give us some explanation of this clause, and I challenge him to indicate to us what is his particular proposal in regard to old-age pensions.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—He is sound.

Mr. FOWLER.—The alteration was not made at the instance of any member of the Labour Party, so that it must have been made at the instigation of our allies; and as the honorable and learned member has taken a leading part in the formulation of these proposals, I take it that it is his duty to intimate to members of the Labour Party, and to labour electors generally, what is meant by this very interesting development of the three words, "old-age pensions," that comprise a plank in the fighting platform of the Federal Labour Party. I come to another distinctive plank of the platform, and that is the "nationalization of monopolies." It is a peculiarly socialistic proposal, which, while receiving some support outside our ranks, is essentially a labour proposition. The honorable member for Boothby has placed on the notice-paper a notice of motion which reads as follows:—

That, in the opinion of this House, a Royal Commission should be at once appointed to inquire into and report upon—

- (1) The present position of the tobacco trade in relation to the production, manufacture, and distribution of tobacco.
- (2) The extent to which it is controlled by a monopolistic combination.
- (3) The best method of regulating that trade, whether by nationalization, or by anti-trust legislation, or otherwise.

It is to be nationalized, if Parliament decides that it is expedient to do so; but the honorable member suggests the regulation of the trade as a possible development of the work of the Royal Commission. A little while ago, in another place, Senator Pearce proposed, and succeeded in carrying, the following motion:—

1. That in the opinion of this Senate, in order to provide the necessary money for the payment of old-age pensions, and for other purposes, the Commonwealth Government should undertake the manufacture and sale of tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes.

2. That the foregoing resolution be referred to the House of Representatives, with a message requesting their concurrence therein.

3. That a Select Committee, consisting of six members of the Senate and the mover, be appointed, with power to sit and confer with a similar number of members of the House of Representatives, to inquire into and report on the best method of carrying the foregoing resolution into effect.

That resolution contains no suggestion that the trade should be regulated. It is a frank proposal that it shall be nationalized, and it was carried in another place. In these circumstances, an honorable member of the Labour Party who comes down to this House with such a motion, as that of which notice has been given by the honorable member for Boothby, takes a distinctively retrogressive step, and one which is not in conformity with our present platform. Then, with regard to the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, I wish to know how far our allies will assist us to put back some of the essential features of the measure that were accidentally omitted while the Labour Government was in power.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The honorable member found out on the recommittal of clause 62 how far they would go.

Mr. FOWLER.—But I wish to know what assistance we are going to receive in this direction from our allies.

Mr. McCAY.—The alliance programme will show the honorable member.

Mr. FOWLER.—These are three important matters upon which I desire some information, but in regard to which no particulars have as yet been supplied. I take it that the labour electors throughout the Commonwealth are entitled to have this information, and in the long run it will either have to be supplied to them in a satisfactory form, or they will treat the alliance in a very unceremonious way. The fact of the matter is, that if the Labour Party, with the assistance of its allies, gains possession of the Treasury bench, we shall be able to hope for only the mildest milk-and-water legislation, such as almost any party could give the country.

Mr. LONSDALE.—But the Labour Party will obtain protection.

Mr. FOWLER.—I have already indicated the position that I shall take up on the fiscal issue, and I do not think it is necessary for me to deal with that interjection. I hold that the labour electors will not gain from this alliance anything that could not be obtained practically from almost any other section of the House. The labour movement was brought into existence, and continues to exist, because it goes further than mere Liberalism has yet suggested in remedying those social and economic evils under which the workers suffer at the present time.

Mr. ISAACS.—The Labour Party will not get from their allies the declared war against labour that has been announced by the other side.

Mr. FOWLER.—Perhaps not, but even a declared war from straight-out opponents is better for the labour movement than is assistance from those who will not enter our ranks, but carefully remain aloof, as if they would be contaminated by association with us.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is not the general opinion of the Labour Party.

Mr. ROBINSON.—It is a very sensible one.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is the general opinion of labour supporters outside.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order!

Mr. FOWLER.—There is another aspect of this agreement to which I take very strong exception. I refer to the promise of immunity from opposition which the Labour Party has given our so-called allies. No parliamentary party, or section of a parliamentary party, has any right to commit labour organizations to a pledge of that kind. I feel sure that the labour organizations will resent it.

Mr. MAUGER.—Most of them have agreed to it.

Mr. FOWLER.—Most of them have not done so, and I feel sure that as soon as they realize the situation, they will protest, even more strongly than they have done. The labour organization, as I have already indicated, is open to any one who chooses to enter it, to secure the benefit of it, to get the enthusiastic assistance of those who support us in the work which we have at heart. But we have gentlemen coming along now, who refuse to enter the movement, who will stand at the next election—or who are expecting that they will stand at the next election—on a liberal platform, but who will gain as many advantages from labour organizations as if they were right within the ranks. I say at once that, if they are expecting any material assistance from the labour organizations on that basis, their expectations are doomed to failure. Our organizations exist for the furtherance of the labour movement, for the increasing of our members within our own ranks, and not for the creation of an outside party, which will only lead to confusion, and will ultimately seriously damage the prospects of the movement. We have always regarded those gentlemen who profess themselves labour men in all respects, except that they decline to take the pledge, as the most dangerous enemies to our movement that we have. We have justification for that attitude in view of the significant denunciations of the labour movement and labour principles when their own particular political interests required them to take that course. But they are no friends who would assist us only in fair weather conditions. We want men who will stick to us when the storm is raging. Who will give us their assistance through difficult and critical situations. And we have found from experience that we cannot depend on any to do that for us, unless they are regularly constituted members of our ranks. I hope it will be understood that, in making those remarks in connexion with our alleged allies, I make no criticism of a good deal of the excellent work they have done. I recognise that, in many respects, their opinions are identical with my own. But the weighty factor in the situation is, as I have already indicated, the fact that they still remain outside the labour movement, and that undoubtedly they have denounced labour methods, labour principles, and labour men in a way that, I think, ought to entitle us to expect some expressions of regret with regard to those statements before they profess to be our friends. We have the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, who is reported in the Melbourne Age as denouncing the Political Labour Council as "not only a failure; it is an absolute fraud."

Mr. MAUGER.—Not the Council. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. FOWLER.—I am surprised that anything which appears in the Age should be repudiated by the honorable member.

Mr. MAUGER.—I denounced the political methods.

Mr. FOWLER.—I shall be glad to hear the honorable member's correction as to what he did say, because a charge of that kind is one that ought to stand in the way of any one who professes to come and join us in this form of alliance. Then, again, we have the honorable member for Bourke referring to the Labour Party in this way—

To have the Labour Party in power would be as bad as letting loose the animals in the Zoological Gardens.

That kind of criticism ought, I think, in common decency, to be repudiated and regretted by those friends of ours who are now so anxious to assist us. I say that in the absence of any repudiation, we must regard them as still holding those criticisms as justified; and if they still hold them, I do not see how it is possible for an alliance of any kind to be patched up on any basis. I am quite sure that so far as this alliance is concerned, the Labour Party will not take it in earnest, except to repudiate it in the most emphatic way possible. I think there is both safety and wisdom in numbers, that in this respect the instincts of the vast majority of the labour electors will lead them right, and that no temporary aberration on the part of any portion of the party will have any influence upon their actions. If I thought that this alliance was likely to be as successful as some of those who have sought it thought it would be, I am not sure that I should not have taken the extreme step of voting against any action that would place the allies on the benches opposite.

Mr. WATKINS.—I am not sure that the honorable member ought not to vote that way now.

Mr. FOWLER.—That is a matter that I have the deciding of for myself. So far as I am concerned, I feel so strongly on this matter that if the labour organizations and the labour electors had not appeared to be sufficiently seized of the importance of the crisis, I should have voted to give them a further opportunity to be acquainted with the circumstances before they were committed irrevocably to the actions of the so-called alliance. But, sir, I believe that a very unpleasant step of that kind on my part is not necessary. I believe that this alliance is a mere pretence and no more—that is has never had any sound basis. The electors are likely to deal with the alliance, if there should be an election, in a way that I am certain will make it impossible for it to exist in the next Parliament. It is not to my mind an arrangement of which any labour man has any reason to be proud. I have exceedingly regretted the alliance, and have opposed it, and will continue to oppose it. In doing that, I believe that I am fulfilling a duty I owe to the electors who sent me here, and to the labour electors of the Commonwealth generally. As I have already said, I am entirely opposed to the coalition which sits on the Treasury bench. I shall vote in support of the motion submitted by the leader of the Opposition, because I have no desire to see the present Government in power any longer than I can help. I am certain that if the labour organizations, and labour electors are true to their own best interests, the result of the election will be a straight-out labour majority in possession of the Treasury bench giving the labour electors of the Commonwealth and the people generally that kind of legislation for which they are hungering, and which they have every reason to expect from this democratic Parliament.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—I had no intention to speak this evening, but the opportunity has come to me, and I must take advantage of it. I realize that the honorable member for Perth at any rate, has given the true history, and true view of the alliance on the other side. I am quite certain that the labour representatives themselves cannot believe that there is absolutely any bond of union between themselves and the party with which they have formed an alliance. One party is trying to make use of the other, and both are acting with the same desires, and from the same motives. Whenever there comes an election it will be shown that men outside connected with the Labour Party will not tolerate the kind of union that has apparently been entered into within this House.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—The electors will indorse the union right enough; do not make any mistake!

Mr. LONSDALE.—I am sure labour men outside will not indorse the union.

Mr. BAMFORD.—The honorable member will regret that, I have no doubt.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I shall take my own course, and let other parties take theirs. The idea of the liberal-protectionists, as they call themselves, going to the country to raise a fiscal agitation is absolutely absurd; and in their hearts they know that to be so. They know that it is only a game they are playing, and that there is no possibility of the Labour Party standing by them in their efforts to re-open the Tariff question.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member will not help the protectionists, at any rate.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I shall not help any coalition to raise the fiscal question. So far as I am concerned, I shall stand by the policy I have always advocated.

Mr. POYNTON.—What is that—land taxation?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I shall stand by the policy of land taxation, but not in the way in which the honorable member would like. I have been, and I am still, a land-taxer, but I have no desire to pile on a land tax without giving some concessions in return. Nobody has ever found me advocating an increase in the burdens of the men on the land; my desire is to decrease those burdens by changing the system of taxation from that at present adopted. As to old-age pensions being provided from a land tax, I am not likely to give an idea of that kind any support, because that would simply mean an increased burden.

Mr. FISHER.—Then the honorable member does not believe in old-age pensions?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do, but not in that form. I read with regret the reports of the speech delivered by the honorable and learned member for West Sydney last night, in which he made charges against the Prime Minister. When I first read the speech I thought there might be some truth in the charges, but to-night we have the honorable and learned member admitting that they are without foundation. It will be admitted by everybody that the honorable and learned member directly pointed to the Prime Minister as being the originator of the prosecution in connexion with the six potters. The words of the honorable and learned member were—

Six potters were brought all the way from England and landed in this country. Although they are here, citizens of our own flesh and blood, bone of our bone, sinew of our sinew, under the régime of the right honorable gentleman, instructions have been given to the Solicitor-General of New South Wales to file against the man who brought them here an information under the section of the Act which did not permit of the six hatters coming in.

There we have a distinct statement that the Prime Minister gave instructions for this information to be filed, though it is well known that it was the honorable and learned member for West Sydney who, as Minister of External Affairs, took that action. Is that honorable or fair? Is that the kind of fighting we should have in this Parliament? If we do fight each other, let the fight be about principles, and let our weapon be truth, not falsehood. The honorable and learned member went on to say that the Prime Minister proposed to deport the six unfortunate potters, though he well knew that no proposal of the kind was ever made by the right honorable gentleman. That is a statement the honorable and learned member cannot back out of, because we have it here in the report of his speech, as corrected by himself. That is the kind of fighting we have had right through on the part of the honorable and learned member for West Sydney, and it certainly cannot be described as honorable. In dealing with this matter, one may be excused for getting rather warm when we remember that the honorable and learned member has received many kindnesses from, and been supported time after time by, the present head of the Government.

Mr. FISHER.—We shall have to find a little Parliament in which the New South Wales representatives may be by themselves.

Mr. LONSDALE.—We do not want a separate Parliament for the New South Wales representatives; all we want is fair play. The honorable and learned member for West Sydney, after making his speech in the House last night, went outside and made a different or modified statement to the Melbourne press; but that was after his original remarks had been telegraphed throughout the States. If the honorable and learned member has any conscience he will realize that he has deliberately done the Prime Minister a wrong. Another reference to the Prime Minister has been introduced in the course of the debate. I do not know why these matters should be brought up, but the Opposition corner is responsible for the one to which I am about to refer. There is no doubt that these references are made for the express purpose of, as far as possible, discrediting the Prime Minister in Victoria and the other States.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — It was the gentle Crouch.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Those who know the honorable and learned member for Corio, and have seen his conduct, pay little attention to him.

Mr. FRAZER.—What has the honorable member against the honorable and learned member for Corio?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not want to say anything in that direction, but every one must have noticed the honorable and learned member make a speech one night, and the next night make a speech exactly opposite—saying he is going to vote in one direction, and the next night voting directly opposite. We have seen that here repeatedly; and everybody who does that kind of thing must be a little bit soft, I think. The charge has been made repeatedly against the present Prime Minister of maladministration of the finances of New South Wales. I was a member of the State Parliament of New South Wales when the alleged maladministration is supposed to have taken place. The Treasurer of the Dibbs Government, in his last financial statement, previous to the defeat in the country of the Government of which he was a member, made use of these words—I make this quotation, because I wish it to be perfectly clear how this difficulty arose—

So far as can now be ascertained, the deficiency is about £1,200,000, and I propose to ask authority to issue Treasury Bills to cover this deficiency.

The whole of this trouble arose out of that deficiency. The statement of the honorable member for Grafton, the Treasurer of the Dibbs Government at that time, must be taken as being correct.

Mr. ISAACS.—Are we really concerned in that matter?

Mr. LONSDALE.—The honorable and learned member for Indi is not concerned in the matter. He is concerned to let the lie go forth, and let the Prime Minister suffer under this imputation. That is what the honorable and learned member is concerned about. Honorable members opposite do not desire that this matter should be spoken of. It should never have been referred to here, and we should never have had anything to do with it, if a member of the honorable and learned gentleman's little party had not brought it up. Now, the honorable and learned member does not desire that the Prime Minister shall be defended. That is the kind of conduct we have from the honorable and learned gentleman. We are not concerned about this matter, I admit, but we are concerned to defend an innocent man, to disclose the truth, and to brand a lie as a lie. In a speech, which I made in the New South Wales Parliament, in dealing with this matter, I made the quotation which I have just now made, and I then said—

“That statement is either true or untrue. If it is true, then the deficiency which the present Colonial Treasurer brings forward exists.”

That was a reference to the deficiency which the present Prime Minister brought forward, and I claimed that if the statement of the Treasurer in the previous Administration was correct, then that deficiency existed, because that honorable gentleman had said so. I went on to say—

If the statement is not true, what must we think of the honorable member for Grafton, who takes a course to establish a book deficiency. . . . When this deficiency was originated, the members of the Opposition party joined issue with the honorable gentleman and pointed out that no such deficiency existed.

When the Bill dealing with the matter was under discussion, the honorable gentleman, who had admitted the deficiency, came down to the House and stated that no such deficiency existed. I then said—

Now we have the same gentleman standing here and saying that no such deficiency existed. Are we to believe the statement they made during this financial debate, or are we to believe the statement they made on previous occasions. I ask them to say which of the two statements is true.

I there referred to the gentlemen who had been quoted as having accused the present Prime Minister of doing this wrong. First of all, they said that the deficiency did exist, and then when the present Prime Minister brought it forward they said that it did not exist, although one would imagine that if there had been a deficiency of £1,200,000 it should not have been difficult to discover it somewhere. These gentlemen were opposed to the present Prime Minister, and when he proposed to do exactly what they had proposed to do themselves—issue Treasury bills to cover the deficiency—they said that the deficiency did not exist, and the whole of the charges against the present Prime Minister arose out of that. What did the right honorable gentleman do? He carried the Bill through the House, and I believe that the present honorable member for Bland, and other members of the Labour Party in the State Parliament, supported him in doing so. We have had some quotations made from the report of the Committee appointed to inquire into this matter; but if honorable members will read the report, they will find that the members of the Committee admit that the present Prime Minister carried on the accounts in conformity with the programme of Parliament.

Mr. WILKS.—In conformity with the law.

Mr. LONSDALE.—In conformity with the law which the State Parliament, the Labour Party assisting, passed with its eyes wide open. The members of with its eyes wide open. The members of the Committee admit that, and whatever may be the conclusions to which they came, honorable members will at once realize that if anything wrong was done, it was the New South Wales Parliament, and not the right honorable member for East Sydney, that was guilty. I may explain that the deficiency to which I have referred, and which was covered by the Treasury bills authorized to be issued, arose from payments for works made in the previous years. The present Prime Minister altered the system of keeping the accounts, so that it should not be possible, in years to come, for the same thing to occur again. He desired that the revenue actually received during the year, should be taken as the revenue for that year, and that the amount actually spent should be considered the actual expenditure for the year. He decided that the public accounts should be kept upon that system, and that in the case of every work not carried out, the amount voted for it should be written off at the close of the financial year, and should be re-voted when necessary. On 30th June, 1895, at the close of the first half-year during which the present Prime Minister was in office, the accounts showed a deficiency of £186,000.

Mr. FISHER.—The Consolidated Revenue Account?

Mr. LONSDALE.—Yes, for the half-year under the old system. The first full year under the cash system was from 1st July, 1895, to 30th June, 1896, and at the close of that year, the New South Wales Auditor-General certified that there was a surplus of £349,000. Before dealing with a new matter, I should like to say that as it is half-past ten o'clock, the Prime Minister might consent to an adjournment of the debate, as I shall not have finished what I desire to say for some time.

Debate adjourned.

Motion (by Mr. REID) proposed—

That the resumption of the debate be an order of the day for to-morrow.

Mr. THOMAS.—If the honorable member for New England will not be too long—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. I have before called the attention of honorable members to the standing order which requires that there should be silence when Mr. Speaker is putting a question. Honorable members will see the importance of observing the standing order, because they may give votes under a misapprehension, unless when a question is put from the Chair they are enabled to hear it distinctly.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

ADJOURNMENT.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

I should like to point out that in the ordinary course of business, certain private business on the paper would to-morrow be taken until 6.30 p.m. I think that it is the general wish of honorable members, in the present state of affairs, that the debate on the motion of the honorable member for Bland should be continued without interruption. I desire to mention that I propose to make the necessary motion, when the House meets to-morrow, to enable the House to take that course. Of course, it can only be done with concurrence.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

House of Representatives.

Thursday, 22 September, 1904.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

POSTPONEMENT OF BUSINESS.

Motion (by Mr. REID) agreed to—

That questions and general business be postponed until after the conclusion of the debate upon the motion of want of confidence in the Government.

PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Report (No. 6) presented by Mr. FOWLER, read by the Clerk, and agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—Yesterday, while the honorable and learned member for Corio was speaking, the Postmaster-General, in reply to an interjection, suggested that I had not the courage, when occupying the office which he now fills, to deal with certain tenders giving preference to local manufacturers over foreign competitors. I do not think that it was right for him to charge me with want of courage in the matter.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member ought to relate what led up to my remark.

Mr. MAHON.—I have said that the Postmaster-General made the suggestion in reply to an interjection.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—An interjection made by the honorable member himself.

Mr. MAHON.—Yes. Surely the Postmaster-General does not expect me to repeat every detail of the proceedings. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House unduly. I find also a very sarcastic reference to me in the policy speech of the Prime Minister.

Mr. REID.—Surely sarcastic references should not be the subject of personal explanations.

Mr. MAHON.—Perhaps the right honorable gentleman will allow me to make my explanation. I do not wish to refer either to him or to the Postmaster-General unnecessarily. This precious pair of political hypocrites may be left to the vengeance of their betrayed and outraged constituents.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I ask the honorable member to withdraw the expression "political hypocrites."

Mr. REID.—Regular Fenian language that.

Mr. PAGE.—Is the Prime Minister in order in calling the honorable member for Coolgardie a Fenian?

Mr. REID.—I said that his language was Fenian language.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the right honorable gentleman used that expression, I ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. REID.—Certainly.

Mr. MAHON.—I desire to apologise if I have said anything unparliamentary; but I sat so long behind the right honorable gentleman when he was on this side of the Chamber that perhaps I am to some extent imitating the bad example which he then set.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member's head is sore all the time. He should never have taken office. It has been too much for him.

Mr. MAHON.—I do not feel sore. I hope that the right honorable gentleman will feel his coming doom as little as I felt mine. However, I should like to proceed with my personal explanation. The Postmaster-General charged me with want of courage in connexion with the matter to which he referred. He, a professing free-trader, has, since he took office, given, in addition to the Tariff protection, as much as 15 per cent. preference to local manufacturers; but in charging me with want of courage in the matter he was evidently in ignorance of a question which I answered in this House as far back as the 13th July. On that date I was asked by the honorable member for Bourke—

Whether fresh tenders are to be called for the supply of telegraph insulators?

Whether, other things being equal, or nearly equal, the Postmaster-General will be prepared to give a preference to the Australian-made insulator?

If he will also be prepared to give a preference under similar conditions to Australian made insulator fittings?

The Department prepared a reply giving an affirmative answer to all three questions; but when the paper came into my possession, I changed the answers, and I replied to No. 1 "Yes," while in reply to Nos. 2 and 3 I said—

The quality and price being equal, I should be prepared to give preference to any article produced in Australia.

Mr. REID.—That is a shady sort of preference. There is not much in that.

Mr. MAHON.—The present Postmaster-General has stated that he is willing to give local manufacturers preference to the extent of 15 per cent. in addition to the Tariff protection.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He only says that he did so in certain instances. He does not say that he is going to do so.

Mr. MAHON.—He has done so. He has given them 15 per cent. preference in addition to the protection which they obtain from the Tariff, which he has pronounced to be a robbery of the people.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Is the honorable member now making a personal explanation?

Mr. MAHON.—I am attempting to unravel the tangle in which these honorable gentlemen have sought to place my action. I would point out further that, when I declined to deal with those tenders, the Government were on the point of going out of office, and I had no opportunity to bring the matter before the Cabinet. Speaking from memory, when I refused to accept tenders giving a preference to local manufacturers, the matter had not been considered by the Cabinet, and there had been no opportunity to place it before my colleagues. In giving the answer which I did, I acted entirely upon my own initiative, and I think, as I said in the beginning, that the charge of want of courage is not merely unfounded, but comes with very bad grace from a gentleman like the Postmaster-General.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie).—Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable member propose to discuss the personal explanation just made by the honorable member for Coolgardie?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I wish to make a personal explanation.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It is quite impossible for me to allow debates to take place upon personal explanations. If I permitted a personal explanation made by one honorable member to be replied to by another, there would be nothing to prevent every member of the House from entering into a debate under the cover of a personal explanation. The honorable member for Macquarie has not yet spoken to the motion of want of confidence, and it will be competent for him when he does so to deal with the matter to which reference has been made by the honorable member for Coolgardie. I do not think that I should allow him to discuss the personal explanation made by the honorable member for Coolgardie. If he wishes to explain anything in regard to which he has been misunderstood, without discussing the personal explanation just made, the House will be pleased to hear him; but I cannot allow anything in the shape of a discussion of the personal explanation made by the honorable member for Coolgardie.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—In regard to the explanation which I think it right to offer, I may state that my honorable friend, in making his explanation just now, omitted to say what led up to and gave reason for my interjection. He interjected something to enable an honorable member who was speaking from that side of the House to cast a reflection upon me, and I then interjected that he had not the courage to give a decision on this very important matter.

Mr. THOMAS.—What decision has the honorable member given?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I will tell the honorable member presently. This matter came under my notice when I entered office, as a legacy left me by the honorable member for Coolgardie. I have not the papers before me, but I think that they were submitted to him on the 6th August, with a recommendation that he should accept certain tenders. The honorable member, not when the motion of censure debate was on, but on the 8th August—

Mr. GROOM.—To what motion of censure debate does the Postmaster-General refer?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I mean the debate on the clause in the Arbitration Bill which the Watson Government took as a censure debate. On the 8th August the honorable member for Coolgardie did not deal with the whole of the tenders, but made a minute to the effect that tenders where no preference is involved, "are approved," leaving the more important matter undealt with.

Mr. MAHON.—Yes; for Cabinet consideration.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member did not say for Cabinet consideration.

Mr. MAHON.—It is not necessary to put down everything. I say it now.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—It is no doubt very convenient to say it now. The honorable gentleman said just now that the reason why the matter was delayed was because a question affecting the fate of the Government was before Parliament. But the action to which I refer was taken on the 8th August; before that matter was before the House.

Mr. WATSON.—That was why he did not bring it before the Cabinet.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why should he bring a matter like that before the Cabinet?

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I did not submit the matter for the approval of the Cabinet in the way suggested by the honorable member for Bland.

Mr. MAHON.—It was brought before the Barton Cabinet.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member has made his explanation. When this matter was submitted to me, I referred the papers back for information as to the practice of the Department at the time that the tenders were invited, and I received a report from my Under-Secretary to the effect that the practice of the Department, under the administration of Senator Drake and the honorable member for Denison, was to give a preference not exceeding 15 per cent.

Mr. PAGE.—But they are both protectionists.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—This decision was communicated by order to the various Deputy Postmasters-General on the 22nd August, 1903.

Mr. THOMAS.—It was a bad thing to do. The honorable member should have done better.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I am not going into that now. When the matter was submitted to me, I wrote this minute—

The practice in force under Ministerial decisions at the time of calling for tenders to be followed.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Hear, hear! The honorable member did the right thing.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I merely carried out the Ministerial decision which was in force at the time when tenders were invited, which had been communicated to the various Deputy Postmasters-General on the 22nd August, 1903, and, I understand, made known to some of the contractors. The honorable member for Bourke, when I was referring to this matter, showed that he had learned all about it, either from the late Postmaster-General or from some one else, because he interjected, "Was not the decision of the Postmaster-General to be considered private and confidential?" The honorable member must have seen the papers, or known all about the matter at the time the decision was given.

Mr. SPEAKER.—It appears to me that these remarks are not of the nature of a personal explanation, but that the honorable member is debating the question. I ask him not to continue his present line of argument.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—I have nothing more to say.

Mr. HIGGINS (Northern Melbourne).—I must crave the indulgence of the House to make a personal explanation of a very different character. In a speech which I delivered yesterday I stated that I was strongly in favour of the alliance between the Liberal and the Labour Parties. In the report of that speech, which appears in the Argus this morning, I find that I am credited with having stated the very opposite at a meeting which was held in the Fitzroy Town Hall at the end of August last. That newspaper says that I warned the Labour Party against "entangling alliances," and placed those words between inverted commas in order to make it appear that they were an accurate extract from my speech. I have merely to say that I did not warn the Labour Party against alliances of any sort. I did not use the expression "entangling alliances." I actually encouraged that party to form an alliance, and in the very fair report of my utterances which appeared in the same newspaper upon the following morning, I am represented as having done so. The exact words of that report are as follow:—

In conclusion, he said an honorable alliance of the Labour Party or any other party would no doubt be suitable, but he warned that party never to allow itself to be incorporated in any other.

In such an extreme case I feel justified in occupying the time of the House to make this explanation.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I also desire to make a brief personal explanation. In referring to the position of members of the Labour Party during the course of my speech yesterday afternoon, I stated that no matter how ardently they might believe either in free-trade or protection, if a majority of the caucus decided against them, they must bow to the will of that majority. At the time I made that statement I was under the impression that it was perfectly correct. Subsequently, however, the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne read a copy of the labour pledge, from which it appears that I was mistaken. As I have no wish to say what is untrue, or intentionally to misstate facts, I avail myself of this early opportunity of making the correction.

WANT OF CONFIDENCE MOTION.

Debate resumed from 21st September (vide page 4822), on motion by Mr. WATSON—

That the present Administration does not possess the confidence of this House.

Mr. LONSDALE (New England).—When I closed my remarks last evening, I had decided not to deal further with the financial matters to which I had directed attention. I wish, however, to recapitulate the position which I then took up in regard to the Prime Minister's financial administration in New South Wales. As honorable members are aware, a charge of maladministration has been levelled against the right honorable gentleman by those newspapers which are opposed to the present coalition Government, and has been repeated in this House. Briefly, I wish to state that, prior to his assumption of the office of Treasurer in New South Wales, Sir John See had declared in his financial statement that there was a deficiency of £1,200,000, which he intended to cover by the issue of Treasury-bills. Shortly afterwards the Dibbs Government went to the country and was defeated, and in consequence of that defeat the present Prime Minister came into power. In his Budget speech the right honorable gentleman also reported that there was a deficiency of £1,200,000, which he intended—like his predecessors—to cover by the issue of Treasury-bills. That operation was carried out by the present Prime Minister, and as a result these charges of maladministration have been made. Formerly it was possible to deceive Parliament and the country as to the actual financial position. The right honorable gentleman, however, initiated a cash system of keeping the public accounts; but, of course, the amounts which had been voted for works in previous years had to be paid. In order that his cash system should receive a fair start, the right honorable gentleman resolved to cover all the payments for previous years by the issue of Treasury-bills. Effect was given to that proposal by the New South Wales Parliament, the members of which knew perfectly well what they were doing. Out of that operation, which was supported by the Labour Party, these charges of maladministration have originated, notwithstanding that everything was done openly and above board. Instead of the right honorable gentleman's administration having been a failure, it was exactly the reverse. As a matter of fact he reduced the taxation of New South Wales by £800,000, and succeeded in carrying on the government of the country without creating a deficiency such as had been the case in previous years. If we look at the revenue derived during his tenure of office we shall see that it was lower than that which had been collected in New South Wales for many years. After the right honorable gentleman vacated office, New South Wales collected a much larger revenue through the Customs, owing to the increased duties imposed by this Parliament. Last year the Government of that State received £2,000,000 more than was collected when the present Prime Minister held office there, and yet it was unable to carry on without a deficit. The right honorable gentleman also very considerably reduced the loan expenditure of New South Wales, which, however, since his retirement from State politics, has again increased. If there is any man to whom New South Wales should feel grateful for having reduced its expenditure and conducted all its operations upon an economical scale, it is the Prime Minister.

Mr. FISHER.—What has Tasmania done that the honorable member should threaten it in this way?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not think that I have said anything about Tasmania; if so, I apologise to that State. I was referring to the charges which have been levelled against the Prime Minister. The honorable member for Wide Bay may be a little facetious if he chooses, but that will not prevent me from saying what I desire to say.

Mr. FRAZER.—Does the honorable member think that it is possible to get away from old political squabbles in New South Wales?

Mr. LONSDALE.—It is only honorable members opposite who wish to revive those squabbles. Certain charges have been made against the Prime Minister, and I have a perfect right to make clear the character of his administration whilst occupying Ministerial office in New South Wales. Those charges have been made merely for the purpose of damaging the Government.

Mr. FRAZER.—Does not the honorable member think that the Prime Minister is capable of defending himself?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I know all the circumstances of the case, and I should be recreant to every principle of honour if I allowed charges of maladministration to be made for which there is not the slightest justification. I have no desire to labour this question. I merely wish to put honorable members in possession of accurate information so that if these charges are repeated it must be with a full knowledge of the facts.

Mr. THOMAS.—Is the honorable member a financial expert?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I am as good a financial expert as is the honorable member, and I hope that he will cease his insane ejaculations. Concerning the explanation which has been made by the honorable member for Coolgardie, I desire to say that I have every sympathy with the position taken up by him. As a free-trader I insist that no preference should be given to any manufacturer. No administrative act should be in the direction of altering the policy of the country. That should be altered by Parliament alone. The position taken up by the honorable member for Coolgardie is the correct one, and I am fair enough to commend him for it. During the course of this debate the statement has been made that the policy of the present Government is a colourless one. From what we have been told it appears that honorable members opposite are the men to save the country. They are going to uplift the masses, better their conditions, and give them larger opportunities for improving themselves. But when we come to analyse their proposals we find that these claims cannot be sustained. They declare that the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill in its present form is a fraud, and should not have been passed by this House. Yet they were prepared to forward that measure to the Senate despite all its alleged blemishes. They were ready to transmit it to the other Chamber without making it what they wished that it should be. What is the difference between the Bill in its present form and that in which honorable members opposite desired it? They were anxious that clause 48 should provide that if any union substantially represented those engaged in a particular industry it should be competent for the President of the Arbitration Court to grant a preference to unionists, whereas the Bill provides that such a preference shall be extended only when a union contains a majority of the workers engaged in the industry directly concerned. The distinction really lies between what constituted a "majority" and "substantial representation."

Mr. POYNTON.—That is not the clause at all.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I may not have quoted the exact provision in the clause, but what I have stated constitutes the sole difference between us. I claim that that difference is a very slight one. The honorable member for Bland admitted that the Court would expect a substantial representation to include a majority, and if that be so, there was no difference in the Bill as sent up to the Senate by the present Ministerial party, and as it would have been sent up by the party which has recently retired from office.

Mr. POYNTON.—If that is so, why did honorable members opposite vote against the proposal of the late Ministry?

Mr. LONSDALE.—Simply because we determined that the reference to a majority should remain in the Bill. In order that the Court might not have any difference of opinion or difficulty in the matter, we proposed to declare in the Bill that there must be a majority in order to secure preference. I say that we were justified in determining that the provision should remain in that form. We are told that honorable members opposite now represent a Liberal Protectionist Alliance. I do not know how they define "Liberalism"; but it sounds strange to me to call men "Liberals" who are prepared to put restrictions upon people in every direction. If honorable members opposite, instead of calling themselves "Liberal Protectionists," were to call themselves "Liberal Restrictionists," I could understand it.

Mr. WATSON.—That is one for some honorable members on the Government side.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not care whom it hits; I stand here in support of the principles I have advocated. If I support the present Ministerial party, it is because I think there is less danger to what I believe to be right to be expected from this side than from honorable members opposite, and because I think we are more likely to get good legislation in the interests of the whole of the people from this side, than from honorable members opposite. I am here to defend my own personal views, and I shall not allow any one to control me in that direction. I should not be surprised if honorable members opposite called themselves "Liberal Restrictionists," although I cannot understand how a "restrictionist" can in any circumstances be called a "Liberal." The terms are opposed to each other. I believe in giving men freedom.

Mr. WATSON.—Is factory legislation restriction?

Mr. LONSDALE.—Yes, it is, to some extent.

Mr. WATSON.—We know that the Liberals in England were in favour of that.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I believe in giving every man the fullest freedom compatible with the freedom of every other man. I refuse to be a party to restricting a man in doing what does no injury to other men. I believe in giving every man the fullest individual freedom it is possible to give him. The nation to which we belong has been developed by following those lines. The honorable member for Perth, in speaking last night referred to Socialism as being the best thing for the community. If I understand the honorable member aright, what he believes in is that public utilities shall be controlled by the public.

Mr. FOWLER.—Hear, hear; that is Socialism.

Mr. LONSDALE.—If that is all the honorable member's Socialism amounts to, I am prepared to go so far with him. I am a Socialist to that extent. I wish to make my position perfectly clear. I believe in public utilities being controlled by the public. And I believe that as strongly as does any honorable member of this House. But I do not believe in the tobacco industry being controlled by the public.

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member is not a smoker.

Mr. LONSDALE.—At all events, I am not a Socialist of that brand. I believe in the Melbourne trams belonging to the Melbourne people, if honorable members please. But the honorable member for Bland, speaking at Wagga, and also in this House, I will not say misrepresented, but did not put this matter quite correctly.

Mr. WATSON.—I believe I put it quite correctly. I saw the honorable member's letter, and it was absolutely incorrect.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I propose to put the case as I have it. In order to show the difference between public control and Socialism, the honorable member made the statement that the fare on the Melbourne trams was 3d., whilst the fare on the Sydney trams was 1d. That was correct so far as it went, but it was still a misrepresentation of the facts, because if you pay a fare of 3d. at one end of a line here in Melbourne, you can go right through for that fare.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I ask the honorable member whether he believes that the subject of fares upon the Melbourne tramways has anything to do with the motion?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I may point out that the late Prime Minister, as a proof that Socialism was better than private enterprise, gave this illustration of the tram systems in Sydney and Melbourne. I believe that the honorable member did not state the illustration correctly. If he was in order in making the statement to which I refer, I am surely in order in making a reply to it.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable member propose to connect the matter with the question under discussion?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I propose to connect my remarks on the subject with the motion under discussion, in the way I have stated. I desire to show that the illustration, as stated by the ex-Prime Minister, was not correct. If you pay a 3d. fare at the Spencer-street station, it will run you through to the terminus of a line, and if you desire it, you can get a transfer which will carry you beyond the terminus.

Mr. TUDOR.—You cannot get those transfers free.

Mr. LONSDALE.—If you pay 3d. you can get a transfer.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable member is wrong.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I know that you can get a transfer, because I have made inquiries.

Mr. TUDOR.—I am sure the honorable member is wrong.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The honorable member can speak in reply. I have made inquiries on the subject, and though I cannot speak from actual experience, as I have not received a transfer, I am told that transfers are given. I know that, entering a tram at Spencer-street, you can go to the end of your journey for 3d., whilst on the Sydney trams you pay for one section, on any road, 1d. Again, under the Melbourne system, you can buy six tickets for 1s., which will take you right through the journey on each line.

Mr. TUDOR.—No.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It will take you from the Spencer-street station to the end of the Fitzroy terminus.

Mr. FOWLER.—No.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I have travelled the journey with a ticket.

Mr. FOWLER.—The honorable member has "had" the company.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It is half-an-hour's ride. You can also get eight tickets for is., which will carry you within the city.

Mr. WATSON.—That is only for a mile.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It does not matter what the distance is; I am simply showing that the honorable member's contention is not borne out by facts. It should be remembered also that at the end of twelve years from now the Melbourne Tramway Company must hand over the whole of the property with the exception of the cars and carriages.

Mr. WATSON.—But the road was built for them. They did not have to pay for the road.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not know what they paid for. The business is done in the way in which I have stated, and that does not bear out the illustration, as the ex-Prime Minister stated it. I tell honorable members at once that I am not in favour of public utilities being controlled by private enterprise. I have held, and advocated these views for years. I suppose that there are but very few men to be found in the States who do not hold the view that public utilities should be controlled by the public. But there is a vast difference between the opinion of those holding that view and the opinion of men who advocate that all implements, materials, and methods of production shall be controlled by the people.

Mr. THOMAS.—It is only a question of time.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—The honorable member would be called a wild, raging Socialist in Adelaide at the present time.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The honorable member for Perth pointed out that under the system of Socialism in which he believes, there would be differences in the reward of labour; that in the case of a public tramway system, for instance, the manager would get a larger payment than a gripman. The honorable member admitted that there would be these gradations of payment, but I do not know how he squares his views with those of the honorable member for Barrier, who does not believe in wages at all. When I was speaking the other night, the honorable member interjected that what we wanted was to get rid of the wage system; and I suppose the honorable member's idea is that we should all receive a dole from some Government office. The Socialism being taught to people outside is a Socialism which is going to improve the position of every man, and give him greater advantages than he enjoys at present. It is strange that we should not have this Socialism in connexion with our railways. In the past, we got rid of State control, because it was found that it was not in the interests of the public to carry on the railway systems in that way.

Mr. WATSON.—When did we get rid of State control of the railways?

Mr. LONSDALE.—We got rid of State control by putting them under Commissioners.

Mr. WATSON.—That is still State control.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I understand that; I know just what I am talking about; and I know that the Labour Party would like to get rid of the Commissioners.

Mr. WATSON.—No, they would not; that is a misstatement.

Mr. LONSDALE.—They would like to get control of the whole thing, so that they might crowd the service as it was crowded in the past.

Mr. WATSON.—Who supported the Public Service Act?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I know that it is the desire of the men at the head of the Labour Party to get rid of the Railway Commissioners.

Mr. WATSON.—That is not true; I say that it is incorrect.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It is true.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order. I must ask the honorable member for Bland to withdraw that statement.

Mr. WATSON.—I withdraw any apparent reflection upon the honorable member's personal veracity. But I must be allowed to say that the honorable member's statement is absolutely incorrect.

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—The honorable member knows it.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not know it.

Mr. WATSON.—Then it is time the honorable member did.

Mr. LONSDALE.—While I was a member of the State Parliament of New South Wales, the Labour Party time after time attacked the Railways Commissioners, and tried covert influence with Ministers. If that is not trying to get rid of the Railways Commissioners, what is? What is the good of Railways Commissioners, if you exert upon the Ministers behind them all the force of political power, in order to secure anything that is desired? That is only another way of getting rid of them. That is what has been done time after time, and the honorable member for Bland knows it.

Mr. WATSON.—I know nothing of the sort.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The very fact that we have had to put all these institutions under Commissioners shows distinctly that they cannot be controlled where political influence is allowed to come in.

Mr. WATSON.—Hear, hear; I am with the honorable member in that.

Mr. KELLY.—If honorable members opposite are satisfied with the Railways Commissioners, why did they propose to put the Commissioners' employes under the Arbitration Court?

Mr. WATSON.—Because the Commissioners, in the same way as every one else, should be subject to the law.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The members of a railway league in my district, wrote to me, asking me to vote for the inclusion of railway servants in the Arbitration Bill; but I wrote back and told them that I should do nothing of the kind. In their own interests, as well as in the interests of the State, I refused to be a party to putting them under the control of the Federal Arbitration Court. That is the attitude which I have taken up on that matter. Honorable members on the other side say that they are going to help the masses; but what are they going to do? They are going to have a national tobacco monopoly. They are going to give better conditions to the poor of Melbourne and all the States by a national tobacco monopoly. Will any honorable member on the other side tell me what this national tobacco monopoly is going to do for the poor people of the State? Is it going to increase their wages?

Mr. FOWLER.—It will put £600,000 per annum into the public purse.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It will do nothing of the kind, unless we increase the price of tobacco.

Mr. FOWLER.—No; we shall lower it.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The late Prime Minister told us that the people would not get a cheaper smoke as a result of the nationalization of the industry. They were not to have even that advantage, because tobacco would continue to be sold at the same prices.

Mr. WATSON.—I said it would make no difference in that respect.

Mr. LONSDALE.—This proposal for a national tobacco monopoly is only a farce. Though honorable members opposite stand upon platforms outside and speak of these things as in the interests of the people, they know that they will have but little effect upon the condition of the masses.

Mr. FOWLER.—If the honorable member will but ask the retail tobacconists, he will find that the monopoly in force is a very real thing at the present time.

Mr. LONSDALE.—That may be, but if the industry is put under State control the conditions will be very much worse than they are to-day.

Mr. FRAZER.—It will be under Commonwealth control.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It is the control of the nation to which I refer. The members of the Labour Party object to borrowing money, but they wish to have a forced loan from the banks. Like myself, I suppose they would like to get it on the cheap. They do not object to a loan, but they object to paying interest upon it, and they propose, in accordance with their Socialistic ideas, to take gold from the banks and give them paper in place of it. They will have to be a little smart to do that, because the gold would not be left long in the banks of Australia if they got an inkling that that was going to be carried out. We should find that it would soon be making its way over to New Zealand.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Why New Zealand?

Mr. WATSON.—The honorable member knows a lot about it when he talks like that.

Mr. LONSDALE.—So far as the note issue in Canada is concerned, the position is altogether different. When they carried this kind of legislation, they had a larger note issue in Canada than we have in Australia, and so far as token money is concerned, it was very scarce. Honorable members will also find that in Canada the banks issue the larger notes, and the Government issue the smaller notes. I do not think that we should be able to force small notes upon people here to take the place of our token money.

Mr. WILKS.—Is the alliance in favour of that proposal?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not know; but I feel that no good would result from the adoption of it. The community would not be helped by any system of enforced loans. What little benefit we should derive from its adoption would be represented in the saving of a certain amount of interest; but if the State took up the whole note issue the note tax would be lost, so that the Commonwealth would not gain any material advantage. The alliance opposite has been formed on a very peculiar basis. One party to it has been actuated by a desire, we are told, to secure a greater measure of protection, and I have extracted from the alliance programme all that bears upon that question. The programme provides for—

Legislation (including Tariff legislation) shown to be necessary :—

- (1) To develop Australian resources.
- (2) To preserve, encourage, and benefit Australian industries, primary and secondary.
- (3) To secure fair conditions of labour for all engaged in every form of industrial enterprise, and to advance their interests and well-being without distinction of class or social status.

That looks very well on paper; but these proposals are not in themselves sufficient for the combination. They have had to introduce three additional paragraphs, setting forth that—

As to any regulation arising under this paragraph only any member of either party may, as to any specific proposal—

- (a) Agree with the members of his own party to be bound by their joint determination; or—
- (b) Decide for himself how far the particular circumstances prove necessity, or the extent to which the proposal should be carried.

In other words, any member of the alliance may either agree to be bound by the decision of his party, or exercise his own individual opinion, and vote as he pleases with regard to Tariff legislation. That is practically the meaning of this proposal, and yet it has been placed before the protectionists of Victoria as an indication that if this alliance comes into power they will secure a revival of protection. The whole thing is a farce.

Mr. MAUGER.—Why should the honorable member grumble about it?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I am simply showing that these proposals are mere humbug. The two paragraphs which I have just read are marked “a” and “b,” and if we assume that those letters stand for “asinine humbug” we fairly estimate their value. The members of the alliance have not for one moment anticipated that anything in the shape of a protectionist revival will result from the combination.

Mr. MAUGER.—Why should the honorable member object to that?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I wish the public to know the real facts of the position. They are not always told the truth in regard to these matters, and it is time that it was put before them. We are told that increased protection is needed by Victorian industries, which have been protected almost for ages. Notwithstanding that they had had a large measure of protection for many years, the moment a slight reduction in the Tariff was made they cried out that they could not exist.

Mr. MAUGER.—Does the honorable member call a reduction of 100 per cent. a slight one?

Mr. LONSDALE.—A reduction of a duty of 25 per cent. to 12½ per cent. is a very fair one. I am in favour of the appointment of a Tariff Commission, but it must be based on fair lines. It should be fairly representative of both the protectionist and free-trade party.

Mr. HUME COOK.—We have no objection to that.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Those who are agitating for the appointment of a Tariff Commission will find, if it be appointed, that its investigations will not bear out their assertion. They will show a different state of things from that which the protectionists opposite suggest. I am informed that the Denton Hat Mills Company, of Melbourne, has refused orders, on the ground that they have already booked so far ahead that they would not be able to carry them out.

Mr. MAUGER.—That is not correct. I was at the mills this morning, and I know that business there is very dull.

Mr. LONSDALE.—If the honorable member challenges my statement, I shall submit to him letters received in Sydney that bear out my assertion. I can place my hands on documentary proof of my statement. I have been promised those letters, which show that the Denton Hat Mills Company has refused orders, on the ground that it could not carry them out. We are told that a Victorian nail factory is being ruined, but, in July last, it had its record output.

Mr. HUME COOK.—For barbed wire.

Mr. LONSDALE.—The factory had a record output in that month.

Mr. HUME COOK.—But not in nails.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It was the factory's record output in respect of manufactured goods, but I cannot say whether it related to nails.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member has not made any inquiries.

Mr. LONSDALE.—We are also told that the glass bottle works in this State need greater protection, but I know that they have been doing well.

Mr. MAUGER.—Have they?

Mr. HUME COOK.—Two nail factories have been closed since the passing of the Tariff.

Mr. LONSDALE.—In 1903 Victoria's export of manufactured goods was £1,000,000 in excess of that which she exported in 1900. That increase took place under the Federal Tariff.

Mr. MAUGER.—But what did she import?

Mr. LONSDALE. — Facts like these prove that the assertions of the Protectionist Party about the state of trade are utterly absurd.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The increase to which the honorable member refers was not in manufactures.

Mr. LONSDALE.—It was in goods of Victorian manufacture. I saw a statement in the press recently setting forth that this increase had occurred, and on inquiry at the office of the Government Statist I learned that it was correct.

Mr. MAUGER.—In what newspaper was this statement published?

Mr. LONSDALE. — In a commercial journal. I do not put such statements before the House without first making inquiries, and it was for this reason that I went to the Government Statist's office. I wished to verify the report.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Did not Senator Trenwith say much the same thing?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I do not know what he said.

Mr. MAUGER.—We have lost a very large proportion of Victorian trade.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I am dealing only with the attempt to bring about a protectionist revival. If a Tariff Commission be appointed, I am satisfied that its investigations will prove that local manufacturers have been benefited, rather than injured by the Federal Tariff.

Mr. MAUGER.—There are hundreds of men out of work in Victoria.

Mr. LONSDALE.—There were hundreds of men out of work in this State, even when the protectionist Tariff was at its highest.

Mr. MAUGER.—But they were not following the trades to which I refer.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Protection has been a curse to Victoria. I am here, not to play any game, but to tell the truth. If the workmen of this State would only open their eyes they would see that protection has been a curse, rather than a benefit to Victoria, and that they have been fooled by the men who call themselves their leaders.

Mr. WATSON.—Is the honorable member speaking for the Ministry?

Mr. LONSDALE.—I am not.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I desire to call the attention of the honorable member to the fact that he is turning round, and addressing the galleries, and that he ought to address himself to the Chair.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I was addressing honorable members in the Opposition corner, who feel so keenly on this question.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member will please address the Chair.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I wish to impress upon these honorable members the truths that I am uttering. I desire them to look back at the position of Victoria at a time when the protectionist Tariff of this State was at its highest—to see for themselves how the working men have suffered under that policy, and to exercise their intelligence in determining where the real trouble lies. Instead of seeking to bring about a protectionist revival, which would be only a greater curse to Victoria than it has ever had, they should support a policy that will improve the condition of the people.

Mr. POYNTON.—The honorable member should address these remarks to the Minister of Trade and Customs.

Mr. LONSDALE.—I have nothing to do with the Minister. I am a supporter of the Government, but am opposed to any revival of protection. If the Minister of Trade and Customs attempts to revive that policy he will find in me a bitter opponent. We are promised a Federal system of old-age pensions. Honorable members opposite sneer at the proposal of the Ministry to confer with the States Governments in regard to this question. But we know that without the co-operation of the States such a system is impossible.

Mr. MAUGER.—Nonsense.

Mr. LONSDALE.—We know full well that it is impossible for us to provide for a Federal system of old-age pensions by means of a tax on land values. When honorable members opposite tell the people that it can be provided for by a tax on land values they know that they are talking of something which is really impossible. The only way in which it is possible to secure Federal old-age pensions is by the Commonwealth Government conferring, as they propose to do, with the Governments of the States, and inducing them to agree—

Mr. POYNTON.—To a Federal land tax.

Mr. LONSDALE.—No; but to make provision for the payment of old-age pensions out of the Customs revenue. If a Federal system cost £1,500,000 per annum, it would be necessary, under our Constitution, to raise £6,000,000 in order to pay for it, so that we must make some arrangement with the States to utilize Customs revenue in that direction. If the Labour Party are so strongly in favour of old-age pensions, how is it that the Queensland Labour Government has not introduced the system there?

Mr. FRAZER.—They will do so.

Mr. McCAY.—Their programme does not include such a proposal.

Mr. LONSDALE.—Why does not the Labour Government in Western Australia do the same thing? I am opposed to the position taken up by the Labour Party, but I do not wish it to be understood for one moment that I am hostile to the cause of labour. Labour has my deepest sympathy, and I am prepared to assist in passing any legislation in its interests. But to attempt by means of a Conciliation and Arbitration Act to help the masses, is just as useless as it is to seek to quench a fire by spitting on it. No good would result from the passing of such a measure. How is it possible to keep up the standard of wages in a falling market? I have been opposed to conciliation and arbitration legislation, because at best it can be only a palliative. It cannot prevent the recurrence of such disputes and difficulties as have arisen in the past. I shall certainly do all I can in opposition to the passing of any restrictive legislation. I believe in developing the freedom of every individual, and in giving every man the fullest opportunity to use the powers with which he is endowed. By working in that direction alone shall we secure the salvation of the people. We cannot hope to help them by restricting the use of individual power. We have seen the Conciliation and Arbitration Act of New South Wales working in such a way that, as the result of the section dealing with the limitation of apprentices, many lads have been prevented from obtaining work, and have been sent out into the streets. Instead of giving every man the fullest opportunity to do the best he can for himself, it is having the opposite effect. I am not one of those who believe that every worker should be paid the same wage. All men differ. Their capacity varies, and each man ought to receive only that which he himself earns. I feel that no man, whether engaged in manufacturing or other pursuits, should by law receive any special privilege over the rest of the people. If our States were to adopt a different system—if we were to make use of our unoccupied lands, under an intelligent land policy—the trouble and difficulty which exist to-day in the Commonwealth would soon disappear, and instead of the poverty and misery which we see about us, we should have happy homes and much brighter conditions. But these attempts to establish a tobacco monopoly, and other proposals of that nature, to help the community, are silly and absurd, and so far as I am concerned will receive no assistance.

Mr. HUGHES.—The honorable member for Parramatta yesterday made a number of statements which may be left to look after themselves; but there is one thing that he said which I shall take this opportunity to correct. He said—or is reported to have said—I am now quoting from the Age of to-day—

He knew that Mr. Hughes had gone to the Orange Association and asked to be put on the Orange bunch.

I wish to say that that is not correct; that I have never, either at the last election, or any other election, gone to the officials, or to any person connected however remotely with the Orange institution or the Protestant Defence Association, or any religious body in New South Wales, or in Australia—

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Or any one connected with them?

Mr. HUGHES.—Or any one connected with them, and asked them to put me in the bunch, or asked to be included as a nominee of theirs. I have asked to be taken out of their list, and that is the only communication I have ever made to them. I have always endeavoured to deprecate the introduction of sectarianism into politics; I have never been indebted in any way to such institutions for my return; and I hope that I shall not be so indebted in the future.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I desire to make a personal explanation in view of what has just fallen from the honorable and learned member for West Sydney. I wish to say, in reference to some remarks that were made yesterday, that I did not speak without having what I believed to be full warranty for my statement. I have proof here which satisfies me, and which, I believe, justified me in the statement which I made. Here is a wire signed by Mr. Packer, the editor of the Watchman, in Sydney. He says—that is definite enough—

Hughes called on me at office—

during last Federal campaign in great concern. Said Roman ticket being used for all it was worth for Warren against himself, and asked me to do what I could through Watchman, and privately, to stir up Protestant vote. He also gave me some tit-bits to use against Warren in paragraphs. Never asked to have name withdrawn from list. Said, left it to my judgment whether I would withdraw it or not, though he hoped to get some Roman votes unless they became alarmed.

There is justification for the statement I made yesterday.

Mr. HUGHES.—I desire again—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! It is not for me to determine finally—it is for the House to do that—but it does appear to me that the express prohibition of debate upon any personal explanation, precludes explanation after explanation being made, first of all, by way of attack, and then by way of reply. If the honorable and learned member desires to explain any matter, which will not lead to a further explanation in the way of debate, I shall be pleased to hear him. But I will ask him not to say anything in the nature of debate.

Mr. HUGHES.—There is not one word of truth in what the honorable member for Parramatta has read. What I asked of Packer on the only occasion when I called on him was to be good enough to take me out of their list.

Mr. WATSON. — The honorable and learned member told me that months ago.

Mr. HUGHES.—But he said that he had put my name there with a view of doing me a good turn. I had known him as a member of the Daily Telegraph staff, on which he was a reporter. I told him that was the reverse of what he was doing, and asked him to be good enough to publish a letter of mine to that effect. He said, "I will simply knock the name out, and there will be an end of it."

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—My statement can be further corroborated.

Mr. FRAZER (Kalgoorlie). — We can now, I presume, get back to the subject under discussion. I have gathered from the remarks of the honorable member for New England that the Ministerialists at the present time have a serious objection to raise against the methods of the Opposition, whom they accuse of having resorted to unfair tactics. Coming as it does from the lips of those who have lately been engaged in actions which have won for them the unenviable distinction of being called "a gang of political sand-baggers," I think that if the honorable member was speaking on behalf of honorable members opposite his remarks might be described as similar to "Satan sermonizing on sin." I wish for a few moments to contrast the position of the members of the Opposition and the attitude they have adopted in this Parliament with those that have been adopted by those who are sitting on the Ministerial side of the House. The leader of the Opposition in expressing his dissatisfaction with the present Administration, did not resort to the methods that were adopted by the present Prime Minister when he was seeking office. The leader of the Opposition has come down with a definite want of confidence motion, and has given every honorable member an opportunity to express his opinions clearly, distinctly, and fully, so that there may be no doubt about the position in which we all stand. But what was the course adopted by the Prime Minister? He came to the House in March, when the Deakin Government was in office, and said that they were in a minority, and were depending for their political existence on the votes of those who were then sitting on the corner benches. There was a serious difference of opinion with regard to the inclusion in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill of the public servants. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat was aware that the party to which I belong were pledged to the inclusion of those persons. Being defeated upon that question, he relinquished office. At that time the present Prime Minister voted with the Deakin Government. But from statements, which were made by him to the press, we were led to believe that he was very glad that the honorable and learned member for Ballarat had retired from office. Certainly, a number of his present supporters voted against the Deakin Government. When asked why he did not get his supporters to save the Deakin Government, the Prime Minister stated, in justification, that he did not wish to coerce the votes of those who believed in the inclusion of the public servants in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. No one would ask him to do that. But what about the conduct of those gentlemen who have been proclaimed as wreckers? What, for instance, about the honorable member for New England, the honorable member for Lang, and the honorable member for Wilmot? What influence did he use upon those members of his party?

Mr. KELLY.—The present Prime Minister used no influence in that direction.

Mr. FRAZER.—Absolutely none! But there is reason to believe that the right honorable member was very well pleased at the defeat of the Deakin Administration. The Watson Government then assumed the responsibilities of office. At that time there was a serious difference of opinion between honorable members opposite. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat, leading one section of the Opposition, said that it was necessary that a majority should be secured. That was satisfactory. No one could find fault with his position. But the Prime Minister, speaking subsequently, said that if it were a question of majority rule, the Labour Party had as much right to sit upon the Government benches as had the Deakin Government during the previous three years. It is fair to assume from that remark that the right honorable gentleman was anticipating a time when he might be sitting upon the Ministerial benches without having a majority. Subsequently the honorable and learned member for Ballarat stated that one thing which must be considered in the matter of an agreement between two parties was that the members of those parties must not be found flying at each other's throats at the next election. We heard quite a different expression of opinion from the right honorable member for East Sydney. He stated that to make compacts with another party when an election was imminent was legitimate, but that a compact made now as to what was to happen at the next election merited the strongest condemnation. Consequently, the actions of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat at that time, in the opinion of the right honorable gentleman at the head of the Government, merited the strongest condemnation. Now, it is necessary to deal for a brief time with a few of the opinions which members of the two groups on the Government side of the House have held concerning one another at different periods during their political career. I do not wish to go back to ancient history, or to deal with what the Prime Minister did or said ten years ago in the New South Wales Parliament. I am prepared to content myself with his actions since he has been a member of this Parliament. Speaking at the Town Hall, Melbourne, on 30th October, concerning the Deakin

Administration, the right honorable gentleman used these words—

The Government introduced the Electoral Bill in the Senate, with a provision for minority representation. That was the main provision of the measure. The Senate knocked it out. Then the Senate put in a provision against plumping. The other House removed it, and the changes were running between the two Houses, in which several Ministers voted in several ways during the several stages of the Bill. Mr. Deakin said last night that that Bill gave manhood and womanhood suffrage to Australia. I say that this Government, to serve its political interests, robbed hundreds and thousands of electors of their just rights

I wonder how honorable members opposite like to have those matters brought under their notice at this particular time, when they are clasping one another to their bosoms, and think neither can do any wrong. The right honorable gentleman went on to say—

This nefarious act in the interests of one political party may be committed in the interests of another.

Mr. WILKS.—Why re-open those old sores?

Mr. FRAZER.—This is a sore which immediately concerns the present position in Parliament, and does not concern the position of certain gentlemen in New South Wales about ten years ago. With the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, I am heartily sick of hearing about those old squabbles in New South Wales. Any stranger coming into the galleries of this House would believe that the Commonwealth consisted of New South Wales, and New South Wales only.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why did the honorable member not make a protest when the subject was raised?

Mr. FRAZER.—I am making my protest now when I am in order, but the honorable member in interjecting is out of order. The speech, from which I am quoting, proceeded—

Let us, while we stand on the brink of the momentous developments of this Australian nation, try to keep it from the political corruption we see in other great democracies. My strongest charge against this Government is that they have broken their duty to the people, and broken the laws of the country for a selfish motive, and they have defiled and debased the ballot-box of Australia.

I wonder how the head of the present Government, who, with his equal in all things, occupies the front Ministerial benches, feels now when he finds himself a partner with those who took a prominent part in debasing and defiling the ballot-box of Australia?

A similar question might be asked as to the right honorable and learned member for Balaclava. I wonder if that gentleman feels at peace with the head of the Government, by whom he was slandered on the public platform, and who has ridden on his back into prominence in this Parliament. We find, however, that, despite those serious differences of opinion—I am safe, I think, in thus referring to the position—the present Government, and their supporters have agreed on one point, viz., that the Labour Party of this country must be checked and “downed.” One of the first reasons which honorable members opposite advance for their present stand is that we on this side obtain our political positions by the assistance of a machine which they intend to remove. I should like for a moment to refer to this so-called political machine, which honorable members on the other side take a particular delight in denouncing. The mode in which all honorable members on this side enter this Chamber may not be altogether the same, but is very nearly the same in all portions of Australia. Before a man is permitted to be a candidate under our flag he must be a member of a trade union or a labour league; and in that matter there are no restrictions. There is no member in this House who, if he desires to join the leagues, may not do so. There is no clique; the party is not reserved for a few, but is open to all who desire to enter. When it is agreed that a labour man shall be nominated for a certain constituency, the candidate must possess the goodwill of a majority of those who know him best, and he must subscribe to the platform. But what is the course adopted by the Free-trade Party? As an illustration, I might point to my interjecting friend the honorable member for Wentworth. If he had not had the good grace of the honorable and learned member for East Sydney, and had not been placed on the free-trade ticket, what chance would he have had of being a member of this Parliament? If the honorable member had not had behind him the influence of the great Sydney newspapers—

Mr. KELLY.—I never met the honorable and learned member for East Sydney before I announced myself as a candidate.

Mr. FRAZER.—That is a vastly different matter. What chance would the honorable member have had had his name not appeared on the free-trade ticket? As to our candidates have to submit themselves to the goodwill of those who know them best. On the other side, the particular gentleman who is at the head of the free-trade organization obtains the assistance of the great daily newspapers, in Sydney, for instance, for certain candidates, with the result that these gentlemen are entirely at his mercy. As an illustration of the method adopted by the Labour Party, I may take the case of Senator de Largie in Western Australia. That gentleman was nominated by the Labour Party for the Senate, and a plebiscite was taken of trade unionists and members of labour organizations generally in Western Australia, with the result that at the preliminary poll Senator de Largie was selected as the candidate by about 8,500 votes. I ask the right honorable member for Swan, who selected the protectionist candidates for the Senate in Western Australia?

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—The right honorable member himself.

Mr. FRAZER.—The protectionist candidates were selected by the right honorable member for Swan and Dr. Hackett, the head of the West Australian newspaper.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Dr. Hackett had nothing to do with the selection.

Mr. FRAZER.—Did the right honorable member not select the candidates, if Dr. Hackett did not do so?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I supported the candidates.

Mr. FRAZER.—On the one hand, we see that 8,500 electors, who knew Senator de Largie intimately, selected him as their candidate, while, on the other hand, candidates were selected by one man, and foisted on the electors.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not select the candidates.

Mr. FRAZER.—We find that the democracy of Western Australia on that occasion, by an immense majority, returned labour senators at the head of the poll. It is said that the Labour Party are class representatives; but I do not think that a more striking exhibition of class representation could be witnessed than that afforded us by the honorable and learned member for Wannon last night. From start to finish the one question in that honorable and learned member's mind was—“How is this going to affect the farmer? How are my constituents going to get on?”

Mr. KELLY.—Is it not his duty to consider his constituents?

Mr. FRAZER.—Yes, but not at the expense of other portions of the Commonwealth, not when it means an injustice to thousands of others who do not happen to live in the constituency of Wannon. As to the Arbitration Bill and the inclusion of agricultural labourers, who are the class advocates in this Chamber? The object of the Labour Party is to make that Bill apply to the industries of the country as a whole, and we are met with the cry, "Oh, save the poor farmer and the poor fruit-grower!" The other day we had from the Minister of Trade and Customs a statement that the policy of the Labour Party is to tax the producer off the land. Am I correctly representing what the Minister said?

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member is quite right.

Mr. FRAZER.—If the Minister of Trade and Customs seriously entertains that opinion he is suffering from an unpardonable lack of knowledge as to the intentions of honorable members on this side. The policy that the party with which I am associated intend to adopt is one of the utmost consideration for the men who are producing wealth from the soil. The man we want to tax is he who is not producing, but is keeping the land locked up from those who want to produce. A few months ago it was stated in the Tocsin, and the statement has not been disputed, because it is indisputable, that there are 2,560,000 acres of the most fertile land in Victoria which are locked up by great landlords, and which support only 7869 persons. That is the sort of thing we desire to stop. We desire that those men shall be compelled to hand the land over to those who, under present conditions, are forced to go elsewhere in order to settle.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Does the honorable member propose that the land shall be paid for?

Mr. FRAZER.—Of course; our policy is not a policy of confiscation in regard to land or any other property. But when the welfare of the people is being seriously jeopardized owing to the fact that a few men have millions of acres locked up, it is time for State interference, in order to make them part with that land, whether they like to do so or not.

Mr. KELLY.—How is the money to be raised for the purchase?

Mr. FRAZER.—I shall tell the honorable member about the financial proposals presently.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The present Minister of Trade and Customs was the first, as a State Minister, to encourage settlement on a large scale in Victoria.

Mr. FRAZER.—Then it is a wonder that the honorable gentleman, at that time, allowed his gaze to miss this awful exhibition of a few people holding millions of acres of fertile land locked up.

Mr. McLEAN.—The State Government, of which I was the head, resumed and distributed amongst the people nearly all the estates that have been resumed for settlement in Victoria.

Mr. FRAZER.—If that be so, and I have no reason to doubt the honorable gentleman's word, I can only say that he was on the right track, and that it is a pity he was not allowed to stay in the State Parliament and continue the good work. I should like to lay before honorable members the opinions which were expressed by the present head of the Government in regard to the farmers at a particular time. The right honorable gentleman, at Warragul and Kyneton, delivered brilliant addresses and aroused his audiences to a high pitch of enthusiasm. It would appear that of late his one mission in life is to remove any ill-feeling which may have existed between the residents of Victoria and the residents of New South Wales, and to that end he is going to clasp the farmers to his bosom. At the present juncture, it is interesting to note—and I should like his understudy in the House to listen to this—what he said in the Melbourne Town Hall in December, 1899. On that occasion he said—

That door which was open in the mother colony always was going to be open in all Australia.

How does that suit the Minister of Trade and Customs?

With all these barriers down, the stock fatteners and wheat farmers would feel the cold southerly wind of a world's competition.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The right honorable gentleman is of the same opinion still.

Mr. FRAZER.—If that be so, the right honorable gentleman is disguising or keeping that opinion in the background. When addressing them of late, he has not promised them "cold, southerly winds," but the warmth of his own bosom. Honorable members opposite denounce the political machine as a serious evil, when it is used by our party; but they intend to bring into existence another machine. I do not say that the members of the Ministry are sending organizers around, but their supporters, and also the merchants, and members of the Employers' Federation—those who are responsible for sweating young girls in Melbourne, by paying them 2s. 6d. per week, and then deducting 2½d. for insurance—are organizing leagues throughout Victoria and the other States. They intend to go to extremes in their endeavour to defeat the Labour Party at the next election; and, peculiarly enough, they are calling in the assistance of the ladies. At the Masonic Hall, Collins-street, Melbourne, the other night, at a fully-packed meeting ready to cheer the Prime Minister when he cracked some of his familiar jokes, that gentleman when he had delivered his vigorous denunciation of the Labour Party, said:—"In this hall, there must be no society distinctions. The 'missus' must grasp to her bosom the 'Mary' that works the gridiron." To the women of the Commonwealth he looked to save the country from the extremes of labour legislation. But if the right honorable gentleman had so much consideration for the interests of the females of this country, if he was so anxious that they should exercise the franchise, and should make their influence felt upon the policy of the Commonwealth, how it is that, during the five years that he was in office in New South Wales, he refused to give the women of that State the right to vote?

Mr. KENNEDY.—Is not the fact equally a reflection upon the party by which he was kept in power?

Mr. FRAZER.—The right honorable member for Swan, who is another of those who are foremost now in addressing meetings of females, was at the head of a Ministry for ten years without giving them a vote. I believe that the honorable member for Gippsland stands in a similar position.

Mr. McLEAN.—I advocated woman's suffrage before the honorable member was born.

Mr. MALONEY.—Yet the honorable member left me in want of a seconder when I first proposed it.

Mr. FRAZER.—The honorable member for Gippsland may have stated on the hustings his belief in woman's franchise, but, although he was Premier of Victoria for a considerable time, he did not introduce a Bill to give effect to that belief.

Mr. McLEAN.—It was one of the principal planks in our platform.

Mr. FRAZER.—Then the honorable gentleman ought to have placed it upon the statute-book. It has been in the platform of the Labour Party as long as I remember, and if it had not been continually advocated by that party, the ladies of Australia would never have obtained the right to vote. When honorable members opposite are addressing meetings of ladies, their auditors know that it is the Labour Party whom they have to thank for their right to vote, and I believe that their gratitude will cause them not to forget us when the time to vote comes. Another statement of the Prime Minister of which notice must be taken, because of the high position which he occupies, though it may be only temporarily, was that the Labour Party wish for the creation of an Arbitration Court in order to starve the wives and children of non-unionists. That is one of the greatest misrepresentations of our desires that has been put before the people of Australia.

Mr. WEBSTER.—It is a slander.

Mr. FRAZER.—Yes. Our experience of existing arbitration legislation has enabled us to gauge pretty accurately what is required to make a Commonwealth arbitration measure successful. Arbitration Acts are in force in two of the States, but it has been found in Western Australia that a provision giving preference to unionists is necessary, and the Government of that State propose to amend the Act by the insertion of such a provision. We have always maintained that for the successful administration of an Arbitration Act, and to secure the industrial peace of Australia, it is necessary that those who are banded together in organizations should have some interest in supporting that legislation; that some return should be made to them for their action in foregoing the right to strike when dissatisfied with their conditions, and for undertaking the expense of conducting cases before the Arbitration Courts. We say that those who belong to unions should be placed in as good a position as those who are not members of unions, who are put to no expense, who do not give evidence before the Arbitration Courts, and yet who benefit by all their awards. To speak of "preference to unionists" is a misnomer. What we desire should be termed "security to unionists." It is the bitter experience of unionists in all parts of Australia that those who have taken a prominent part in conducting the affairs of unions, either by appearing before Courts of Arbitration, or in other ways, have often afterwards found that their positions have been filled by others, although they had hitherto done their work with entire satisfaction to their employers. We know that blackballing exists in connexion with the employers' unions of Australia, and it is therefore necessary that there should be some legislation which will give security to those who are responsible for the conduct of the affairs of the Labour organizations. It is a slander to say that we wish to starve the wives and children of non-unionists. On the contrary, the Labour Party has, from its inception to the present time, consistently tried to bring about better conditions for the people of Australia. Our reputation, however, is such that we need not fear such slanders. Incidentally, I would point out that during the present debate we have had the expression of the views of only one-half of the head of the Government. Apparently, the Ministry are reserving themselves for a final rush before the division bell rings; but probably the result will be like what is happening to the Japanese at Port Arthur, that when they make it, they will suffer very severely. The final objection of the Prime Minister to the Labour Party is that we are a pack of extremists. Honorable members opposite refer to themselves as a combination of moderates, and I am very pleased to obtain from their own lips a name by which I may refer to them. They are certainly very moderate in their attendance in this Chamber at the present time. I should like to know how far their moderation will carry them. Is the moderation of the honorable member for Gippsland the same thing as that of the honorable member for Kooyong, of the honorable member for New England, and of the honorable member for Lang? Are the other members of the party prepared to go as far as the Prime Minister wishes to go, and to remove from the Immigration Restriction Act the provision relating to contract labour, and from the Post and Telegraph Act the provision relating to the employment of black labour on mail boats? I think that their moderation is likely to carry them backwards in more senses than one. Not only will they be retrogressive in their legislation, but their policy will carry them back to this side of the Chamber with which they are more familiar. The Prime Minister was elected as a free-trader, but he declared, when speaking on the Address-in-Reply, that, so far as the fiscal situation was concerned, there was an armed truce. How long is that armed truce to last? Will it continue as long as the present coalition remains in office? Is it not rather a truce for the burial of the dead? Has not the right honorable member now got rid of the obstacle which for so long prevented him from obtaining office? There is nothing very contentious in the programme of the Government. Their chief plank is to get into recess as soon as possible.

Mr. KENNEDY. — Does the honorable member blame them?

Mr. FRAZER.—No; because it is their only hope of remaining in office. I would blame honorable members on this side, however, if they did not take the first opportunity to toss them out of office. Although honorable members opposite differ on many things; but they are in absolute agreement upon the first plank of their platform.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And the honorable member's party are in agreement upon a second plank—that the Ministry shall not get into recess.

Mr. FRAZER.—Quite so. To show why they should not get into recess, I will refer to a few remarks which we have heard from them on other occasions, and to the methods which they adopted for obtaining office. Both the Prime Minister and his better-half declared that it would be unconstitutional to bring the public servants of the States and of the Commonwealth under the Arbitration Bill. If it were not unconstitutional, they declared that it was inexpedient—that it would cause considerable dissatisfaction amongst the States, and that it involved a very serious encroachment upon State rights. Indeed, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat affirmed that it was the first step towards wrecking the Federation. But the present Government, since their advent to office, practically say, "We are quite prepared to ignore the inclusion of the public servants of the States within the scope of the Bill, and to disregard the injury which will be done to State rights if we can only get into recess."

Mr. KENNEDY.—Could honorable members go back upon their votes?

Mr. FRAZER.—The Government could have declared, as did the honorable member for Bland, that they were prepared to adopt the Bill in a certain form, and that if the House declined to allow them to do so, they would relinquish office. Instead of taking up that attitude, they stand convicted of having passed a measure with which they absolutely disagree.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No.

Mr. FRAZER.—I maintain that that is so. Let me briefly traverse a few of the items which are contained in what the Government have been pleased to dub a "policy." The first matter to which I shall direct attention is the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill. As a representative of Western Australia, I am not ungrateful to honorable members opposite for the votes which they cast in favour of obtaining the latest possible data, so that we may justify that great national project. But when we find the Ministry filling their so-called programme with non-contentious measures, it is only right that we should criticise their action. I now wish to refer to a telegram which appears in the Argus this morning, and which was despatched to Western Australia by the right honorable member for Swan.

Mr. FOWLER.—I think that an important debate of this kind demands a better attendance of honorable members in the Chamber. [Quorum formed.]

Mr. FRAZER.—In the Argus of to-day I find the following telegram, which is headed "Trans-Australian Railway":—

KALGOORLIE, Wednesday.—The secretary of the roads board sent a telegraphic message of congratulation to Sir John Forrest last Saturday, in the terms of the resolution passed at the meeting of the board, held on the previous evening, as to the Trans-Australian Railway Survey Bill. Yesterday Sir John despatched the following reply from Melbourne:—"Very gratified at your earnest message. Owing to the Labour Party precipitating a no-confidence motion, which would have been just as effective in a week's time, the Bill is postponed indefinitely. Regret senseless tactics just when success was assured."

According to the dictum of the right honorable member for Swan everything with which he does not agree is "senseless." Upon the question of the construction of the Trans-Continental Railway I venture to say that no honorable member doubts the loyalty of the whole of the representatives of Western Australia, and nobody will seriously cavil at their earnestness in endeavouring to secure a majority in favour of that undertaking. But when I find the right honorable member for Swan urging that the Labour Party have precipitated a crisis which imperils the passage of the Bill relating to the survey of that line, it is only right that I should call attention to his own attitude upon that measure. As is well known the last three Administrations have placed that Bill in the very forefront of their programmes. Had the honorable member for Bland not been hurled from office in a most uncereceremonious and undignified manner by the present Ministerial supporters, it is practically certain that that measure would have been passed by this House immediately the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill had been disposed of. I need scarcely remind honorable members that the right honorable member for Swan voted against the Watson Administration. He did not pay any attention to the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill when the honorable and learned member for Corinella submitted his memorable amendment. No. There was to be a re-shuffle of the political cards, and the passage of that measure was not so urgent then. When the right honorable member blames the Labour Party for delaying the passage of that Bill, I would remind him that only four out of the twenty-two honorable members who opposed the motion having reference to the survey of the proposed route, are members of the Labour Party.

Mr. TUDOR.—How many members of the Ministerial Party opposed it?

Mr. FRAZER.—I did not carefully analyze the figures.

Mr. TUDOR.—About ten.

Mr. FRAZER.—As is well known, it is customary for the Senate to adjourn immediately notice of a no-confidence motion is given in this House. Consequently, even if the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill had been passed by this Chamber its passage would have been delayed elsewhere by the motion which is now under consideration. I think I have shown conclusively that there is no justification whatever for the charge which has been made against the Labour Party by the right honorable member for Swan, and which is calculated to create in the minds of a small minority in Western Australia, the impression that we desire to shelve that Bill. Regarding the other items in the Government programme, the Prime Minister has declared his intention to proceed with the Papua Bill, which contains no contentious matter; but he proposes to defer the introduction of the High Commissioner Bill, until the various States Governments have been consulted. I say that, in view of the charges which have been levelled against the Commonwealth in London, the appointment of a High Commissioner who is familiar with our legislation, and in sympathy with the aspirations of the Australian people, is absolutely urgent. The expenditure which his appointment would involve is infinitesimal, as compared with the good which would result to this country. I admit that it is advisable after the Central Office has been established to make every provision for effecting economies in the States Departments. The policy of the Government, however, is, to continue to allow our legislation to be misunderstood by people abroad. In regard to the Manufactures Encouragement Bill, the Government propose to pursue the good old policy of regarding nothing in it as vital.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Did the Watson Government make it vital?

Mr. FRAZER.—No, because it was not included in the platform upon which we were elected. It is a very significant circumstance that, in making his declaration of policy, the Prime Minister entirely forgot to mention the matter of old-age pensions. The desire to alleviate the sufferings of our aged poor was of such vital concern to him that he completely overlooked the question. From a second instalment of the Ministerial policy, delivered at a subsequent sitting, we learned that he proposes to consult the States Governments in regard to it. I admit that it is desirable that the Commonwealth should work amicably with the States, but when the Prime Minister proposes to make the comfort of the declining years of the aged poor dependent upon the decision of the States Governments, I must cross swords with him. A vast majority of honorable members are pledged to old-age pensions, and must accept responsibility for imposing any extra taxation which the carrying out of such a scheme may render necessary. So far as the electors represented by the Labour Party are concerned, we are prepared to pledge them to that additional taxation, in order to bring about an improvement in the condition of our aged poor. I, for one, will never sanction the welfare of these persons being intrusted, say, to the decision of the Premier of Victoria—to give a specific instance.

Mr. KENNEDY.—What does the alliance say upon that question?

Mr. FRAZER.—It says that it will introduce a measure providing for old-age pensions, as soon as possible.

Mr. MCCAY.—The alliance does not say that, but it might mean it.

Mr. FRAZER.—I beg the Minister's pardon. The alliance programme contains the following plank:—"Old-age pensions, on a basis fair and equitable to the States." Do honorable members opposite anticipate that we are prepared to enact legislation which is not fair and equitable? Do they imagine that we are willing to sanction a scheme which will starve one man and feed another? The difference between the programme of the alliance and that of honorable members opposite is, that whilst we are determined to place upon the statute-book a measure providing for the payment of old-age pensions, they wish to shelve the question.

Mr. GROOM.—They will promise it.

Mr. FRAZER.—They would promise anything to enable them to get into recess. We have been urged by some honorable members to state our objections to the present Administration and the present Prime Minister.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Hear, hear.

Mr. FRAZER.—I think that if the right honorable member for Swan had been here he would not have urged that upon me. I have stated my reasons as emphatically as I know how. The reason I do not like the present Prime Minister of Australia is because I do not trust him politically.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What is the difference between politically and privately; if the honorable member does not trust a man politically I suppose he would not trust him privately?

AN HONORABLE MEMBER.—The right honorable member for Swan would not trust the Prime Minister politically a little time ago.

Mr. FRAZER.—I should not like to say that I think the Prime Minister would try to steal anything from my pocket. I certainly do not wish to convey that impression to any one, but I do say that, politically, in the administration of the public departments, and in a position of responsibility for the preparation of legislation for the welfare of the people of the country I have no trust whatever in the right honorable gentleman. There are specific reasons why we can have no trust in him. The right honorable gentleman has said, "When I get into a position to do so I shall remove from the Immigration Restriction Act that obnoxious clause which prevents the introduction of contract labour to Australia."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Is it not much better that a man should say straightforwardly what he will do?

Mr. FRAZER.—Quite so. It is infinitely better that a man should say what he proposes to do when he gets into a position of power, but in the case of the Prime Minister we find that, instead of endeavouring to do what he has pledged himself to do, he is careful to say nothing about it at the present time.

Mr. McCAY.—The Prime Minister said that it was not the policy of the present Ministry to do that.

Mr. FRAZER. — Are we to understand that the right honorable gentleman has withdrawn the pledge he gave to the people in that connexion?

Mr. KENNEDY. — The right honorable gentleman has not got the numbers; that is the trouble.

Mr. FRAZER.—No, and the right honorable gentleman does not propose to go on with that or any other contentious matter until he knows that he has the numbers behind him. That is a fine manly and open programme. The right honorable gentleman, at the close of his political career in Australia, says, "I have adopted a policy which will get me into recess, and which will give me the numbers behind me, and until I have them I shall not make any attempt to interfere with existing legislation."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—You cannot go at a thing like a bull at a gate. That would never do.

Mr. FRAZER. — The Prime Minister stated publicly that he would remove the section of the Immigrants Restriction Act, to which I have referred, when he was in a position to do so. If he is ever to be in such a position, surely now, when he is at the head of the Federal Government should be the time? If he is not prepared to endeavour to remove that section of the Immigration Restriction Act and the section of the Post and Telegraph Act prohibiting the employment of lascars on mail boats subsidized by the Commonwealth, the right honorable gentleman, having betrayed the pledges he has given to the people of the country, is not a fit person to be administering its legislation.

Mr. KENNEDY.—The right honorable gentleman said that the electors at the last election did not give him the numbers to carry out his own desire.

Mr. FRAZER. — If the honorable gentleman is beaten on one occasion, does he turn his back upon proposals of which he has previously expressed approval, and offer to fight no more, or does he fight on?

Mr. SPENCE.—It depends upon the tactics of the time.

Mr. FRAZER.—At the present time it depends upon whether a recess is in view. Dealing with the tobacco monopoly, the right honorable gentleman has stated that a proposal has been introduced by the Labour Party, which would have the effect of taking that industry out of the control of private enterprise, and placing it in the hands of the Commonwealth Government, and he is against such a proposal. I regret very sincerely that a notice of motion on the business-paper, of business yet to come before the House, prevents me from going as exhaustively as I intended into the question of the tobacco monopoly, and its effects on the people of the Commonwealth. I must, however, say in connexion with that matter, that I hope to have the privilege a little later on of proving to the members of this House that the net profit which is likely to come into the hands of the people of the State, as the result of nationalizing this one monopoly, is estimated on the most reliable figures which it is possible to obtain at the present time at no less than £673,454 per annum.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Is that allowing for Excise?

Mr. FRAZER.—That is allowing for everything in connexion with the payment of Excise, and the manufacture and preparation of the tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes consumed in the Commonwealth. I candidly confess that I leave the discussion of this subject to-day with very considerable regret. This amount of £673,454 added to the £600,000, or about that sum, at present returned as surplus revenue to the States, would amount to the tidy sum of about £1,300,000. On the statistics supplied by Mr. Coghlan, the most reliable it is possible to secure at the present time, such a sum would go far to make up the amount which would be required for a Commonwealth scheme of old-age pensions. The Labour Party expect very considerable assistance from this source in finding the money necessary to give effect to that most laudable proposal. In connexion with the constitution of the Cabinet, a matter in connexion with which I could exert no influence when it was formed, I remind honorable members that I expressed by way of interjection my opinion that in the formation of the Ministry the right honorable member for East Sydney was up to his old games, and would probably do what would amount almost to an insult to the people of Australia. I do not wish to be misunderstood in this matter. I say that in the appointment of the honorable member for Gippsland as a member of the Cabinet, and by the announcement that he was a good protectionist, and was being appointed to preside over the Customs administration, there was almost an admission on the part of the Prime Minister that he did not think the citizens of Australia would trust him if he placed a free-trader in that position. We had from the honorable member for Parramatta last night the statement that he does not think that a protectionist should have been placed in the position. That would make it appear that that honorable member also believes that the people of Australia would be justified in coming to the conclusion to which I have referred. I have just a word to say with regard to the right honorable member for Swan. From a Western Australian point of view, another serious question arises in connexion with the formation of the present Ministry. I am again placed in a most unfortunate position, because, as is usual when an honorable member desires to say anything to the right honorable member for East Sydney, he happens to be out of the Chamber. That appears to be a chronic complaint.

Mr. PAGE.—The right honorable gentleman was always accusing Sir Edmund Barton of the same thing when he was Prime Minister.

Mr. FRAZER.—In forming his Cabinet the Prime Minister stated that he proposed to select its members irrespective of the States from which they came, and to select only the most competent men for the vacant positions. In doing so, the right honorable gentleman has established a precedent which is not likely to develop a patriotic sentiment in all portions of Australia. But, if we accept the right honorable gentleman's statement, and consider the Cabinet he has formed, it does not pay a very high compliment to the right honorable member for Swan. It is a most remarkable thing that that right honorable gentleman should have been left out of the present Ministerial combination. I cannot read the thoughts of the right honorable member for East Sydney, and I am, therefore, unable to say why he has not included a representative of Western Australia in his Cabinet; but if its members were selected on the ground of ability, knowledge of the various public Departments, and a strong hand to administer, the right honorable member for Swan has not much for which to thank the present Prime Minister.

Mr. McDONALD.—Especially when the right honorable gentleman has dropped the High Commissioner Bill.

Mr. FRAZER.—Western Australia is cut off from representation in the present Cabinet. Though there is a prospect of communication in the future which will bring us closer together, we are now in that State far from the stir of eastern life. The Prime Minister has treated us as though we were at a great distance, and as though he had not much to expect from our State. Not only has the right honorable gentleman left us without a representative in this Government, but when he was delivering his addresses to the people of Australia, he forgot all about us, and it was only after he had written his letter that it occurred to him to mention us in the postscript. The right honorable gentleman said that Western Australia had no representative in the Cabinet, but he asked the people of that State to accept him as their representative. I expect that the Prime Minister intended that to be regarded as a joke. Politically, he has been a joker all his life. When he went over to Western Australia at the beginning of last year, to be present at the opening of the Coolgardie water scheme, he made a number of speeches in that State, and these were followed by the result that every man who stood upon his ticket after he had been over to the State to assist the party went down with a sickening thud. I say that we have but little to thank the right honorable gentleman for. Politically, I distrust him, and I think Western Australia distrusts him. We have not been well treated in the formation of his Cabinet. The vast majority of the representatives of that State are on this side of the House, and so far as I am concerned I shall take advantage of every opportunity and every legitimate political means to have the right honorable gentleman removed from his present office, and to secure the removal from positions of power and responsibility in this country of other Ministers who are, I believe, the enemies of progress.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan).—There seems a probability of the debate being a very prolonged one, and there is apparently a disinclination on the part of some honorable members to rush into the fray; but I see no reason to delay my remarks on the subject. I have been struck by the fact that this motion has been submitted by the honorable member for Bland, in whose Ministry the House practically expressed its want of confidence a few days ago. I do not know what may be said by other honorable members as to the constitutional position, but it seems to me that an honorable member whose Ministry has been defeated, either on a direct motion of want of confidence or on a division which it was well known involved the fate of the Government, has no right a few days later to move a motion of want of confidence in the succeeding Administration. The House practically said a few days ago that it had no confidence in the Ministry of which the present leader of the Opposition was the head.

Mr. PAGE.—It has never said so.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It has practically said so. Every one knew that if the late Government were defeated on the motion relating to the recommitment of clause 48 it would retire from office.

Mr. BAMFORD.—What about the honorable and learned member for Bendigo?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not know anything about his position, and if I did, I should not discuss it; but I know that the division in question was followed by the retirement of the late Ministry. The members of a Ministry which has been defeated and has resigned, should not immediately come back to the same House with the same personnel, and ask for a renewal of its confidence.

Mr. McDONALD.—I have seen it done.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Perhaps in some State Parliament, but, in my opinion, it ought not to be done.

Mr. PAGE.—What about the dissolution of the Queensland Parliament which took place a little while ago?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—A dissolution is a very different matter.

Mr. PAGE.—But the same Ministry came back.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They had not resigned, and the other side could not form a Government. Honorable members know very well that the resignation of a Ministry is never accepted by a Governor until another has been formed, or practically formed. I hold certain views on this aspect of the question; but honorable members are, of course, free to differ from me. I repeat that an honorable member whose Government has been defeated, and has resigned, is not the right man to move a want of confidence motion in the succeeding Government a few days later.

Mr. FISHER.—Will the right honorable member quote an authority for his assertion?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not know of any case in which a different course has been pursued, except, perhaps in one of the States Parliaments of Australia, where they create precedents for themselves.

Mr. THOMAS.—It has been done in South Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—An honorable member who adopts such a course flouts the House, unless he gives a full and satisfactory reason for his exceptional action. The House has said that it has no confidence in the late Ministry.

Mr. WATKINS.—The right honorable member has never had any experience in this connexion; he never had any opposition in Western Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The speech delivered by the leader of the Opposition, in support of the motion, showed that his heart was not in his task. It lacked that fire which usually characterizes his utterances, and, as a matter of fact, he did not place before us any good ground for refusing to give the Government a trial in the same way as his Ministry was given a four months' trial to prove its worth.

Mr. HUME COOK.—But the right honorable member would not have given the late Government a week's trial.

An HONORABLE MEMBER.—Or a day's trial.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I should not have given them a week's trial if I had had my own way, but that was due to only one reason; that, in my opinion, they had not a majority in this House. During the course of this debate we have heard a great deal of the ancient political history of New South Wales. I agree with the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne that it is time that we set aside such matters, and confined our attention to that which has taken place in this Parliament. We should deal with that which has been said and done here, and refrain from basing our arguments on something which has been done or said years ago by some honorable member in one of the States Parliaments. I rejoice that honorable members of what is called the Labour Party—and as I have already defined the meaning of the term, I need not do so again—are in Opposition. I prefer to see them there, or in possession of the Treasury benches, rather than directing the Government from the cross-benches.

Mr. PAGE.—Can the right honorable member give us one instance in which we directed the Government of which he was a member?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes; the great pressure which was exerted resulted in section 16 of the Postal Act being inserted in the Bill, and the previous action of the Government in the Senate being reversed. The Labour Party, as members of the Opposition, have now a responsibility which they never felt while they sat on the cross benches. They are no longer a power in the back-ground, felt, but not seen. The party have now a burden to carry. It rests upon them either to introduce measures for the welfare and advancement of the Commonwealth, or to oppose them, and to take the full responsibility for their actions. My remarks might not be so apropos if the party were a small one, but as it is as large as, if not larger than, any other party in the House, it must be recognised that it now has a responsibility which, except when the Labour Government held office, was not apparently cast upon it. We shall now have their physic direct from their own hands. We shall not have to take physic from a third party, as has been the custom, not only in this Parliament, but in all the States Parliaments of Australia, in which there is a Labour Party. Hitherto they have not been so numerically strong as they are, but they have occupied the position of a third party, with the balance of power, and have wielded that enormous power that all third parties similarly situated exercise in the administration of the affairs of a country.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Does not the right honorable member think that we gave the Government, of which he was a member, a good innings?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member for Bland no longer occupies that commanding position of real power which he held for the three years, during which his party sat on the cross benches. It is no longer "Yes, Mr. Watson." The honorable member is now a humble suppliant for an alliance, in order that he may regain the power that he has lost, and which, of course, he desires again to exercise.

Mr. CARPENTER.—It is now "Yes, Mr. Cameron."

Sir JOHN FORREST. — It is at any rate no longer "Yes, Mr. Watson." It is, in my opinion, a very good thing that we now have no party sitting on the cross benches, dominating the affairs of the Commonwealth, and accepting no responsibility. It is highly desirable that those who have the real power should also bear the responsibility. My honorable friends opposite and their leader must have realized long ago how foolish they were to disturb the Deakin Government.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—We did not desire them to resign.

Mr. PAGE.—The right honorable member was the disturbing element.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They must realize that, although they were at one time a "Samson" in the House, they have since had their hair clipped, and that the strength, power and influence which they wielded for several years has now disappeared. They have had to make a humble alliance with protectionist members who have seceded from the Protectionist Party.

Mr. MALONEY.—The protectionists on the Government side are the seceders.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The Opposition will see who are the seceders when we go before the people.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Some one interjected a moment or two ago that I was not willing that honorable members opposite should remain in office for even a day. That is not quite accurate.

Mr. FISHER.—The right honorable member said in this House that he was not willing that they should.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think I said that I would not give the Labour Government time to formulate a policy, but I assert most distinctly that the leader of the Labour Party, according to ordinary constitutional usage, had no right whatever to form a Government. I expressed that opinion when he first formed his Ministry, and I reiterate it. If the representative of the Sovereign sends for an honorable member to form a Government, that honorable member must be able to give his Excellency an assurance that he has reasonable grounds for the belief that he has a majority behind him.

Mr. GROOM. — Did the present Prime Minister give that assurance?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I know that the honorable member for Bland, when sent for by the Governor-General, had made no representations to either of the other two parties in the House. Knowing that he had no support except that coming from the members of his own party, he accepted from the Governor-General the commission to form a Government to control the affairs of the Commonwealth, and he formed a Ministry when, so far as I know, he had the support of only a minority. He might have had great hopes, but those hopes should have had some tangible foundation.

Mr. WATSON.—He had the suggestion of fair-play from this side of the House.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — Surely the honorable member did not expect those who had been defeated by him to keep his Government in office if it were in a minority?

Mr. PAGE.—It is because we believe that the present Government is in a minority that we wish to put it out of office.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Honorable members have interjected again and again, that I desired to oust the Labour Government from office from the very first day that they met the House. The suggestion, apparently, is that I had some personal objection to the honorable member for Bland assuming office. That was not the case. The honorable member is just as good a man to hold office as is any other member of the House. My sole objection to his Government was based upon constitutional grounds, but if my contention in that respect be erroneous, then my argument, of course, falls to the ground.

Mr. WATKINS.—Did not the right honorable member and his party remain in office when they were in a minority?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No; I have already explained the difference between the position of the Barton and Deakin Governments and that occupied by the Watson Government. We were there, and had to be displaced.

Mr. GROOM.—And the other party got there.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes, by accepting office contrary to constitutional usage.

Mr. GROOM.—But, having got there, they had the same argument in support of their position as the right honorable gentleman's party had.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member is too keen a lawyer not to see my point, and it is, therefore, useless for him to interrupt me in this way. We were in office before the first general election took place, and we remained in office until we were defeated on what we had made a vital question. That is altogether different from the position of a Government which assumes office without having a majority at its back. I will state a case to explain my contention. A Government is defeated, and an honorable member, who, perhaps, may be the weakest man in the House, is sent for by the Governor-General; he undertakes to form a Government, but gives no assurance to His Excellency that he has a majority; he comes down to the House and asks for an adjournment of three or four weeks in order to formulate his policy, occupies the Government benches and controls the affairs of this country for a couple of months, and never had any chance whatever of commanding a majority. Now I am sure that honorable members do not desire to see such a state of things. I admit that the honorable member for Bland nearly had a majority, but he could not have commanded an absolute majority of the House if a no-confidence motion had been moved.

Mr. WATSON.—I was assured that I had a majority in case a no-confidence motion was moved.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Was the honorable member assured of that?

Mr. WATSON.—Yes. I was assured of that by honorable members whose word I accepted, and whom I have never reproached for taking their own course.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—My point is not that the honorable member might not have gained strength as he went along, but that at the time he undertook the formation of his Government he had not that assurance which was essential.

Mr. MAUGER.—How does the right honorable member know that?

Sir JOHN FORREST. — That is my whole point. If he had such an assurance, all my argument falls to the ground.

Mr. THOMAS.—Next week we will see whether the Prime Minister has a majority.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is a very different case. The point upon which the leader of the Opposition was turned out was equivalent to a no-confidence motion, and there was a majority in favour of it.

Mr. THOMAS.—Was not the amendment with regard to the railway servants equivalent to a no-confidence motion?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It was never made such.

Mr. PAGE.—But the Deakin Government went out upon it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There were different combinations operating against the Deakin Government. I should like to assure my honorable friends opposite that any objection which at any time I have taken to the actions of the honorable member for Bland, and those who supported him, were not based upon any personal grounds whatever. I have no personal feeling against honorable members opposite.

Mr. PAGE.—We all know that.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Well, I am much obliged to the honorable member for saying so, because I am sometimes led to believe, from interjections and remarks which are made, that I am thought to be opposed to honorable members opposite, because they belong to the Labour Party. I have no such feeling.

Mr. THOMAS.—The right honorable member never called us “steerage passengers.”

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am personally just as friendly with honorable members opposite as I am with honorable members who sit behind the Government. My objection to the policy of the Labour Party is not personal, but is based on public grounds.

Mr. THOMAS.—The right honorable member is the most popular man in the House.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — Honorable members opposite know perfectly well that I am opposed to them because of their programme, which I call socialistic, and because of their methods. But I must say that the members of the Labour Party in this House are far more moderate than those outside whom they represent—those who go haranguing and preaching all over the country, and whose views are represented in labour journals, like the Tocsin and the Worker, seem to be different people altogether. But I cannot forget that the members of the Labour Party in this House are the representatives of those persons. I cannot forget that, moderate as they are, they are the representatives of people whose principles and political views are by no means moderate.

Mr. WATSON.—The right honorable member merely practises Socialism; he never preaches it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not believe in the programme of the Labour Party, nor do I approve of the position which they occupy in this House in relation to their constituents. I consider that that position is not one which representatives of the people ought to occupy. I do not see why the unions should treat their representatives as they do, hampering them in the exercise of their duties, and depriving them of their independence.

Mr. SPENCE.—They do not hamper us.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It must be so. If they are continually passing resolutions, disapproving of what their representatives do in this House, those representatives cannot act as independently and as freely as they ought to do.

Mr. FISHER.—The organizations in the constituency of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat are passing resolutions against him.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He is not altogether dependent upon them for his position in this House. In my opinion, the position occupied by the members of the Labour Party, not only in the Federal Parliament, but in the Parliaments of the States, is not that of representatives. They are delegates of the unions. I trust that the time will soon come when a wider and more liberal view will be taken of representatives sent to Parliament than appears to be taken now. Every single action that honorable members opposite take, if they exercise their own judgment, is adversely criticised, and the resolutions passed are scattered broadcast throughout the unions of Australia.

Mr. FOWLER.—The same thing happens outside the labour unions.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not to the same extent. At all events, other organizations do not seem to have the same power. They have not, for instance, the power of nomination, as is the case with the labour unions. That power appears to be most drastic. My honorable friend, the member for Perth, has to get the support of some sort of caucus before he can even be nominated as a candidate.

Mr. FOWLER.—I have every confidence that they will do the right thing.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member's confidence may yet receive a rude shaking.

Mr. MALONEY.—Would not the right honorable member like that?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That does not seem to me to be the position a representative ought to occupy. It is delegation, and not representation. Honorable members opposite represent the unions. They do not represent the people as a whole.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Whom did the right honorable member's nominees represent at the last election?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If we nominate any persons they are at liberty to forget their nominators.

Mr. SPENCE.—What does the right honorable member do with them then?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is not as easy to do anything with them, as it seems to be with honorable members opposite. My honorable friend, the member for Perth, made a speech last night. He knows that I have a great respect for him as a man and as a member of this House. Therefore anything that I say concerning him will not be said from any but friendly motives. But I must say that it is open to those who are opposed to the honorable member to say that there never was a finer piece of acting than his in the apparently earnest speech which he made.

Mr. FOWLER.—There was no acting about it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It might have been regarded as a very fine piece of acting. The object of it was, I suppose, to show that the caucus could not bind him in the matter at issue, and that he was independent.

Mr. BAMFORD.—It cannot bind any one.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The speech, as I say, was intended to show that the honorable member for Perth was independent, and that he would let his party know that they could not bind him to support the new alliance. He made it clear that he thought that those who had formerly called the members of his party by opprobrious names—who had said that the Labour Party was a sham and a fraud—ought not to be accepted in alliance until they had apologized. But when it came to the point, what did the honorable member do?

Mr. WATSON.—The disappointing part of the speech was the end of it!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think I am justified in saying that the speech was, after all, only a little bit of "fast and furious." Notwithstanding all he had said, the honorable member for Perth declared that he would support the motion. He was bold enough to bark, but not bold enough to bite. If I did not know the honorable member as well as I do, I should say that it was a capital piece of acting, intended to show how independent he was, although it really showed that he did not intend to exercise his independence, even in respect to an alliance with persons who had called his party a sham and a fraud. I want to ask the honorable member this question—Suppose that the motion of the honorable member for Bland is successful, and that honorable members opposite form a coalition Government, including some of the persons who have called his party a fraud, and a sham? Where will he be then?

Mr. SPENCE.—Does not the right honorable member recollect that the present Prime Minister called him and his party, plunderers, thieves, and brigands?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have never seen or heard that he has done so. The honorable member for Perth has said that those honorable members who have attacked his party ought to apologize. I ask him again—if this motion is successful, what will be his position in sitting behind a new Government, and voting with those whom he denounced last night?

Mr. FOWLER.—I will carry out my pledges, and that is all.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But those pledges mean everything. The honorable member will do exactly what the party does. He will do what the unions tell him to do.

Mr. FOWLER.—It is not fair to say that. I have acted on my own responsibility on several occasions in this House.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I remember one, and I think that the honorable member had a good deal of trouble about it. I do not profess for a moment to be well grounded in the rules and regulations of the Labour Party; but it seems to me to be rather inconsistent that the rules and regulations of that party affecting State elections, should be more stringent and far-reaching than those affecting candidature for the Federal Parliament.

Mr. FOWLER.—The circumstances are different.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think the circumstances are very different, though, as the honorable member must have noticed, the conditions of candidature vary in each State.

Mr. FOWLER.—The conditions vary according to requirements.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—And yet, after all, the unions are composed of the same people. In Western Australia, for instance, the conditions of candidature of the Labour Party as regards the State Parliament, and the conditions of candidature of the Labour Party as regards the Federal Parliament may, or may not, be different; but it seems to me that the objects in each case are the same. Therefore, I do not think much of the argument that the conditions of the Federal Labour Party are less stringent than the conditions of the States Labour Party. The two seem to be so interwoven that the same conditions really apply in each case.

Mr. FISHER.—Does the right honorable member not see that the programmes are different, because the members of the party are free men?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But the same associations nominate the candidates for both Parliaments, and it seems to me that the principles which govern them cannot be very different—the objects they have in view are exactly the same.

Mr. FISHER.—They are intelligent men, and know their own business best.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—However, I would like the conditions of candidature to appear in Hansard, and, therefore, I propose to read them to honorable members. There is a good deal of talk about these conditions, and I find them in a little publication from the north.

Mr. FISHER.—Hear, hear; the Queensland Worker!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The conditions are as follow:—

1. That all candidates for the Federal Parliament shall sign the following pledge:—I hereby edge myself not to oppose the candidate selected by the recognised political labour organization—is a “big order” to say a man shall not oppose a league candidate. The honorable member for Perth, after years of service, would not be able to become a candidate if he were not recognised by the political labour organization.

Mr. THOMAS.—A man may be nominated on his own account without going before the organization for selection.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But in that case he would be a “black-leg”—not a member of the Labour Party at all. Doubtless the honorable member for Perth would be over to our side then. The pledge proceeds—

If elected, to do my utmost to carry out the principles embodied in the Federal Labour Platform, and on all questions affecting the platform—is difficult to say what this means—it might mean anything.

Mr. SPENCE.—We know the questions.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—“All questions affecting the platform”! Who is to answer what those questions are?

Mr. PAGE.—The right honorable member the platform before him.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Further—to vote as a majority of the Parliamentary Party decide at a duly constituted caucus meeting.

According to this, if there were twenty members, thirteen could absolutely rule over twelve.

Mr. WATSON.—There will always be more than twenty-five members in a league.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am speaking of the Parliamentary Party; that is, of the members of the Labour Party who are returned to Parliament.

Mr. THOMAS.—That is the “cabinet” of the Labour Party.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes; and it is a “big order” to make all the members bow down to what the majority may decide.

Mr. THOMAS.—That was done in the Cabinet of which the right honorable member was a member.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But that Cabinet was very much smaller.

Mr. TUDOR.—And the right honorable member was always in a minority.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The document proceeds—

2. That, subject to the acceptance of the Federal Platform and Pledge, each State shall control the selection of its candidates for the Federal Parliament.

3. That all labour candidates shall have a free hand on the fiscal question.

I should like to know where the Indi-Hume Party are in this matter. They have joined a party which has no fiscal faith; and I shall have something to say about them presently.

Mr. WATSON.—What is the right honorable member's fiscal faith at present?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am a moderate protectionist, and always have been.

Mr. THOMAS.—What does the right honorable member mean by that?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I could more easily explain what I mean than the honorable member could explain the meaning of the words “and on all questions affecting the platform.” A further condition is:—

4. That no member of the Federal Labour Party shall accept office in the Federal Government except with the consent of a duly constituted caucus of the party.

It seems to me that the members of the Labour Party are bound hand and foot. One of them may not even accept office without obtaining the consent of the majority. It seems to me that the Labour Party is becoming, if it is not already, an absolute menace to Parliamentary Government in this country; the members are a solid phalanx, and there is no room for individual views. In regard to a great many matters, which cover nearly the whole gamut of politics, they are a solid party; a machine controlled inside by the caucus, and outside by the labour unions.

Mr. FRAZER.—The right honorable member would never do for a caucus, that is certain!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is clear that if the party is fifty strong, twenty-six members will rule absolutely the others. Those conditions of candidature might have been all very well in the early days when the party was fighting an uphill battle, and had no chance of obtaining control of the destinies of either a State or the Commonwealth. Such conditions were excellent then, because in a small party unity is necessary if they are to exercise that influence without which nothing can be done. But circumstances have now changed, and honorable members opposite have become, in some cases, almost the dominant party in the House. Conditions which were good enough in the early days when the party were few in numbers, cannot apply to the altered circumstances; and, as sure as I stand here, they must break down.

Mr. PAGE.—The conditions are more necessary now than ever they were.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In my opinion that is not so, and I am sure that the conditions will break down.

Mr. THOMAS.—Why is the right honorable gentleman so anxious about us?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Because I hope the conditions will break down. I consider that a combination such as that the Labour Party presents, is an absolute danger to this country. Freedom of action is denied, and a large body of men are bound together on a platform embracing numerous matters of great importance, which come before Parliament. The conditions of the Labour Party are too stringent, and, as I say, are an absolute menace to the good government of the country. It places the absolute control of the minority of the party in the hands of the majority. Such a position has never been known in any Parliament in a British country.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Majorities always have control.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Not the control that is exercised by the members of the Labour Party, because volens volens they are bound, and if one breaks what I was going to call the almost sacred pledge, he must take the consequences.

Mr. PAGE.—We consider the pledge sacred.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Such conditions are all very well with a small party for the purposes of aggression, but in my opinion they cannot last; and I hope that the Labour Party will not be able to apply them in the administration of the Government.

Mr. ISAACS. — The conditions were all right when the Labour Party were supporting the Government of which the right honorable gentleman was a member.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think that that remark is very apropos, seeing that the honorable and learned member himself supported that Government.

Mr. ISAACS.—I did, and I was very sorry to see that Government go out.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member is not the first to use the jibe that the Labour Party supported for three years the Government of which I was a member. But why did the Labour Party support that Government? Because we were carrying out legislation which they desired; and there was some of that legislation which several members of that Government were not greatly in favour of, as I shall show directly.

Mr. WATSON.—What happens to a man who votes against his party in England, where there is no Labour Party in the sense understood here? Such a man goes out on his "pink ear."

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think so. Liberal-Unionists in England did not come to grief when they separated from the Liberal Party.

Mr. WATSON.—That was because they were adopted by another party.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Unionists in England stood alone for years.

Mr. WATSON.—No.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—At any rate, the members of that union were free men—they were not bound as are the members of the Labour Party. The speech of the honorable member for Perth last night might be described as a fine piece of acting.

Mr. FOWLER.—I rise to a point of order. I take exception to the continual assertion that I was guilty last night of a piece of acting. I was never more in earnest in my life, and the right honorable gentleman knows that.

Mr. SPEAKER.—What is the point of order?

Mr. FOWLER.—Is the right honorable member in order in accusing me of acting—in misrepresenting my statements?

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable member for Perth is displeased with the expression used, I am quite sure the right honorable member for Swan will withdraw it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Certainly, I withdraw it absolutely. I do not think that the honorable member was acting, but I say that his delivering the speech he did, and then declaring his intention to vote for the motion, might give people the idea that he was acting. I believe the honorable member to be incapable of anything dishonorable. I should now like to say something about the alliance of the honorable members, led by the honorable and learned member for Indi, with the Labour Party. The real reason which actuates the honorable and learned member for Indi, and those supporting him in joining the Labour Party, is their desire to have the Tariff revised; but the honorable member for Bland, when submitting the motion before the House, never once mentioned the Tariff. Why? Because the free-traders of his party would not allow him to do so.

Mr. McCAY.—The caucus had forbidden it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The leader of the Opposition was not able to say one word about the Tariff in connexion with the alliance.

Mr. PAGE.—It is said that there is a Tariff truce; why mention the matter?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I say that this alliance, so far as the main object which those who have seceded from the main body of protectionists have in view—

Mr. GROOM.—The right honorable member left us after he had assisted in passing a resolution declaring he would not.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Who is the honorable and learned member's leader?

Mr. GROOM.—The right honorable member's leader is the Prime Minister.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member has deserted not only his party, but also his leader.

Mr. GROOM.—I keep to my principles.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I should like to know where those principles are; perhaps the honorable and learned member will tell us where he keeps them.

Mr. GROOM.—They would not be safe in the keeping of the right honorable member.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The main reason for this great alliance has been treated by the leader of the Opposition with contemptuous silence, and has been repudiated by the honorable member for Perth, who will have nothing to do with seceders from the protectionist party who have referred to the Labour Party as a sham and a fraud, unless they apologize. The honorable member for Bourke had better set about making an abject apology.

Mr. HUME COOK.—I will correct a misstatement at the right time.

Mr. FOWLER.—I gave other reasons as well.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I assume that the honorable and learned member for Indi and the other protectionists have joined the Labour Party in order that the Tariff may be reconsidered, but the honorable member for Bland has not promised to re-open the question if this motion be carried. Honorable members must think that the public are rather stupid if they suppose that they will be misled by their action in giving notice of motions for the appointment of a Royal Commission to consider the working of the Tariff, and to inquire into the tobacco trade, immediately before the moving of a motion of want of confidence. We might have expected from the mover of this no-confidence motion a statement of the terms of the alliance between the Labour Party and the protectionist seceders, and he might have told us what he was going to do for them.

Mr. WATSON.—There is plenty of time yet for a statement of policy by me.

Mr. PAGE.—What was the bunch of carrots which the right honorable member for East Sydney held out to the right honorable member for Swan to induce him to join the coalition?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The right honorable gentleman has not offered me anything. He made no overtures to me.

Mr. PAGE.—What did he offer the right honorable member's party?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Prime Minister has explained the terms upon which the Ministry was formed.

Mr. WATSON.—He said that the terms placed before the public were not adopted, and that the proposed coalition went by the board, so that there has been no statement of the terms of the present coalition.

Mr. ISAACS.—Up to the present, it is a secret treaty.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is no secrecy so far as I am concerned. The party of which I am a member went to the country at the last general elections on a definite policy, which was announced at Ballarat by the then Prime Minister, in October last, when I was present as a member of his Government. Referring to the existing Tariff, he said—

We are prepared to preserve that Tariff, because we believe that the best boon to this community that its public men can give it is fiscal peace.

Further on, he said—

We are willing to wait and trust to experience, to show our confidence in the working of the protectionist part of this Tariff.

That was the pith of the policy upon which we went to the country, and I believe that every member of the party adopted it. But what has been the action of the honorable and learned members for Indi, and Darling Downs, of the honorable members for Hume and Bourke, and others? This alliance with the Labour Party is founded on the repudiation of their public pledges to their constituents and to the people of Australia.

Mr. ISAACS.—The right honorable member should justify the statement that I gave any such pledge to my constituents.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I hold that the honorable and learned member who was a leading member of the Protectionist Party, by his silence, assented to the programme put forward by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. He was returned as a supporter of the Deakin Administration, and it is idle for him to say now that he did not in the main support the policy of his leader in regard to fiscal peace. That policy was very clearly enunciated, and the Age newspaper, which supported the Deakin Government, declared in no uncertain terms for it. In its leading columns, of the 30th October, I find the following:—

The first and foremost necessity of the times is a truce on the fiscal question. As long as that struggle goes on, it bars the way to any progressive legislation on other national or social questions. There is a time to draw the sword and a time to sheath it. All the interests of trade and industrial development demand for the present a cessation of fiscal hostilities.

Therefore I ask why this falling off on the part of the honorable and learned member for Indi, and on the part of the honorable member for Bourke, and others, all of whom have now joined the Labour Party? Not only have honorable members seceded from the Protectionist Party, and repudiated the pledges which they made to their constituents, and to the people of Australia, but they have deserted their leader.

Mr. STORRER.—He deserted us.

Mr. ISAACS.—We would not follow him into the enemy's camp.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not believe in deserting my leader, or in profiting by desertion, as the honorable and learned member for Indi will do if this motion succeeds.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That is not true.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He will be a member of any coalition Government.

Mr. FISHER.—It is not so.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Well, I withdraw the remark. The policy of fiscal peace, announced by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, was universally accepted by the Protectionist Party.

Mr. RONALD.—No.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not mean to say that every individual protectionist accepted it; but it was accepted by the party throughout Australia. I do not know what was said in Queensland and Tasmania, but in Victoria and in New South Wales, "fiscal peace" was the election cry of the Protectionist Party.

Mr. McDONALD.—What they declared for in Western Australia was labour.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am dealing now with the fiscal issue. What did the honorable member for Barker say upon this matter? He is a protectionist, and was a member of the Protectionist Party. He said—

The Tariff was not by any means perfect, but he was for fiscal peace during the next Parliament.

Surely that is a very clear pronouncement. What was my own position in Western Australia? My pledge to the electors of Western Australia, which was printed in the press, reads—

I am in favour of the existing Tariff being given a fair trial. It was arrived at after much labour and controversy, and I recognise it would be unwise to disturb it, and to do so at the present time would be detrimental to trade and injurious all round. The verdict of Australia at the coming elections will, I feel sure, be in accord with the above views.

The verdict of Australia was in accord with those views. Speaking for myself and all who belonged to the Protectionist Party at that time. I ask "Where is the mandate from our constituents to alter the Tariff?" We have none. The protectionists throughout Australia declared in unmistakable terms that they accepted the pronouncement of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat that there should be fiscal peace during the life of this Parliament. Where is the mandate of the honorable and learned member for Indi, or the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, or the honorable member for Hume, or the honorable members for Bourke and Melbourne Ports, to ask for an alteration of the Tariff?

Mr. MAUGER.—That mandate comes from the exercise of common sense, and the knowledge that industries are being destroyed.

Mr. ISAACS.—We have the same mandate as has the right honorable member if he will only obey it.

Mr. GROOM.—We received no mandate to place ourselves under the free-trade leader.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In my opinion the protectionist supporters of the Government are as safe now as they were before. The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs will be absorbed, and will sign the pledge of the Labour Party.

Mr. GROOM.—I am quite prepared to run the risk.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What have the seceders done? They have joined a party which is very much stronger than is their own—a party which has no fiscal faith whatever.

Mr. CARPENTER.—They have not joined the Labour Party. The two parties are quite distinct.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — It has been stated that the agreement between the two parties has been confirmed.

Mr. ISAACS.—We have not been “gobbled” up by the Free trade Party.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The seceding protectionists have joined a party which has no fiscal faith whatever, and which helped to defeat the protectionist Government in this House. No matter what the members of the Labour Party may say to the contrary, the fact remains that they hurled the protectionist Ministry from power. Concerning the statement that I was not prepared to allow the Watson Administration to continue in office for a single day, I wish to say that had it not been for the fact that it was a Labour Ministry, it would have received a very much shorter shrift than it did. There was a general feeling in the House that a party which had had no experience of Ministerial office, should be accorded very generous treatment. We had as much chance of deposing that Government when it first met the House, as honorable members opposite have of succeeding with the present motion.

Mr. WATSON.—Not by a long way.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Honorable members opposite were conspiring all the time to defeat the Watson Government, but could not do so.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I repeat that there was a general desire that we should not act precipitately in regard to the Labour Party, which for the first time, had assumed the reins of Government. From the time when the Protectionist Party met in the room upstairs, and decided not to enter into an alliance with the Free-trade Party, no meeting has been held, and no agreement ratified in regard to the present coalition.

Mr. MAUGER.—The meeting to which the right honorable member refers, decided that there should be no coalition.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member should be ashamed to make any mention of that meeting. He attended with a determination to prevent any coalition being arranged. He was present only for the purpose of creating trouble and obstruction.

Mr. MAUGER.—And I succeeded.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member temporarily succeeded, but I am satisfied that, within a brief period, we shall again have him in the fold. The alliance between the protectionists and free-trade members upon the Ministerial side of the House is not the result of any agreement arrived at by meetings called for the purpose. But we believe that Australia will be better governed by the present Administration than it would be by honorable members opposite.

Mr. MAUGER.—That decision was not arrived at by any meeting which was held.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There are some agreements which are better than those made with pen and ink—I mean agreements which are arrived at by mutual consent in cases where people come together of their own accord.

Mr. MAUGER.—Four seats in the Cabinet represent good pie all the same.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—At any rate, I am not a member of the Government. I believe, however, that I can accomplish just as much good on behalf of Western Australia, and exert quite as much influence as a private member as I could if I filled a position in the Cabinet. I am not so foolish as to think that a coalition Government can find portfolios for everybody. Those who will not abstain from urging any claims which they may have reason to believe they possess, in a time of great difficulty, must be satisfied to be branded as self-seekers.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Does the right honorable member think that he will get back next time?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Certainly. I may add that neither directly nor indirectly was I ever consulted by any member of the Ministry concerning the programme which they have submitted. I had confidence that they would do what was just to Western Australia, and if they had not I was free to express my dissent, and to act as I considered best.

Mr. GROOM.—They did nothing.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They have brought forward one measure in which I was specially interested—the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill.

Mr. ISAACS.—Oh!

Sir JOHN FORREST.—At any rate it is to my credit that I never had any conversation with Ministers upon that subject.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—The motion relating to the survey of that line was carried with the aid of members of the Labour Party.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am very much obliged to them for their assistance. Honorable members are aware how very interested I am in that project, and knowing the intimacy which exists between members of the Government and myself, may have been disposed to think that I requested them to include that measure in their programme. But neither directly nor indirectly did I ever mention the subject to them. Of course it would be idle for me to deny that I was aware of the compact which was made between the honorable and learned member for Ballarat and the present Prime Minister.

Mr. ISAACS.—What was that compact?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I refer to the compact into which they entered, subject to the approval of their respective parties. I knew that that compact would be the basis of any understanding which might be arrived at between those parties. I was in favour of it—

Mr. MAUGER.—The majority were opposed to it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I had every confidence that that compact would form the basis of any alliance which might be entered into.

Mr. MAUGER.—The right honorable member seceded from the Protectionist Party in order to get it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I mentioned the subject of the Transcontinental Railway for a purpose. The Deakin and Watson Administrations having approved of the Bill relating to the survey of that line, it was only reasonable to assume that the coalition Government would approve of it.

Mr. McDONALD.—Then there is no credit due to the right honorable member.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But I wish to show the view which is entertained by a member of the other branch of the Legislature, who is at present upon a visit to Western Australia. In the West Australian, of 6th September, Senator Croft is reported to have said—

We have no idea as to what Mr. Reid's policy is likely to be, but I am credibly informed that it will contain little or no reference to the Trans-Australian Railway, and will not even provide for a survey in that connexion.

I should like to know by whom he was "credibly informed." My idea is that he was not credibly informed, and it would take a lot of persuasion to induce me to think otherwise. Another paragraph appeared in the West Australian newspaper of the 8th September, quoting the right honorable member for East Sydney as stating as a part of his policy—

We propose to deal with the Bill providing for a survey of the Transcontinental Railway line.

Yet Senator Croft said that he was credibly informed that nothing would be done. Does any honorable member in this House believe that the honorable senator was credibly informed to that effect? If no communication was made to me or to my friends, how could this wiseacre who went to the West have been "credibly informed" to that effect?

Mr. CARPENTER.—Knowing the opponents of the railway who were in the Ministry, we were a little suspicious about it until we saw the policy stated.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Do honorable members think that, in my position as a supporter of the Government, I would not have been informed if the Ministry did not propose to do anything?

Mr. SPENCE.—No; the right honorable member would not be consulted at all.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—All I can say is that if Senator Croft was "credibly informed," no one else was so informed. These pure-minded patriots go about the country trying to create ill-will and mischief by making statements which have no foundation.

Mr. CARPENTER.—It is not so bad as sending telegrams.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am willing to stand by anything I have sent.

Mr. WATSON.—I suppose that Senator Croft is equally ready to stand by what he said.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Then let the honorable senator say who “credibly informed” him.

Mr. McDONALD.—Considering the speech delivered by the honorable member for Gippsland, and the fact that the honorable member represented half the head of the Government, was it not a natural conclusion for Senator Croft to come to?

Mr. McLEAN.—I stated in the speech to which the honorable member refers that I hoped the Government would get the fullest possible information.

Mr. McDONALD. — But the honorable gentleman denounced the proposal in another speech, made in Gippsland.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The other day when the honorable member for Bland gave notice of the motion of want of confidence in the Government, I interjected that if the Western Australian members of the Labour Party had brought pressure to bear upon the honorable member he would never have precipitated his motion until the Kalgoorlie-Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill had had a fair chance of being got out of the way. I said that if those honorable members had supported the proposals in the way they ought, the honorable member for Bland would not have done anything so detrimental to Western Australia. The honorable member for Coolgardie, when replying to me, said:

I am afraid that my idea of loyalty to my leader and colleagues must be different from that cherished by the right honorable member for Swan.

Loyalty to his leader and his colleagues! What about loyalty to his constituency and his State?

Mr. CARPENTER. — The right honorable member does not know what the honorable member for Coolgardie had done for his State that same morning.

Sir JOHN FORREST. — We do not know what the honorable member did, but we know what he said. The honorable member spoke of loyalty to his leader and his colleagues, but he said nothing whatever about his loyalty to his constituents and his State. It appears to me that, with the honorable member, they are a secondary consideration, and his first consideration is the Labour Party, to which he is bound hand and foot.

Mr. CARPENTER.—That is very unfair.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I say that it is absolutely true.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable member for Coolgardie had done everything for Western Australia that a man could that same morning.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not know what the honorable member may have done in caucus, that is not reported here.

Mr. MAHON.—I merely meant that I did not disclose Cabinet differences in this House.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have quoted the honorable gentleman's statement, when I told him that I thought he should have brought more pressure to bear on the honorable member for Bland. Do honorable members think that I would have approved of such a thing being done, as the honorable member for Coolgardie allowed to be done, especially when there was no reason or advantage to be gained by doing it?

Mr. MAUGER.—No; the right honorable member would have smashed things.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the party were to be injured, or some great catastrophe were likely to happen, it might be justified. But to avoid a few hours' delay in giving notice of a motion, the honorable member for Coolgardie sacrificed his loyalty to his constituency and his State for loyalty to his leader and his colleagues.

Mr. CARPENTER.—It was because of the conduct of honorable members opposite.

Mr. ISAACS.—It is not five minutes since the right honorable gentleman placed loyalty or so-called loyalty to a leader before loyalty to a whole country.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I absolutely deny that. Cannot the honorable and learned member for Indi allow other people to defend themselves? Must he always rush in? Is the honorable and learned member the only member with any sense in this House? Does he desire to be the protector of everybody?

Mr. ISAACS.—I wish to show how very little consistency there is in the right honorable gentleman.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Some honorable members opposite are good judges of consistency.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable and learned member for Indi is in a difficult position; and I suppose one must make some allowance for him. The first allegiance of members of the Labour Party is to the labour unions outside, and their constituents come second.

Mr. CARPENTER.—That is a very foolish statement to make.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I say that here, and I shall say it to the honorable member's constituents when I have the opportunity.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The right honorable gentleman says many foolish things.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—What is the shelving of that Bill, and the sacrificing of his own State to the honorable member for Coolgardie?

Mr. CARPENTER.—The right honorable gentleman's comrades on the other side sacrificed the Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Will the honorable member for Coolgardie deny that that Bill, which has been so longed for by the people of Western Australia, was shelved without any reason at all? I said at the time that the chief opponent of the Bill, the honorable member for Moira, had gone home. I was not then absolutely certain of the fact, but I find that I was correct. Surely, with all the means at the disposal of the party opposite, they could have found out where the honorable member for Moira was? The honorable member was on his way to the North, and probably at that time he was half way to his home on the Murray.

Mr. MAHON.—Did not the right honorable gentleman himself vote to shelve the Bill some time ago?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I say that this Bill, which is of so much importance to the people of Western Australia, was shelved, and I say that the honorable member for Coolgardie temporarily sacrificed his own State, because, when I objected to what had been done, the honorable member said that it had his full approval and indorsement—

Mr. MAHON.—Hear, hear. I repeat that now.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—This shows how much the honorable member cares for his constituents and the people of Western Australia. Why should the honorable member care for Western Australia? He is a stranger there; he is scarcely known to the people there, though he is a representative of the State.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Is this an electioneering address?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member for Coolgardie and I are personal friends, but that does not prevent me from telling the honorable gentleman the truth.

Mr. MAHON.—The right honorable gentleman knows very different from what he is now stating.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member did not look after his constituents the other day, or that wrong to the people of Western Australia would never have been perpetrated. There was no reason for it at all, unless it was to enable the honorable member for Bland and others to return to Sydney on Thursday instead of Friday. Was that a sufficient reason to justify the abandonment of a Bill which was so eagerly longed for by the people of Western Australia?

Mr. MAHON.—And which the right honorable gentleman was three years in office without advancing a single stage.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member has said that the Government of which he was a member did more, but they did nothing.

Mr. MAHON.—We did.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable gentleman and his Government found the resolution relating to the Governor-General's message on the table when the Deakin Government went out of office, and it was still there when the right honorable member for East Sydney came into office.

Mr. MAHON.—The right honorable gentleman put the Labour Government out, and in doing so he helped to shelve the Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Though what I have said may be considered by some honorable members to be ungenerous, it is not nearly so ungenerous as is the honorable gentleman's statement that, although I was three years in office, I did nothing. In view of the facts, that is a most ungenerous statement. I did all that I possibly could do, and I admit that the honorable gentleman helped me.

Mr. MAHON.—The statement is quite as true as what the right honorable gentleman said just now.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable gentleman may have acted in a weak moment, or thoughtlessly—

Mr. MAUGER.—The right honorable gentleman had better withdraw the statement.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I shall not withdraw it. I shall reiterate it in Western Australia, unless the honorable member for Coolgardie explains why he allowed this wrong to be perpetrated.

Mr. MAHON.—I shall explain what the right honorable gentleman did also.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The people of Western Australia do not know the honorable member for Coolgardie, and would not listen to him. The honorable member is stranger in Western Australia.

Mr. MAHON.—They know the right honorable gentleman too well.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Of what use is for the honorable gentleman to talk about what he will do? If he were to walk down the streets of any of the principal towns of Western Australia, the honorable gentleman could be unknown. He must know that, as well as I do.

Mr. MAHON.—Thirty thousand of them could not chase me to the railway station.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—People who do nothing are never found fault with. People who are unknown, who have no public service to their credit, have never anything laid against them. But the man who tries to do something for the benefit of his fellow-men, may depend upon it that he will tread upon the toes of a lot of people doing so.

Mr. MAHON.—Hear, hear. Let the right honorable gentleman send up one of his dogs to Coolgardie, and see how he will get on.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We shall do it. We shall try to secure that the place which owns the honorable gentleman shall know no more.

Mr. MAUGER.—The right honorable gentleman is excited.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—It is not excitement; it is only a little earnestness. During the last month or two, since I retired from office, and since I have been in a position to express myself freely, I have been misrepresented a good deal in this House. I wish the honorable member for Hume were present, because, although that honorable gentleman is an old colleague of mine, I desire to tell him that he was not correct something that he said. The honorable gentleman has said that, because I voted against some of the extreme clauses of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, I am, for that reason, opposed altogether to the Bill.

Mr. RONALD.—Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That might be used as an argument if I had no evidence to prove the contrary. But I was the first man in Australia to introduce and pass a compulsory Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, brought up to date with the provisions of the Act then in force in New Zealand, with one or two exceptions.

Mr. GROOM.—With preference to unionists?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No. That was not in the measure. I am opposed to preference to unionists, as being unnecessary and unfair. I do not think it was in the New Zealand Act at that time.

Mr. GROOM.—It was held to be.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not know that at the time. I do not think the State Parliament of Western Australia would have passed a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill giving one man an undue preference over another.

Mr. GROOM.—Has it passed it since?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I may tell the honorable and learned member that even now, though the measure I passed has been amended, with the assistance of the Labour Party, which was not in existence in my day, and has been liberalized in some directions and brought up to date with the New Zealand Act, there is no preference to unionists in it, and the Court in Western Australia has refused to give preference to unionists.

Mr. GROOM.—Has the Court held that it has not the power?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Court has held that the law in Western Australia does not permit of preference to unionists.

Mr. CARPENTER.—It does not direct the Court to give preference.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member for Fremantle will admit that the Court has refused to give it.

Mr. CARPENTER.—I admit that; the Court may not think it has the power.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am aware that there is a difference of opinion upon the point, but up to the present time, the Court has held that the law cannot be construed to mean that a preference shall be given to unionists. I repeat, that I was the first man in Australia to bring in a measure for compulsory arbitration. Whatever may be said against me, in respect of my action upon the extreme provisions upon which we divided—the inclusion of farmers, civil servants, and railway employés, and the giving of an undue preference to unionists—it is very unfair to say of me that I am opposed to the passing of any Conciliation and Arbitration Bill.

Mr. MAUGER.—But the provisions against which he voted were in the right honorable gentleman's Bill. As a member of the Government that introduced the Bill, the right honorable gentleman was responsible for it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member for Hume is in exactly the same position as myself in that respect. He voted against provisions appearing in the Bill as agreed to by the Deakin Cabinet, because he was opposed to them.

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable member for Hume desired to liberalize the measure.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have understood that if as a Minister one does not agree with any provision in a measure proposed by the Government to which he belongs, when he is no longer a Minister he is free to exercise his own judgment on such a provision. That is the understanding on which I have acted. It is, therefore, unfair to say that because I did not vote with the Labour Party on the few divisions that took place on extreme provisions in the Bill, I am opposed to the whole measure. The Bill I passed in Western Australia may not have been so up-to-date as present requirements demand, but circumstances change as the years roll on, and legislation has to be amended from time to time. When I introduced it in 1900, representatives of the labour organizations of Western Australia waited on me, and in the course of the interview said that my name would be always honored by the labour organizations of Australia as that of a man who had done good service in the cause for which they worked. Now I am told by the same persons that I am opposed to them.

Mr. CARPENTER.—Not by the same persons.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I voted against extreme provisions in the Federal Conciliation and Arbitration Bill because I had always been opposed to them.

Mr. FOWLER.—I do not think that any member of the Labour Party has said that the honorable member is opposed to the whole Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The honorable member for Hume has publicly said that I am, and I think the honorable member for Bland said I intended to destroy the Bill altogether.

Mr. FOWLER.—The honorable member for Hume is not a member of the Labour Party.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—In the course of my previous remarks, I made an unfortunate observation concerning those whom I called the seceding protectionists, who had deserted their leader and their party. I said, amongst other things, that they had done it because they hoped to make a profit out of it. I desire to say, before I go further, that that was a very improper observation on my part, which I very much regret, and I unreservedly withdraw it. I am informed that, when I was not in the House, the honorable member for Kalgoorlie referred to my having attended women's meetings in Victoria, but said that I had never done anything for women. I desire to point out that I gave the franchise to women in Western Australia, and that the franchise could not have been extended to them at that time without my assistance. Western Australia was the second State in Australia to extend the franchise to women. So that the honorable member was not correct if he said—as reported to me—that I had not done anything for the women of Australia.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The honorable member referred to the Prime Minister, and not to the right honorable member.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I understood that he referred to me, but if it is not so my remarks are not necessary.

Mr. McLEAN.—He referred to me, and to the right honorable member also.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—He certainly was in error in referring to me, because I stand second amongst the Premiers of the Australian States in this respect. The State of South Australia, either during the Premiership of the right honorable member for Adelaide, or during my Premiership, Mr. Speaker, was the first to extend the franchise to women. Western Australia, under my Premiership, was the second State to do so. I now wish to refer to a matter of very great importance to Australia and to all honorable members. It is the White Australia policy. What I have to say will be in opposition to section 16 of the Post and Telegraph Act. I am opposed, and personally always have been opposed, to the terms of that section, which provides that no contract or arrangement shall be made for the carriage of our mails in ships unless such ships are manned by white crews. I am very glad to have an opportunity to express my opinions on this subject. Every one must see that to mix up the question of coloured labour on mail ships with the question of a White Australia is a mistake. But lest any one should think that I am opposed to the White Australia policy, I wish to point out that I was the first Premier in Australia to introduce and pass through Parliament a measure founded on the Natal Act, which is practically the same legislation as we have in existence in the Commonwealth at the present time. I was in England at the Diamond Jubilee of her late Majesty in 1897, when the other Australian Premiers were there. We all agreed to do our best to pass through our respective Legislatures Bills based upon the Natal Act, rather than a measure embodying prohibition. Honorable members know that a measure involving prohibition was passed by the Parliament of New South Wales, but the Royal Assent was withheld. I carried out the promise which I made in England. I believe that my right honorable friend the Prime Minister also carried out his promise, and that a similar measure was passed by the Legislature of New South Wales. In Victoria a similar Bill was introduced by my right honorable friend the Treasurer, but he was not able to pass it. In South Australia it was introduced, I think, but afterwards withdrawn.

Mr. CARPENTER.—In South Australia we refused to accept the Natal principle.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The point which I wish to make is that I was the first Australian Premier to carry such a measure through the Legislature. If honorable members like to read my speeches in the Western Australian Parliament—I have quoted from them before in this House—they will see that there was no lack of sympathy on my part concerning the White Australia policy. But while I am in accord with the idea that we must do our utmost to keep Australia for the white race, I am altogether opposed to section 16 of the Post and Telegraph Act, and for many reasons. I may also point out that when I passed the Act to which I refer, and also when I passed the Conciliation and Arbitration Act, there was no payment of members and no Labour Party in Western Australia. Therefore, although there was plenty of pressure, and the conditions were difficult—as I suppose they are in all Parliaments—at the same time we had not a concrete body of members banded together to support their own platform such as we have in the Parliaments of Australia at the present time.

Mr. THOMAS.—The Opposition would have turned out the right honorable member if he had not passed those Bills.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—They could not have turned me out. The Opposition were very weak. The only way in which I could have been turned out was by the secession of some of my own supporters; and any honorable member who has had experience of party government is aware that very often a Minister experiences more difficulty from within, than from without. The point is that there was no Labour Party in Western Australia at that time.

Mr. MAHON.—Because the right honorable member would not give the people the franchise.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have already said that I not only extended the suffrage to men, but I also gave it to women.

Mr. MAHON.—It was said that the right honorable gentleman extended the franchise to women, in order to dish the gold-fields.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—When one gives anything, it is rather ungenerous, if it is not worse than ungenerous, to turn round and say that one gave it for a wrong purpose, or had an ulterior motive.

Mr. MAHON.—I am only imitating the right honorable member if I am ungenerous.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not desire to be ungenerous. Nevertheless, the fact remains that there was no Labour Party and no payment of members at that time in Western Australia. Of course, the absence of payment of members restricted the representation to some extent. There is no doubt, as every one will admit, that where there is no payment of members, many persons, who would otherwise be able to enter Parliament, cannot do so. My honorable friend, the member for Coolgardie, seems to be alert just now. Perhaps, I have made some point at his expense. But he must expect that. When members sit on different sides of the House, they are apt to be not so generous to one another as, perhaps, they would be if they were sitting on the same side. Hard hitting is not unfriendliness. In passing, as the honorable member has referred to matters of days now long ago, I may say that I am quite willing to be criticised in regard to every action in my political career. The honorable member referred to that unfortunate incident when he said 30,000 people on the gold fields—there were not nearly so many — hooted and mobbed me at Kalgoorlie in 1898. Why did the honorable member refer to that?

Mr. MAHON.—I always condemned their conduct.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But the honorable member said something about it tonight. I say that that incident is not to my discredit, because I was trying to benefit those poor people. And I did it, too. I did help them. I was told by my opponents that I helped them because I was afraid, inasmuch as they had mobbed me, and treated me badly. I was then three hundred miles away—in Perth—and why should I have been afraid? I could have stopped that disturbance or riot if I had been a little more conciliatory than I was. All that they wanted me to do was to address them. But I would not do it, because I was not going to be coerced. I told them that I would give them their answer in a certain time, but that I was not going to make a speech then. I knew that I could not give a satisfactory answer at that moment, and so I refused to address them. That is why I received such treatment. There was no ill will towards me. Their conduct was simply prompted by the fact that I refused to be coerced. I was offended and hurt at their action; that is why I did not do what perhaps on another occasion I should have done. I do not know why the honorable member should have referred to that incident. He has never been hooted by 10,000 people. And why? Because he has never had to exercise great power and authority. It is by the exercise of power—it is by going out of the ordinary channels, by insisting upon doing things which one thinks will result in good, that one makes enemies. I never blamed those poor hard-working fellows at Kalgoorlie, nor did I in any way resent what they did.

MR. MAHON.—Hear hear; that is quite true.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—They did not know they were hurting the feelings of one who had always tried to befriend them. I was working hard at that very time to bring them happiness and comfort; and I would trust my life to-day to the same men who mobbed and hooted me then.

MR. FRAZER.—They did not hoot the right honorable member when he went up again to open the water scheme.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—In regard to this White Ocean policy, I wish to consider the matter calmly and clearly. I think that we have made a great mistake. I was not here when the subject first came before the House. I was in Western Australia. But I believe if the records of the House are searched, it will be found that, although I was always opposed to the clause. I did not vote or speak against it. Still I think we made a great mistake. In endeavouring to protect this country from an invasion of alien coloured people, we went further than there was any necessity to go; and, in fact, we acted very foolishly. What is the history of the matter? In the Senate the Government introduced the Post and Telegraph Bill, and it was sought by the Labour Party in that House to insert a clause providing that no mail contract should be let to a shipping company which employed coloured crews. The then Vice-President of the Executive Council, Mr. R. E. O'Connor, resisted that clause with all his might, on behalf of the Government, and was able to prevent its adoption. When the Bill came to the House of Representatives, however, the clause, the consideration of which was postponed again and again, was eventually adopted under great pressure from the Labour Party. Mr. O'Connor was abandoned by the Government, or, it may be, he acquiesced in what was done. At any rate, when the Bill was returned to the Senate, Mr. O'Connor had to argue in favour of the clause, which then became a part of the measure.

MR. THOMAS.—How did the present Prime Minister vote on the clause?

SIR JOHN FORREST.—I do not know, but I should say the right honorable gentleman voted against the clause.

MR. THOMAS.—I doubt it.

SIR JOHN FORREST.—I myself was always opposed to the provision, but I was not well at the time, and had great domestic trouble, and the extent of my action was to express to my colleagues my disapproval of its inclusion. There are members of the Labour Party, and also of the Free-trade and the Protectionist Parties, who have expressed to me the view that in this matter we went further than there was any occasion to go; and subsequent events have proved the correctness of that opinion. It may be said that if honorable members, including protectionists, free-traders, and labour representatives, overstepped the mark, we can easily retrace our steps; but, though I sympathize with any desire there may be in that direction, it is not so very easy to adopt such a course, and especially is this so in the case of members of the Labour Party. Those who express disapproval of this section of the Post and Telegraph Act are exposed to much misrepresentation. They are told that they are not in sympathy with a "White Australia" policy, and that they are undoing legislation of a far-reaching character, and so forth, and I have not the slightest doubt that I shall be so misrepresented. I have previously tried to convince honorable members that that is not my attitude, as is shown by the fact that I was responsible for the adoption of the Natal Act by the Western Australian Parliament, and by the further fact that long previously the Government of the State, of which I was Premier, passed Chinese exclusion legislation nearly as stringent as that passed by the Commonwealth Parliament. In my opinion this section in the Post and Telegraph Act will cause us to be regarded as Quixotic, unpractical, and unbusiness-like. There is no doubt that this legislation will cost the Commonwealth a lot of money. I know that honorable members opposite say that the Orient Company have stated that this provision is not the main reason for the increase in the amount of their tender. A couple of years ago, both the Peninsular and Oriental and Orient Companies—I do not know whether this has been made public, but it happened so long ago that I think I may state the fact to honorable members—through the Secretary of State for the Colonies, expressed their willingness to extend the present contract for two years, on the same terms. In the opinion of the Government, though not in my opinion, it was thought better to have a new contract under different conditions.

Mr. CARPENTER.—That does not touch the question the right honorable member is discussing.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But the fact that the companies were willing to extend the contract on the same terms a couple of years ago, indicates that to a large extent the increased prices may be attributed to the new conditions, among which are the restrictions under section 16 of the Post and Telegraph Act.

Mr. CARPENTER.—The company say not.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is so in regard to the Orient Company; but the Peninsular and Oriental Company has refused to tender at all. As I have said, this section will cost us a great deal of money, and that is a consideration we should not altogether disregard. In my opinion, the provision will retard our progress, seeing that it will interfere to some extent with our means of communication, and, altogether, the measure, so far from being practical, seems to be very foolish. If we have passed legislation which is found to be adverse to our interests, financially and generally, the only course for us is to repeal it. The words used in the Act are "no contract or arrangement shall be made." I appeal to honorable members who are accustomed to read plain English, to say what the meaning of those words is. The lawyers have been at work in order to find some way out of the difficulty, and their conclusion is that if we send our mails, and pay by poundage, we do not enter into an "arrangement"—that it is not an arrangement to send by the pound and pay by the pound. If that be so, it is very fortunate, because otherwise the section would prove much more injurious. To my mind, however, a "contract or arrangement" means any contract or arrangement under which we pay for the carrying of our mails; and that I believe would be the definition arrived at by any ordinary man. Such a construction, however, would never suit us, because it would debar our sending mails by the Peninsular and Oriental steamers, and by the steamers running to Japan, China, Singapore, and elsewhere. There would be no communication by post with those places, and we should be in a very difficult position. However, as I say, the legal mind has come to our rescue, and we are told that "arrangement" does not include paying for the carriage of our mails by the pound. The Peninsular and Oriental Company, under arrangement with the British Government, will bring the English letters out in ships, probably to some extent manned by coloured crews, and will carry our letters back to Europe, the latter, however, under the poundage system. Under such a method there would be no arrangement as to time-table, as to where the vessel should call, or how quickly they should travel, or where they would land the mails. We should simply put our mails on board, and allow the companies to carry them over the ocean when and how they liked. Money would be paid out of the Treasury for the carriage of the mails in ships manned by coloured crews. If we are to send letters, let us send them in the most expeditious way. To take the step to which it appears we may be forced, appears to be hypocritical, and not honest. If we were to say that we would not use any steamers with coloured crews for the carriage of mails, either under contract or by poundage, we might be acting foolishly, or Quixotically; but we should, at any rate, be acting like honest people, who were determined to adhere to their principles. The other plan means to deny an arrangement when, in my opinion, we have made an arrangement. I wonder we use the tea the coloured man grows; there is no doubt we pay the coloured man, though we may not do so in the first instance, for all the services he renders. I wonder that farmers use the sacks, or squatters use the wool bales, which the people of India make, and for which we have to pay with the produce of the country. In desiring that the British, or, at any rate, the white race shall, as far as is possible, inhabit Australia, we are on safe ground. But when we say that we will not use the coloured man to make particular articles, or to assist in conveying our mails under an arrangement, we are on unsafe ground, and become hypocrites. I do not know why we should tilt at windmills in this way, and act differently from any other community in the world. No other country can afford to say that its mails shall not be carried out under a "contract or arrangement," except by a certain class of people. We must remember that there is not much difference between the Government paying for the service and a private person paying for it. The Government, in the first place, get the money from the people, and then pay it, while in the other case, the people pay for themselves. Why should we not also say that no ship carrying a coloured crew shall convey our produce and general merchandize? Why should we not prohibit every one from making a contract under which cargo may be carried in ships manned by coloured crews? Whether the Government or private persons pay, the money has to come out of the soil—Australia has to pay. What we desire is to have our mails carried expeditiously and safely. If we were to say that we would clear the ocean, and the world, of all coloured people, that would be consistent, though impracticable. We remember, however, that we are not so large in number as are the coloured races, and therefore such an idea is not entertained. We subsidize the Pacific Cable, but I feel sure that the board has a good many coloured people in its employment at Fanning Island and other places in the tropics. Similarly we subsidize mail services for the encouragement of trade with places like the New Hebrides and New Guinea, which are inhabited by people of coloured races. Why is this done? Because we have to do it. It is a matter, not of inclination, but of necessity. I think that we have acted very foolishly, therefore, in saying that we will not make a "contract or arrangement" with the English mail lines which employ coloured crews on their steamers. But although we say that we will not enter into contracts or arrangements with such companies, we have had to twist the Act in order to allow the service of carrying our mails to be performed, and we have had to decide that to pay poundage is not an evasion of the law. If we have no contract with the companies, and simply pay so much per lb. for the carriage of our mails backwards and forwards, their vessels will not be compelled to call at Fremantle or at Adelaide; and will probably come on direct to Melbourne and Sydney. That would be a great injury to Western Australia and to South Australia.

Mr. CARPENTER. — The present English mail contract binds the vessels of the Peninsular and Oriental Company to call at Fremantle.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—So much the better for us. But are they bound to call at Fremantle on their way home? My point is that we shall be better off if we have definite contracts with the mail companies, stipulating where and when their steamers shall call, than if we have no contract and pay a poundage, which, in my opinion, is an unbusinesslike and foolish arrangement.

Mr. CARPENTER.—By paying a poundage we get the same service as before, but at a lower rate.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We cannot obtain a regular service unless we have contracts with the companies concerned. Without contracts, their boats will not be bound to call regularly, according to a time-table, and might even be taken off for a week or two. Of course, if we can get as good a service for less money—by paying poundage than by paying a subsidy, the former arrangement is the better one; but I do not think we can. I do not think that the companies will give us as good a service without a contract. If I were a director of one of these companies, I would take good care that I did not give as much for lower rates as I gave when I was being paid a reasonable sum. It is essential to this country that we should have quick and regular ocean transit for our people, our produce, and our mails, and anything which interferes with that is prejudicial to our interests. The whole thing requires exposure, because at present the public are being deluded into the belief that what is being done is necessary to prevent Australia from being overrun by coloured people.

Mr. WILKINSON.—Is there not a patriotic as well as a commercial aspect?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We are not the centre of the Empire. We are a handful of people on the outskirts of the Empire, requiring, above all things, speedy and regular transit. Surely the forty or fifty millions of people in the old country can safely be trusted to look after the main interests of the Empire. At the present time we are doing ourselves injury, and gaining no compensating advantage. We are made to appear as out of sympathy with the mother country in her difficulties in dealing with the various problems of the Empire. I am sure that we are all glad to help her; but at the present time we are made to look as though we are unmindful of her obligations and her difficulties. If what we are doing resulted in great material advantage, we might say to the mother country, "We cannot afford to do otherwise"; but at the present time we are gaining nothing, and are exhibiting ourselves before the people of the Empire as arrogant, unbusiness-like faddists.

Mr. FISHER.—Is it not a good thing to train up British seamen?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yes; but that is a matter which can be well left to the mother country, and in which, at any rate, she might lead the way.

Mr. FISHER.—As we pay for the carriage of our mails, we are surely at liberty to take advantage of the opportunity to enforce a principle.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—But although we do not enter into contracts with the mail companies which employ coloured labour, we support them by paying poundage for the carriage of our letters, and by employing them for the transport of our wool, wheat, and other produce. I should like to see the matter reconsidered. It seems popular now-a-days to suggest the submission of questions like these to Royal Commissions, and it would certainly be a reasonable thing to have this question so investigated. The present law has done us a lot of harm. It has cost us a great deal of money, without doing us any good, materially or otherwise. It is useless to think that we can prevent the employment of coloured persons upon the ocean. Would any one suggest that we should not export our wool, our meat, our wheat, or our apples to the mother country in vessels employing coloured crews?

Mr. FISHER.—No one has proposed it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Then, is it not foolish to make an exception in connexion with the carriage of our mails? Most of us are so afraid of being misrepresented in the matter, that we dare not express our real opinions; but I, for my part, am willing to run the risk. I commenced by saying that I am for a "White Australia," and no one can urge that my remarks to-night have been directed against the policy of preserving Australia for a white race, so far as we reasonably and properly can. It is legislation like this which makes people afraid of the Labour Party. I wish now to refer to another matter. It has been said that we, on this side of the Chamber, have adopted a certain attitude in regard to honorable members opposite, because they are members of the Labour Party, as though the Labour Party was something with a bad brand on it. At one time the members of the Labour Party were persons engaged in manual toil; but its membership has gradually grown until now any one can become a member of it. No doubt I could join it to-morrow if I were willing to sign the pledge. No other party offers such prospects of quick political advancement. On this side of the House a member must be in politics a long time, and make himself either very agreeable or very disagreeable, before he can obtain a portfolio. Then his position will probably be at the tail-end of a Ministry and he will have to work up from one office to another until perhaps at last he may become Prime Minister. Seven members of the Labour Party, the other day, however, reached the Treasury bench with a hop, skip, and a jump, none of whom had practically held Ministerial office before. Therefore, the temptation from a mere selfish point of view would seem to be to join the Labour Party rather than to oppose them. I am supporting the present Government, because I believe that they are capable of doing useful and necessary work.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The late Government were also capable of doing good work, but the right honorable member would not let them do it.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The programme and methods of this Government are more in accord with my view than were the programme and methods of the late Government. Some honorable members opposite, having tasted the sweets of office, disliked relinquishing them. By the phrase "sweets of office" let me explain that I do not mean the emoluments of office; but rather the power, authority, and honour which attach to the management of public affairs. Some persons seem to think that there is only one sweet—the pay. That is not so. As one who has enjoyed a long term of office, I say that it is the desire to exercise control, to satisfy one's ambitions, and to do good for the community that is the chief incentive to office with good politicians.

Mr. FISHER.—I am sure that the right honorable member never profited by being in office.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I sometimes lost money by being in office. But I have certainly no ground for complaint, and I tried to do my best while there.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Why did the right honorable member's party charge the late Government with wishing for another day's pay?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not make any such statement, and I regret it if it was made. The honorable member, when trying to prevent the defeat of the Watson Government, urged that they had done good work, and that there was no fault to be found with their Administration. Do not these arguments apply now?

Mr. WEBSTER.—I asked for fair play.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I, too, ask for fair play on behalf of the Reid-McLean Administration. It is composed of experienced men, who are capable of doing good work. It is impossible for any Ministry to do very much in a short space of time. When Ministers take office, their first duty is to obtain a grasp of the questions which are awaiting their attention. The individual who, upon taking charge of a Department, immediately rushes matters, after the fashion of a bull at a gate, will not be likely to be successful. I do not blame the late Government for not having accomplished much, because they had not the opportunity to do so. They had to attend to their parliamentary duties, and consequently had very little chance to do anything of great importance. The same remark is applicable to the present Administration. Let us give them a trial, and let us put an end to this constant scrambling after office.

Mr. WATKINS.—Why did not the right honorable member entertain that view a month ago?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We gave the late Government a trial extending over four months. Personally, I was very glad to see a coalition effected between the protectionist and free-trade members of this House.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Does the right honorable member support the view which is entertained by the Prime Minister concerning the administration of the Immigration Restriction Act?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have not heard anything about that matter.

Mr. WEBSTER.—What about the six potatoes?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Personally, I would prevent persons being brought to this country under contract for the purpose of interfering with the labour market, but I would not prohibit men from coming here under contract for a special purpose. A good man will not leave a position in the old country unless he can come to a certainty. How are we to excel in this country unless we obtain the services of experts? We must secure the best talent available. So long as the Act is not abused by bringing in persons to prevent strikes, I think that there is little cause for complaint. In my view, the existing law is too drastic. It might with advantage be amended in such a way as to effect all that the Labour Party desire, and yet not interfere with the importation of a few men for special purposes. I believe that the clause in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, upon which the Deakin Government were defeated, will receive a very short shrift indeed when it comes before the High Court. All the trouble by which the secessionists have disorganized the Protectionist Party might have been averted had they listened to the voice of reason. But some of those who voted against the Deakin Administration attached much more importance to the insertion of that clause in the measure to which I have referred than they did to protection. That is the position of the honorable member for Melbourne Ports and the honorable and learned member for Corio. They were content to vote for a provision which, in the opinion of the best legal authorities, was unconstitutional, and by their votes destroy the Protectionist Party, which they were elected to support. They were willing to sacrifice protection and the Deakin Government, which they loved so well, in order to vote for the inclusion of State servants in the Arbitration Bill. They seem to forget that they were responsible for deposing the protectionist Ministry from power. In his speech last night, the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne entirely overlooked the fact that he assisted to defeat the protectionist Government, and subsequently took office with those he had assisted to depose his leader. He has affirmed that he obtained the permission of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat to join the labour Government. Where is the correspondence relating to the matter? I think he should produce it. I have the authority of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat for saying that, so far as he is concerned, he has no objection. I am informed that the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne did not receive any such permission from the honorable and learned member for Ballarat. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports and others are doing their best to induce people to forget that they destroyed the Protectionist Party in this House by voting for a clause which they knew upon the authority of men possessed of great legal knowledge was unconstitutional. They appear not to have cared twopence for protection so long as they could do something which they thought would enable them to gain the approval of a few of their electors.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Some of them had to keep their pledges.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—There is a time when honorable members have to decide which pledge they will keep. The protectionist members were returned to support a protective policy. They were elected under their leader, without whose assistance some of them would probably never have entered the portals of this House. Yet they were willing to forget that, and simply because they had given a pledge in regard to another matter not nearly so important, and which will prove to be unconstitutional, they deserted their leader and protection, and allied themselves with the enemies of the Government. I am opposed to the socialistic programme of the Labour Party, and to their caucus methods. In my opinion their policy is opposed to individual effort and individual ambition. I am aware that the individual views of many honorable members of the Labour Party do not differ very much from my own. But the organizations which are behind them do not share the opinions which they appear to entertain.

Mr. HUGHES.—Who is behind the right honorable member?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—My constituents.

Mr. HUGHES.—Our constituents are behind us.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Does the honorable and learned member believe in all that the Tocsin or the Worker says, or in all that Tom Mann preaches?

Mr. HUGHES.—No more than the right honorable member believes in all that Mr. Walpole says.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I scarcely know Mr. Walpole, and I am in no way responsible for him. If the Labour Party were in power, I am satisfied that the crusade in which they are engaged would progress very slowly indeed, because they know that the Socialism which they preach is not in accord with the views of the electors. The idea of every person being equal in wealth, energy, and ability!

Mr. HUGHES.—Who says that?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The press of the Labour Party says it. I shall fulfil my pledges as well as I can, but I will not be coerced by unions outside of Parliament, who wish to tell me how I should act in every emergency. If the theories advanced by honorable members opposite were sound they would have borne fruit long ago. The truth is that they are impracticable, and they will end now as they have always ended—in disaster. If they do not end in disaster, they will terminate in revolution.

Mr. HUGHES.—Will the Coolgardie water scheme end in disaster?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I sincerely pray that it will not. I do not consider that a socialistic enterprise at all.

Mr. HUGHES.—What is Socialism?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Labour Party desire to deprive people of their property and to nationalize the land. The time has arrived for plain speaking upon both sides. I read in the Tocsin and the Worker what the Labour Party intends to accomplish, and I must say that its aims differ materially from the programme submitted by the Watson Government. They adopted the policy of the Deakin Government with the exception of the proposal to establish a Government tobacco monopoly and to take possession of £8,000,000 worth of the bank reserves, and these two planks of their future platform, and especially the latter, were put forward in my opinion without sufficient knowledge or consideration, and unmistakably show the trend of the socialistic legislation they desire to pass. I am sure that the responsibility of office will cause honorable members opposite to moderate their views. There is no necessity, in the interests of the country, to depose the present Government. If they are defeated, what will happen?

Mr. WEBSTER.—There will be a general election.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If there is not a dissolution, a coalition Government will be formed between members of the Labour Party and the seceding protectionists. Will such a Government be acceptable to or benefit Australia?

Mr. WATKINS.—Surely the right honorable member does not consider himself a protectionist any longer.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I hold that the present Government is much better fitted to control the destinies of Australia than is any combination of honorable members opposite. At any rate, the Ministry should receive a fair trial, and be treated with some measure of generosity. No one can say that the present Government is not composed of experienced men. There is not a member of it who has not had long experience.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Have they all had experience?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—With one exception, the members of the present Government have had many years experience of office. It is said that a man should serve his time to every trade, and I should be inclined to say, except for that of a Minister of the Crown—Ministers are all ready-made. I have now only to express a hope that those honorable members who have been so unwise as to desert, or to leave—perhaps that would be a more moderate word to use—the Protectionist Party and their leader—

Mr. MAUGER.—It is honorable members opposite who have done that.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I hope that those honorable members who have seen fit to leave the Protectionist Party and their leader, and who have thrown themselves into the arms of the Labour Party, will soon see the error of their ways. Personally, I feel convinced that if the Government is given a fair trial they will be able to do those things which will be found to be in the interests of Federation, and calculated to cement the various States more closely together. I believe, too, that they will bring forward measures which will be of permanent advantage to the people of Australia.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—I am sure that the members of the Labour Party have listened with a great deal of interest to the right honorable member for Swan. I have no doubt that they will take into their careful consideration the hints which he has given them, so that they may be able to make their organization so perfect that the right honorable gentleman will himself be prepared to join it. Judging by his address I can see that he is uncomfortable in his present company, and already feels that the Labour Party is the party he ought to join. He has told us of a number of democratic measures which he has passed in the great State of the west, and I always like to give the right honorable gentleman credit for what he has done. If the measures he has carried are not as perfect as they might be, he should not be censured or blamed for that. I am very hopeful that he will shortly see his way to join the Labour Party. He has been studying the pledge and rules of the party, and all we ask of honorable members generally is that they should study them a little more. We have been glad to hear that some of them have commenced to read the Tocsin and the Worker. I suppose that until quite recently they knew nothing of those intelligently-conducted literary organs. Their education, political and social, has in consequence been very much neglected. Now that they have started to read that literature, they have no doubt learnt a great many things they were not aware of previously, and a continuance of the study will dissipate some of the foolish notions and prejudices that are, at all times, associated with a lack of knowledge. The speech of the right honorable member for Swan was the usual straightforward, manly, breezy utterance which we all admire. There was some evidence in it of the influence of his present environment, because there was a good deal of "yes-no" about it. In criticising our methods, the right honorable gentleman found fault with them as being too stringent, and expressed the opinion that they would break down. He does not believe in the Labour Party, and he hopes that its organization will break down. We were not aware that the right honorable gentleman was a prophet, but he said to-night that he was going to prophesy, and he did prophesy that the organization of the Labour Party would break down inevitably. If that be so, the danger he fears from the return of the party to power is non-existent. Why, therefore, should the right honorable gentleman be alarmed about the advance of the labour movement? Why should there be a gathering together of organizations outside, and a great fight put up, if within the Labour Party itself there is such a condition of affairs existing that it must break down of its own weight, owing to lack of efficiency? From the attention which he gave to the subject, I think that the right honorable gentleman realizes, on the contrary, that there is a very great probability of labour politics and the Labour Party very shortly dominating Federal and State politics together. The methods which they have adopted, and which they understand, and which the right honorable gentleman, and those who speak in opposition to them do not yet understand, have hitherto proved successful. I do not quarrel with the right honorable gentleman's criticism, or with the statement he makes with regard to the changed conditions which the control of parliamentary affairs brings with it. It is self-evident that some changes will be made in the methods of working in the Labour Party, and labour organizations. I have said that there seemed to be a good deal of "yes-no" about the right honorable gentleman's address. He found fault with the constitutional position. He said that a Government ought to be able to give the representatives of the Sovereign an assurance that they had a working majority. It was interjected that the Government of which the right honorable gentleman was a member had no such majority. He replied by saying, "But we were there, and remained there until we were shifted," as if that was a reply. If a Government is constitutionally bound to have a working majority, and otherwise should not continue to hold office, the right honorable gentleman stands self-condemned, because he was a member of a Government that continued to hold office without a majority. He said, in reply to an interjection, that the Government of which he was a member were there, and remained there until they were shifted, but that might be said of any Government, and was no answer. Then the right honorable gentleman admitted that it was the support of the Labour Party which, because of its policy, gave the Government of which he was a member, a working majority. That statement was quite correct, and exactly described the position. I shall not dwell upon the change of Government; we have heard of it sufficiently often to be familiar with the facts. But there was an assumption on the part of the right honorable member for Swan that the Watson Government did not have a majority. Honorable members need only look at the division list on the question on which they took office, to see that they had every reasonable assurance from the division and from the speeches of honorable members who took part in it, that they had a very substantial majority—a much bigger majority than the present Government secured by a catch vote. The honorable member for Bland, therefore, had ample authority for assuring the representative of the Sovereign, that he had a working majority. It was only when the measure on which the division took place came to be submitted to the House in Committee that the steady pressure of the conservative elements outside and inside this House whittled away the majority. It was then found that our party had been deceived. Those who professed to be in favour of the Arbitration Bill, failed to carry out their pledges and promises, when an opportunity was given them to place the measure on the statute-book. They do as all conservatives do when they do not desire that it should appear to the people that they are opposed to a measure—they give something which is ineffective and worse than useless. In this case certain honorable members adopted that policy exactly. Speaking of the constitutional aspect, the Watson Government was really the only constitutional Government that this Federal Parliament has yet had. It has yet to be decided whether the present Government have a majority. The right honorable member for Swan asserted that the Watson Government had not a majority, but we all know quite well that if the present Prime Minister considered that there was a majority against the Watson Government he would at once have moved the motion of censure which he contented himself with talking about every day, in order to keep interest in the matter alive, and to find an excuse for asking honorable members to come with him. As leader of the Opposition the present Prime Minister gave the Governor-General his personal assurance that he had a working majority, but we know that the very moment this eager office-seeker got his opportunity he would take it. If he had had a majority behind him he would have taken advantage of the opportunity before he did.

Mr. WILSON.—Are there no eager office-seekers on the honorable member's side?

Mr. SPENCE.—Not that I am aware of. I do not know of one office-seeker on this side of the House. Let me say here that a most unfair remark was made to-night insinuating that one member of the alliance on this side is there for self-seeking reasons. There is absolutely no foundation for that statement. There has been no indication of anything of the kind. The right honorable member for Swan has put this matter very fairly. He does not tell honorable members that it would be unreasonable for any of them to desire to acquire office. There can be no blame attaching to any one who secures office fairly. But when office is secured unfairly and by peculiar tactics, as it has been secured by the head of the present Government, the action taken is open to criticism. A good deal has been said about our methods and the labour pledges. I do not propose to deal extensively with those matters to-night. A short time ago I delivered a speech in which I made some very emphatic statements of my views regarding the Ministerial programme, and the reasons why, in my opinion, the present Government should be put out. I do not propose to repeat those statements. I ask the House to take them as read, and to assume that I still stand by them, only more so. Some reference, however, may be made to the way in which the Labour Party is pledged, as the matter is always being brought up. I remind honorable members that any man who desires to join the Conservative Party in England, must sign the platform of that party. A party pledge is, therefore, no new thing, and there is nothing uncommon and nothing wrong about it. The pledge of the Labour Party is complained of because our platform is so good and our aims so high and noble that the only objections which can be brought forward are in respect of little matters which will not bear consideration. I cannot refrain from saying a word or two in reply to the criticism of the alliance by the right honorable member for Swan. The alliance is a perfectly natural and fair one. When the Watson Government took office, certain honorable members who do not belong to the Labour Party, but hold liberal and democratic views, and have no other object to serve than that of securing the passing of good measures, openly announced, without any request from the Ministry, that they intended to support it. There was no scheming on the part of the Government to secure that support. During the course of this debate, not many honorable members have spoken, but the insinuation has been made more than once that there is a secret understanding among members of the alliance. These insinuations suggest that honorable members opposite are familiar with such practices, but the Opposition do not know of anything of the kind.

Mr. WILKS.—If the Opposition did they would not mention it.

Mr. SPENCE.—The basis of our alliance was put in black and white; but we cannot obtain any information as to the terms of the coalition. As soon as the Watson Government took office, they openly declared the relations between the Labour Party and those members of the Liberal Party who were supporting them, and, as the basis of the alliance, we have simply placed in black and white the agreement which was then publicly announced. The suggestion that there is some secret understanding between us, comes only from men who are naturally suspicious. We have sufficient common-sense to know that the alliance could not succeed by crooked methods. It must succeed on its merits, or it will fail. If the Labour Party had been so foolish as to adopt the tactics attributed to us by our opponents, we should not have made that progress which has characterized the labour movement. Every day we are gaining ground. The right honorable member for Swan has twitted honorable members of the Liberal Party with having deserted their leader, and while I know that they are well able to take care of themselves, I feel disposed, as one of those associated with them, to reply to his taunts. The right honorable member spoke of the lack of loyalty shown by these honorable members to their former leader. I confess that I have an admiration for loyalty, but it is not so much a question of loyalty to a leader as it is loyalty to the principles which bind a party. Nothing can be said against the man who stands by his principles. The right honorable member for Swan has charged honorable members of the Opposition corner with deserting their leader. What is his position? Who is his leader? Has he not deserted his true leader, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, by placing himself under the leadership of the Prime Minister? If he has not accepted the Prime Minister as his leader, what is his position? I think that we are justified in asking for further information as to whether there is any arrangement between the two parties now supporting the Government.

Mr. KENNEDY.—No arrangement.

Mr. SPENCE.—So far we have not heard of any. The Government whip—honorable member for Dalley—has said that the Prime Minister is the “star performer” of the company opposite, and I would add that the organizer is the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, who ought about the present situation. The company has submitted such a poor programme that it will not have any attraction to the public. I feel satisfied that the people demand something much better. The performers may be very good, and I am willing to admit that the company boasts of a star performer, but we wish to learn from the organizer himself what relation he, and those who speak of him constantly as their leader, bear to the rest of the company. We desire to know what he has secured for them by bringing about the peculiar combination which confronts us.

Mr. KENNEDY.—He has not handcuffed and handed us over to another leader.

Mr. SPENCE.—He has ceased to lead old followers, and has made them members of a scratch team. The honorable and learned member had a great deal to say a little while ago about a three-cornered political cricket match. I am prepared to kick the solid team on this side against the scratch team that has been raked up on the Government side. The members of that team cannot play together, and never will.

Mr. WILSON.—Has the honorable member ever attended our weekly caucus?

Mr. SPENCE.—It is useless for the honorable member to talk about caucus meetings, in view of the fact that members of the Deakin party have been charging each other with disloyalty to the decision of their caucus. When proposals were made some time ago for a coalition of the followers of the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, and those of the right honorable member for East Sydney, the proposed agreement was submitted to the caucus of the Liberal Party, but was rejected, the members of that party declining to support any coalition of which the honorable and learned member for Ballarat was not the leader. I wish to know what honorable members opposite have now to say in regard to that decision. A charge of disloyalty comes with a very ill-grace from an honorable member who has not respected the decision of the caucus.

Mr. KENNEDY.—To whom does the honorable member refer?

Mr. SPENCE.—To the right honorable member for Swan. It seems to me that those honorable members of the Liberal Party, who are now in alliance with us, are the only ones who have been loyal to the decision to which I have referred. There is an ominous silence on the part of the Ministry. We have heard from the star performer, and it is time that we had a speech from one of the stars of lesser magnitude. I am inclined to think that, as the result of the exposure of their manifold political sins, the Government feel their position so keenly that they are about to tender their resignation, and therefore do not think it worth while to put up a fight. Perhaps they propose to resign without going to a division on this motion.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No fear.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member is not in the secrets of the Cabinet. He finds fault with the combination; he does not like the company in which he finds himself. It is, after all, a company of contradictions. The members of the coalition, with perhaps one or two exceptions, have only one aim in common. For the most part the coalition consists of men who have thrown their previous policy to the winds, and their one aim now is to “down” the Labour Party. The honorable member for Parramatta is, in that respect, solid with the coalition.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Have I ever said that I wish to “down” the Labour Party?

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member yesterday declared himself against the party. There can be no mistake about his utterances.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I said nothing of the kind, but that does not matter.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member declared himself an anti-socialist, and therefore, he must be against the Labour Party.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—But not against labour.

Mr. SPENCE.—That is an old Conservative cry. I never yet met a politician who was not, according to his statements, the best friend of labour. An employer may be the greatest sweater living—but he will declare that he is one of the best friends of labour. Although he may not even be paying his workmen a living wage, he will regard himself as a philanthropist, simply because he employs them, and suggest that, if he did not find the work, they would be unable to live. I am astonished that the honorable member who has often denounced that cry, should now give utterance to it.

Mr. WILKS.—The Labour Party never had so good a man for labour in its ranks.

Mr. MAUGER.—Let the honorable member for Parramatta speak for himself.

Mr. WILKS.—He is too modest; but the honorable member cannot contradict my statement.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member for Parramatta modest!

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member has a crowd behind him who never did anything for labour in their lives.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member says that he is in sympathy with labour, but that is a claim which is made by every conservative politician. The masses are the best judges, and they have declared against the conservatives, who put forward that cry, by returning special representatives, so to speak, to do that which men who professed to be their friends failed to do. Honorable members on this side of the House were returned to Parliament, because those who professed to be the friends of labour had neglected its interests.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Those who talk so loudly have done the least.

Mr. SPENCE.—I am quite prepared to have my record compared with that of any other honorable member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am not referring to the honorable member, but to some of those behind him.

Mr. SPENCE.—In view of the silence maintained by members of the Ministry, I am inclined to believe that they are about to throw up the sponge.

Mr. MAUGER.—Where are the members of the Ministry?

Mr. SPENCE.—Perhaps they are holding a Cabinet meeting, to consider whether they should not recognise the situation, and gracefully retire.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Whom should we put in their places?

Mr. SPENCE.—There would be no difficulty in filling their places by men who would do the work of the country much better than they are likely to do. When the honorable member for Parramatta—who has a faculty for interjecting, and drawing speakers away from the thread of their discourse—interrupted me, I was about to point out that some of the secrets of the coalition would yet leak out. Perhaps, after all, I am mistaken in supposing that the Cabinet are considering the wisdom of retiring. It may be that the leader of the Government has imposed silence on his colleagues, lest they should tell too much. One or two secrets have already been disclosed. We have learned something about the way in which nominations are made by the Conservative Party; we have learned that it indulges in practices for which the Labour Party has been denounced. We have heard something about the Sydney Morning Herald fixing up the free-trade bunch. We have also heard that in Western Australia the right honorable member for Swan, together with a newspaper editor, fixed up a bunch for election purposes. The lack of wisdom of those who fixed up those bunches was shown by the fact that the persons selected did not stand true to their parties. The right honorable member for Swan is evidently not a good hand at choosing candidates. I interjected while he was speaking that those he selected did not stand true, and the right honorable member admitted that he could not keep them true. We have only to look at the present situation in this Parliament, in regard to the Free-trade Party, to see that their method of selection does not keep honorable members opposite to their pledges. Many of them, it is true, tried to be loyal, but when they could not get enough of their own way they gave up the fight. That is not the way to win. The way to win in politics is to keep on fighting. If we on this side of the House are beaten in connexion with our social reform and trade union movements we come again. We adopt some other tactics, and keep on fighting. The right honorable gentleman at the head of the Government has never tested the question of free-trade in this House. He does not even know the fiscal opinions of a number of the Queensland members.

Mr. WILKS.—He does not know the honorable member's opinions.

Mr. SPENCE.—If the right honorable gentleman had any faith in his own views he would certainly have taken an opportunity to test the question. The method of selection by newspaper proprietors, or by a great leader like the right honorable member for Swan, has been proved to be a failure. If honorable members opposite wish for the success of their principles, they had better copy the methods of the only successful party—the Labour Party. Instead of doing that, they twit us with not knowing how to manage our own business. It seems to me that the evidence is all the other way. I say emphatically that we ought to hear from the Government something more about their policy. The discussion hitherto has centred around the policy of the present Opposition. If my theory be correct, the Government intend to resign, or they know that if they go to the country, they will not return as a Government. I presume that the tactics adopted by honorable members opposite are intended to save time, and that they think it expedient to discuss the policy of the party that will be in power after the appeal to the country. If that be the case, it is just as well that we should understand it; and we can regard the present debate as a discussion of the policy of the incoming Government, rather than as a criticism of the lack of policy of the present Government. We cannot, of course, discuss something which is non-existent. It would hardly be interesting enough to discuss nothing. As the Government have no policy except to get into recess, they cannot give us the slightest indication of what they propose to do. When they get into recess, they will evolve a policy which they will be able to present to Parliament when we meet again. That in itself is enough to condemn them. It is only a fair thing that the example set by the Watson Government to have upon its programme something more than is sufficient for one session should be followed by the present Government. But they criticise that as a foolish course to pursue. They have such a peculiar combination behind them that they find it impossible to evolve a policy. The honorable member for Parramatta tells us that he is not satisfied with the coalition.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why does not the honorable member leave me alone?

Mr. SPENCE.—I have not said anything unkind of the honorable member. He has a right to know what the policy of the Government is. For many years he was a colleague of the Prime Minister, and he did his work as a Minister exceedingly well. Yet he does not know anything, and naturally he is not satisfied.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I seem to be more satisfied than the honorable member for Perth is.

Mr. SPENCE.—One question that has been mentioned this afternoon is that of the High Commissionership. I agree with the leader of the Opposition that a great deal more importance attaches to that question than seems to be supposed by the Government. They tell us that they intend to consult the States. The Watson Government intended to ask the States whether they were willing to hand over to the High Commissioner some of the work that is now done by the Agents-General.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Hear, hear.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member for Parramatta agrees with that. But if the States refuse to agree we ought to know what the Government intend to do. Do they intend to decline to carry out that part of their programme which is necessary in the interests of the Commonwealth, simply because one or two of the States may not agree with what they propose to do? That is a question that ought to be replied to. If any member of the Government has the courage to speak, or if their master, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat intends to speak, we ought to have an explanation in regard to this matter. It is not fair to deny us information.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Has the honorable member read what the Premier of New South Wales said on the subject?

Mr. SPENCE.—He is only one. There are six States in this Federation, although the present Government appears to recognise only two. The others appear to be regarded merely as postscripts. The policy of the Government seems to be to listen to the representations of the two larger States, and not to mind the others. The right honorable member for Swan has criticised a portion of the White Australia policy, as laid down by the first Parliament of the Commonwealth—upon which I need hardly say that I hold strong opinions—and has asked that it should be altered. But the Prime Minister appears to be afraid to deal with the contract section of the Post and Telegraph Act, because some of the supporters of the coalition would decline to assist him in that direction. That seems to indicate that there is a kind of understanding on that matter. If there is such an understanding, we ought to know it. Whilst I am a member of a party that has always been prepared to support any Government that gave us the measures which we desired, at the same time we intend to maintain what we have secured. We are naturally suspicious of those who are declared opponents of those measures that we believe in, and who, at the same time, refuse to give us the measures for which we ask—such, for instance, as the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, in an effective form.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The section to which the honorable member has referred has nothing to do with the White Australia policy.

Mr. SPENCE.—The right honorable member at the head of the Government previously said that he would alter that section; but he cannot alter it because of the coalition. The right honorable member for Swan is a part of that coalition.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I will vote for doing away with that section if I have the chance.

Mr. SPENCE.—I believe that the right honorable member will. But we want to know whether his leader has pledged him, amongst others, to support the maintenance of that section. The supporters of the Government appear to lack any cohesion of any kind, and to be without any sort of policy. How can a Government be sure of a majority when its supporters have no bond to hold them together? The subject of old-age pensions has been dealt with by other speakers. The Government have no definite policy on that question. I remember an occasion when the right honorable gentleman at the head of the Government, speaking in the Sydney Town Hall, said that any Treasurer would be foolish—I forget his exact words—if he raised all the money required by the Commonwealth from Customs. He said that the Treasurer could raise a portion of the revenue by the direct taxation of land values. When the Barton Government introduced its programme, which contained a proposal for old-age pensions, we heard the right honorable gentleman stating that that proposal was simply a sham, which could not be carried out. But it is now to be found in his own programme. Does he still hold the same view as he held when he said that it was impossible to carry it out?

Mr. WILKS.—He is going to try to carry it out by an arrangement with the States.

Mr. SPENCE.—Yes, he is going to consult with the States. But suppose that the States will not do anything?

Mr. WILKS.—Then he can do nothing; he admits that.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Government whip, who I presume is the mouthpiece of the Ministry, and appears to be the only one who knows anything about their policy, tells us that if the States decline to agree as to the matter of old-age pensions, the Government will not do anything. If they decline to do anything in relation to the High Commissionership, the Government will do nothing. Those unfortunate pioneers of Australia, whose hardi-hood and whose grand work the Prime Minister and his followers praise so highly who have been enterprising enough to live in more than one State, may continue to starve, simply because we have not a Government with the necessary courage, ability, and energy, to pass the necessary legislation. Why did we have Federation? Are we to be governed by the States—to have a reversal of the Constitution? The Government, as I have said, is weak in every quarter—weak in its following, and weak in its alleged policy.

Mr. WILKS.—During the four years of the Commonwealth, this is the first time the Labour Party have spoken of this question, and for three years, they supported a Government who did not intend to do anything in the matter.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member, who is the Government whip, knows that Parliament has worked very hard since the inauguration of the Commonwealth. It was necessary to pass many machinery Acts, and, surely to goodness, the sessions were long enough. The programme of the Barton Government was too comprehensive for any one Parliament; and it is unfair to twist us with supporting a Government, who were eleven months dealing with the Tariff alone. The present Prime Minister said that it was simply a sham, and a humbug, for the Barton Government to place old-age pensions on their programme, because legislation in that direction could not be carried into effect, until the expiration of the book-keeping period. Now, however, the Prime Minister places old-age pensions in his own programme, and we learn for the first time that its introduction depends on the consent of the States. But the States are self-governed, and have the power to follow the example of the two States in which old-age pensions are established. It is a fair argument that, if we do not find the States moving in this direction now, they are not likely to co-operate with the Commonwealth. The weak policy of the Ministry is not the kind of policy we ought to expect from gentlemen who talk so glibly about responsible government.

Mr. WILKS.—There is a Labour Government in Queensland, and there are no old-age pensions in that State.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Labour Government in Queensland are prepared to establish old-age pensions promptly, and they have the necessary knowledge and ability to carry out such legislation. The present Commonwealth Government knew that they could not establish old-age pensions when they put the proposal before us, and the Prime Minister is guilty of the same sham and humbug with which he charged the Barton Government. Although arbitration admittedly affects only a limited number of industries at present, no one can foresee how many may eventually come under the Federal Act; and any legislation is desirable which will prevent strikes, with their disturbance of industrial life, and conditions. The fact that we cannot at present say how many industries may be affected, makes it all the more imperative that the measure should be an efficient and workable one. This Bill has wrecked Government after Government; and we now have a Government in power, who, if they have a chance, will impose on the people of Australia, a measure which will be productive of much evil, suffering, and injustice—which will make the conditions of industry worse than they would be without a measure of the kind. I make that remark advisedly, and am convinced of its truth. One particular clause will, in my opinion, not only do a great injustice to unions, but will prevent many registering under the Bill.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—When the honorable member says that, does he mean that unions will be prevented from registering, by reason of the difference between the two amendments?

Mr. SPENCE.—Yes; I know that, because of the clause which has been adopted, unions which were waiting for the Bill will not register.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—They may not register, but it will not be because of the difference between the two amendments.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Watson Government when in charge of this measure in Committee, were in many instances forced, by the influence of those now on the Treasury bench, to accept certain amendments which rendered the Bill less efficient, and were not in the interest of those concerned. The clause on which the late Government were defeated, was not the only one to which we objected, and it was not fair to twit the members of that Government, because they had to accept some amendments in which they did not fully believe. It was the duty of the Government to pass as good a measure as possible; and it was only when an amendment was reached, which rendered the measure unworkable, that the Government took their final stand. One point is overlooked by those who have had no experience of the trade union movement, and who, like the Minister of Defence and his colleagues, regard that movement from a theoretical point of view. Because certain things are possible under the measure, they suppose that those things are going to be done. We who are connected with trade unions, have practical experience of men as they are, and with us it is not a question of what men of a different stamp might do, but what the men whom we know are likely to do. The great difference between the two amendments is particularly felt in the union of which I have been president for eighteen years, and about which I claim to know more than any other honorable member in the House. It would be impossible for that union to prove to a Judge that a majority of those affected were in favour of preference being given. The members of the union are not working in the industry except at a certain period of the year, and no living soul could say where the members were, or who were affected by the award, and there is no machinery to secure the opinion of those affected. We could not give any evidence that would be accepted, and any lawyer, or even a layman, could break us down and prevent our getting an award which would give a preference. In some other industries, I admit that the whole position would be different; but we are legislating for specific industries. The organization to which I refer is the largest in Australia, and is connected with the greatest industry and biggest export trade of the Commonwealth. The union has had a long existence, and the opinions of its representatives ought to have some weight. Let us suppose, for a moment, that a matter involving only legal questions was before the House, and let us further suppose a most unlikely thing, namely, that all the lawyers in the House were unanimous. What would those lawyers say if a layman like myself were to deny the correctness of their assumptions and opinions? Such a denial would not have any weight. Those who have had experience of the trade union movement are, by reason of their practical knowledge, unanimously of opinion that the measure, as passed by this House, is unworkable, and I can only interpret our being ignored as showing a desire to make the Bill ineffective. I speak authoritatively on this matter, after consultation with those controlling the affairs of the union of which I am president, and I may say that I used no influence whatever in order to secure the opinion I express, namely, that the union will not register, and thus will be shut out from any benefits under the measure. It may be asked why the union should not register and get an award. The answer is that an award would be useless unless the Judge had power to protect the interests of the organization. The measure will be absolutely inoperative unless it recognises and encourages the maintenance of all such organizations. In the New Zealand Bill, when originally introduced, the preamble spoke of the encouragement of industrial unions, that measure being based on a desire to encourage the formation and registration of organizations, so that they might be used as machinery to bring about industrial peace. In this House the conservative element, with its influence operating on others who have practically no knowledge, has reversed the position altogether. Each clause which recognised unions was attacked the moment it came before us, and we had proposals for compulsory organizations, proposals which were intended to strike a blow at existing institutions, and render the measure nugatory. No one can say that I did not do my best each time to resist those attacks; and though we were forced to accept some amendments, that is not a fact on which we ought to be taunted, because our acceptance does not mean approval. For myself I should not have accepted the amendments which the late Prime Minister consented to make in the Bill, but would have kept the debate going single-handed until all were tired out before I gave way. The remarks I have made apply to other organizations, but particularly to the organization with which I am connected. In industries where the men are constantly at work, it would be easy to ascertain the views of those directly concerned, but in an industry where we do not have the same men working year by year, it would be impossible to prove to any Judge the consent of the majority of those affected. In my opinion, the Arbitration Bill has been deliberately destroyed. It was very plainly to be seen what influence was brought to bear on honorable members towards that end. That influence counts in the present movement, and will count in the coming election if we have the luck of a dissolution—I mean that anti-labour influence, which is called anti-socialistic. Unless the Arbitration Bill is improved—as it must be, or I hope it will not become law—it will introduce tyranny, and take us back to a period from which we thought we had escaped. The measure as it stands would inflict a great deal of misery, and take away from the industrial classes rights for which they have fought very hardly. Honorable members who prate a great deal about individual liberty, but who support a social system which does not give any liberty, claim that they are conserving the interests of the non-unionists. I have known it to be the rule within a district, with the consent of the employers concerned, that no one should obtain work unless he was a member of a union. But under the Bill as it has been amended, it would be within the power of employers to weaken and to gradually destroy the unions, and the unions would be unable to compel their members to pay for the maintenance of the organization which obtained reasonable conditions for them. It would also be possible for employers to boycott the members of unions. Although the Bill contains the provision that no one is to be discharged from his employment because he is a unionist, we know that in practice that provision could not be enforced, because it could not be proved that the employé was discharged for that reason. We cannot deny the employers the right to discharge workmen who do not suit them, and therefore they would be able to make excuses for the dismissal of unionists. In the electorate which I represent, it has been urged in the leading article of a newspaper that the employers should refuse to engage any member of the Australian Workers' Union.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—To what newspaper does the honorable member refer?

Mr. SPENCE.—To the Bourke Banner of the 10th August, 1904. The writer of the article says—

We now advise a course which may seem drastic, but which alone can be effectual. No employer should give employment to a member of the Australian Workers' Union. Let the hundreds of union men, to whom the union is their God, look to their union, and not to the capitalist, for work and wages, for food and clothes for themselves and their families.

Then follows a good deal more in the same tone. That was written just after the recent New South Wales elections, because the electors insisted on returning a labour member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Surely no one takes any notice of such statements!

Mr. SPENCE.—They are taken notice of, and the honorable member knows it. I think that he must have forgotten a great deal of his trade union experience, because these practices are not confined to any one class of industry. While I do not rank all employers alike, I know that the organization to which this newspaper appeals—the Pastoralists' Union—practices a systematic boycott. There have been produced in this Chamber the official papers of the Queensland branch of that Union, and we have in our possession other similar documents. I have seen its official circulars, and the instructions to its agents, and I know that a boycott is worked by means of a system of registration; which is made compulsory upon its members, with a view to weeding out union men.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Does that member believe that any member of this House is in sympathy with that sort of thing?

Mr. SPENCE.—What is the use of sympathy, if honorable members do not give effect to it in an Act of Parliament? What is the use of the honorable member talking of sympathy with labour, when he prevents the passing of labour laws?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is talking humbug now.

Mr. SPENCE.—I am stating an absolute fact.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I did not dispute the honorable member's statement of fact, but I complained of his unfair criticism.

Mr. SPENCE.—I do not think that the honorable member understands the difference between a fact and an insinuation. The organization to which this newspaper appeals carries on a systematic boycott. Probably the majority of its members decline to put it into force; but those who choose to do so use the machinery that is provided.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And the honorable member wished to insinuate that I am in sympathy with that sort of thing.

Mr. SPENCE.—If the honorable member is not in sympathy with it, he should show that he is not. I charge the honorable member with not doing so, and with voting in such a way that the workers cannot obtain a law which is necessary for their protection.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What the honorable member says is pure nonsense. I am amazed at his unfairness.

Mr. SPENCE.—I am not generally charged with being unfair. The honorable member and others voted for an amendment which will prevent the labour organizations from securing protection against unfair dealing and injustice. That is undeniable. Boycotting is no new method. It has been worked before by men of strong prejudices. All that we asked was that the Court should have power to grant preferences if it chose to do so. The phrase "preference to unionists" is really a misnomer. What is desired is protection to unionists, and protection to the Act, so that it may be effectively administered.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member's leader said that it was not intended to give this preference, except to majorities.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member is slow to admit that he is in a false position. It was not a question of there being a majority, but of proving the existence of a majority. I have already explained that; it is not my fault if the honorable member cannot understand plain English. In addition to the boycott, which the employers may use if they choose, and some of them do use it, there are other ways in which they can weaken the labour unions. It is a very common thing in America, and I can quote instances of it here, to make it a condition of obtaining employment that the applicants shall not join a trade union. A clause in the agreement of the South Australian Register office, for 1888, with compositors accepting a thirty-six months' engagement, was this—

The employee shall not during the service aforesaid be or become a member of the South Australian Typographical Society, or any of a similar nature, or having similar objects.

If employers choose to insist upon such conditions, how can we prevent it, unless power is given to the Court to give preference to unionists—that is, to see that the unionists get fair play? I need not dwell on this matter, because I have spoken upon it before, and I know that it is hopeless to convert honorable members opposite by force of logic.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member's statements are too unfair to convert any one.

Mr. SPENCE.—The position I am taking is, that the attitude of the Government in regard to the Arbitration Bill is sufficient to condemn them, apart from their want of a policy, and the other charges brought against them. Although honorable members opposite have pretended to desire the passing of a measure which will secure industrial peace, they voted for an amendment which defeats its object, merely to displace the then existing Government, and to obtain office themselves.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH.—The honorable member is in favour of the Bill as it stands, with the exception of the provision in dispute.

Mr. SPENCE.—No; I am not. There are other provisions to which I object. The late Government had forced upon it provisions which make some of the clauses of the Bill imperfect, and which I should not have accepted. Honorable members know that when a Bill is in Committee, those in charge of it are sometimes forced to accept amendments in which they do not believe. The Watson Administration are not responsible for such amendments. The honorable member for Macquarie is one of those who sought every occasion to turn that Government out of office. I should have no fault to find with the present Administration, if its leader had defeated the Watson Government by a straight-out fight, on a motion of censure. If he had done so, the present discussion would have been saved. He, however, took advantage of a difficulty in connexion with a most important measure, which affects the well-being and the living of thousands of men and women, who have little enough to live on, and who have been waiting for a long time for a Bill which will allow of the peaceful settlement of industrial disputes by a Justice of the High Court, in order to defeat the Watson Government. It is our duty to ascertain whether the vote by which he came into power was not a catch vote. If it was given deliberately, in order to displace the then Government, that fact will be seen when a division is taken on the motion now before the House. Upon a previous occasion I pointed out that the declared attitude of the present Government and their followers is anti-socialistic. The extraordinary feature of the position is that whilst they profess to be strong opponents of Socialism, the only definitions which they offer of that term refer to reforms, such as the establishment of a co-operative Commonwealth, which may possibly be accomplished in the far distant future. The Government and their supporters do not attack anything which the Labour Party has done, or proposes to do now, but they condemn something which, according to their own wild imaginings, may occur a hundred years hence. Constitutional government, as I understand the term, means that at certain fixed periods the people are called upon to choose their Parliament. We have a democratic form of government—in other words, Demos rules. The people elect their members of Parliament upon certain definite issues, and send them here to give effect to their mandate. Consequently, the business of Parliament is really controlled by the electors. For the Government to attack conditions which they say somebody is anxious to establish in the misty future, but which may never be established, seems to me a most extraordinary position to take up. They say that they intend to combat Socialism, and yet the very organizations to which they are appealing to fight their battle throughout Australia are themselves of a socialistic character.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member has raised a nice little bogey, and now he should knock it down.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member for Parramatta is chasing a mere shadow. The statement has been made that the Labour Party intend to rob everybody.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Who said that? I am amazed at the honorable member's unfairness. He is absolutely reckless.

Mr. SPENCE.—If the honorable member would remain silent he would not get so hopelessly mixed. The Socialism of which we have heard in this Chamber is a pure myth. The honorable and learned member for Wannon has declared that the Labour Party wish to rob the farmer—to confiscate his stock, and land, and, indeed, all his worldly possessions. I have no desire to misrepresent the honorable member for Parramatta.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member is misrepresenting me all the time.

Mr. SPENCE.—I repeat that Socialism, as defined by the honorable and learned member for Wannon, means the confiscation of all the farmer's property.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the honorable member permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member cannot ask a question at this stage.

Mr. SPENCE.—I recognise that the honorable member must be uncomfortable.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I assure the honorable member that I am uncomfortable only when I hear him make such unfair statements.

Mr. SPENCE.—The so-called anti-socialistic movement outside is merely an attempt to defeat the Labour Party by branding its members as Socialists. The Federated Employers' Union, the Property Defence League and other bodies are being associated for that purpose, and the Prime Minister has declared himself in sympathy with their objects. That fact connects every supporter of the Government with the movement in question. But I would point out that one of the meetings, which was held at Geelong, concluded by asking the Government for a grant of £1,000 to enable the producers to buy compressed fodder and to find a market for their produce. These are the people who denounce Socialism. A similar gathering, which was held at Hay, wound up by adopting resolutions urging the Government to pass an Irrigation Bill. At Adelaide, too, a meeting was recently held to form an organization to combat Socialism. Every other consideration is to be sunk in order to defeat the Labour Party. The extraordinary feature is that those who most violently denounce Socialism themselves practise it. In New South Wales, the followers of the Government, led by Mr. Carruthers, have asked for nearly £8,000,000 from the Public Works Department and, strange to say, the gentleman who requested the biggest sum, namely, £1,700,000, was the honorable member for New England who is a strong individualist. He desired that a railway could be constructed from Guyra to Grafton. As the brunt of the attack upon the Government has hitherto fallen upon the Prime Minister, I think it is about time that a little Victorian history was introduced into the debate. In this connexion, it is very singular that the Minister of Trade and Customs—who is “equal in all things” with the Prime Minister—was, when Premier of Victoria, a most astounding Socialist. In his address at Bairnsdale he submitted a very socialistic programme. He proposed to find money for housing the industrial classes, and advocated the granting of loans to the extent of 60 per cent. upon the value of the securities offered, at 6 per cent. interest, with a fifteen years’ currency. He also proposed to establish old-age pensions, and a system of State-aided insurance. He wished to go one better than the Labour Party. He further advocated technical education for all branches of industry. Does he still believe in those principles? He favored the establishment of dairy farms, in which instruction could be imparted in the best methods of making butter. He also promised to provide the people with inferior land at 5s. per acre, and proposed to compulsorily resume it. He assured his hearers that he had resumed 50 acres within a two-penny tram section, and established a settlement.

Mr. McLEAN.—And a very good settlement it is.

Mr. SPENCE.—This is the programme that we are advocating, and yet the honorable gentleman has now decided that his special mission in life is to keep the Labour Party out of power, in order to prevent these good things being brought about. If not, why did honorable members opposite put us out of power?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Why does the honorable member wish to put the honorable member for Gippsland out of power when he is so pronounced a Socialist?

Mr. BAMFORD. — Because the honorable gentleman does not propose to do those things now.

Mr. SPENCE. — I like something approaching decency and honesty in politics, and not sham, humbug, and hypocrisy. I object to men speaking in one way and acting in another. I object to their saying that these things are not socialistic, while some proposal which may never be introduced is Socialism. The co-operative Commonwealth and such things are not before us now, but the other measures to which I have referred are before us, and they are distinctly socialistic. The Minister of Trade and Customs now has as his colleague the “star” of the company opposite, whose anti-socialistic proclivities lead him to support private enterprise pure and simple. But I have not yet exhausted the honorable gentleman’s programme. He was also prepared to support grain elevators for loading the farmers’ grain, and water conservation for their benefit. All these excellent ideas are distinctly socialistic. I wish to know, and I think we are entitled to know, where honorable gentlemen opposite draw the line. The right honorable member for Swan has carried out an excellent socialistic scheme in Western Australia. It was a very big project indeed, and the right honorable gentleman deserves very great credit for having the courage to enter upon it. But he says that that is not Socialism. It is time these honorable gentlemen had some teaching to enable them to know what Socialism is, and what it is not. We say that where the general community takes up an enterprise, or in a certain degree gives assistance to an enterprise, that is State Socialism. It may be limited according to circumstances, but it is all a form of State Socialism. The Minister of Trade and Customs was consistent with his advocacy of Socialism when he went in for protection, because the object of protection is to enable people to carry on industries here by giving them the assistance of protective duties. That is distinctly socialistic.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK. — Is the honorable member a protectionist or a free-trader? We are coming to it now.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member for Parramatta need not bother himself about that. I hope I am something better than either. I do not find any reference to the matter in the speech to which I have referred, but I have been told that the present Minister of Trade and Customs, although a federalist now, was in the past somewhat opposed to Federation, on the ground that it would probably do away with the Victorian Stock Tax. The honorable gentleman, it appears, would rather sacrifice Federation than do away with the Stock Tax. I hope that his association at the present time with the right honorable gentleman, who is going to bring about harmonious relations between the Federal and States Governments, has induced him to abandon his opposition to Federation, and even to forget all about the Stock Tax. However, the honorable gentleman is, I think, in duty bound to tell the House exactly how far he is going, and how far the consent of his partner in this business, as the head of this peculiar Government, will be given to bring about complete Socialism.

Mr. McLEAN.—If the honorable member will support the Government, I shall be prepared to go as far as I said on the occasion to which he has referred.

Mr. SPENCE.—How can I support the honorable gentleman and the Government of which he is a member, when he has declared that he will knock the Labour Party out of existence if he can, and when I know that that is the only party which honestly and openly advocates these things? The members of the honorable gentleman's party say one thing and do another, and they are being backed up by a party outside that wants everything socialistic for itself, whilst it denies the advantages of Socialism to everybody else. The honorable gentleman speaks of the Labour Party as representing a section of a class. I presume that the honorable gentleman means that the wage-earning class, the artisans who work for an employer, are not to have their share of Socialism. They are not to have any share in socialistic enterprises, which are only to be proposed for the benefit of the men on the land. I shall presently have something to say about the attitude of the Government to the men on the land. I have just a word or two to say about another anti-Socialist who stood for the Victorian State Parliament at the same time as the honorable member for Gippsland, and who was a supporter of that honorable member. I refer to the honorable and learned member for Wannon. I am sorry the honorable and learned member is not here, but I shall say nothing concerning him that is not perfectly fair. I desire merely to show how much deception there is about some of these honorable gentlemen. In a speech delivered at Hamilton, when the honorable and learned member for Wannon stood for the Victorian State Parliament, after Federation had been accomplished, he was able to tell the electors that the fiscal issue had been transferred to Federal politics. As he dealt with the matter at the beginning of his address, I suppose I may conclude that it represented his first plank, and I find that the honorable and learned member complained that the retiring member had altogether neglected local requirements. He had not had enough Government money spent in the district. The honorable and learned member for Wannon was going to see that more was spent in future. The other man had done nothing, and he knew that he would be able to do a great deal more. The position which he then took up was that it was justifiable to grab Government money for the constituency; but the honorable and learned member is now an anti-socialist, and he believes only in private enterprise. I need not refer to some other statements which must have been jocular, because the honorable and learned member claimed that he was a liberal, and a follower of the Liberal Party. He told the electors that he had the support of Major Reay, with whose politics residents of Victoria are well acquainted. I find that he favoured a number of things which were advocated by the honorable member for Gippsland. For instance, the honorable and learned member for Wannon on that occasion favoured the establishment of State dairies in agricultural districts as educational institutions in which the people might be taught to make good butter—equal to the Dutch butter, and so on. That is, no doubt, a very good idea, but it is distinctly and entirely socialistic. There can be no denying that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What is the use of denying it? Would the honorable member accept a denial if he got it?

Mr. SPENCE.—But the honorable and learned member for Wannon is now denouncing Socialism. He said, further, that he would support closer settlement, and advocated the resumption of the large estates around Hamilton. That is a socialistic proposal, which has been advocated by the Labour Parties in the States. The honorable and learned member then favoured the taking away of people's land, and he is now denouncing, with all his powers of invective, the taking away of land from its owners. If further taxation was necessary, the honorable and learned member said, in reply to a question, that he would extend the land tax, so as to include cities, and towns. What about taxing the poor farmer? He also advocated old-age pensions, and that is decidedly socialistic. The honorable and learned member favoured the Factories Act, which is a socialistic measure, interfering with private enterprise. He favoured an eight-hours' day for railway employes, and he said he would compel every public servant to insure his life. That, again, is a distinctly socialistic proposal. It involves interference with individual liberty, and the denial of the right of a man to do as he likes with his own. It proposes an interference with men, by compelling them to pay a portion of their income or wages for the purpose of insuring their lives, whether they like it or not. These proposals are entirely socialistic. This only shows how ridiculous is the position of honorable members who claim to be anti-socialist, and who mouth about Socialism, when they have themselves professed to be supporters of it to the fullest extent to which it has, so far, been advocated by the Labour Party in any State. I have said before that we are entitled to claim to be judged upon the proposals we put forward, and not upon something which some one may have proposed, and which is not, and may never be, before us. It is most unfair for honorable members to make these attacks upon a growing political party. If they desire to attack the party, they should do so in an honest way on its policy. Honorable members, who have professed to attack the Labour Party, because of its socialistic principles, when they have themselves advocated those principles, are guilty of cant and hypocrisy, when they talk in the way they do. The honorable and learned member for Wannon, who now so strongly denounces all State interference, desires individual liberty, and believes all interference with private enterprise to be positively wrong, has favoured the resumption of land held by private owners in the district which he represents. In that district, there exists at the present time, I suppose, one of the most crying evils in existence in Australia, in the form of a monopoly of land. I propose to introduce here a little more detail than I had an opportunity of doing, when I spoke previously. If we take an area of 4,000 square miles, of the western portion of Victoria, we shall find that nine-tenths of it is owned by sixty families. The total number of dwellings upon it, including tents, is 1,285; the total population of the area, men, women, and children, is 7,869. According to the logic of honorable members who do not believe in interference with private enterprise, we have no right to alter that state of affairs. The owners of the land secured it under the law, and according to the people who preach private enterprise, it is theirs to do as they like with. I want honorable members to be aware of their inconsistency, when they at the same time claim that that land should be resumed. Three hundred and sixty-two miles of railway run through the area, and chiefly through properties in the hands of forty owners. These railways cost £3,753,000.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Is this in the electorate of Wannon?

Mr. SPENCE.—Some of the area traversed by the railway is in that electorate. It is in the Western district where the good rich land is to be found. The taxpayers of Victoria have contributed no less than £3,753,000 to enhance the value of the property held by these people. Is not that Socialism? Are not railways a socialistic institution in the hands of the State. They are constructed to open up country, and yet this country is monopolized. And if the policy of those who advocate non-interference with private enterprise be carried out fully, we cannot resume one of those estates in order that the land may be put to its proper use. We cannot do what the honorable and learned member for Wannon said should be done, when as a candidate for the State Parliament of Victoria he advocated that these lands should be resumed, in order that men should be put upon them instead of sheep. As another illustration I take the Hampden and Mortlake Shires, an area of 1,845 square miles, or 1,180,000 acres. In this district, twenty families own over 800,000 acres. The shire value of the territory, with all improvements, amounts to £5,000,000. The towns of Terang, Camperdown, and Mortlake are included in this valuation. The rates amount to £12,406, or to about ½d. in the £. These shires have had £4,112 from the State.

Mr. BAMFORD.—What for?

Mr. SPENCE.—For the purpose of making roads to enable these rich land-owners to get their produce to market. There is, in this district, also an illustration of what every one in Victoria knows has been a crying evil in the State for many years. These land-owners have enclosed roads, covering an area of 16,337 acres, for which they have paid nothing. Their fences include land which has been surveyed as roads, and they pay nothing for it. These persons all belong to the anti-socialistic crowd. They are supporting the present Government.

Mr. McLEAN.—Does not the honorable member know that the Labour Party in Victoria has always opposed proposals to make these persons pay for the use of the roads. Such a proposition has been made on several occasions, but has always been opposed by members of the Labour Party.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Labour Party has never been strong enough in Victoria to accomplish any great reform.

Mr. McLEAN.—But they have always opposed such a proposal. I would vote to make these persons pay for the use of the roads.

Mr. SPENCE.—I know that the honorable member would, but I am anxious to learn whether he intends to stand by the policy which he formerly advocated. Leaving out towns, over three-fourths of this area has only one human habitation to every seven square miles, and only $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the land is used for dairying. These figures are, I think, of sufficient importance to be brought under public notice, and they may induce honorable members opposite to recognise the inconsistency of their position. In the counties of Dundas, Follet, Lowan, Normandy, Villiers, Heytesbury, Ripon, and Hampden, 2,960,000 acres are held by three companies, and 105 individuals or families.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable member think that this has anything to do with the motion?

Mr. SPENCE.—I think I shall be able to connect these statistics with the motion, by showing that they constitute a reply to those who say that Socialism is the one thing against which they are fighting.

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable member can connect these statistics with the motion there will be no complaint.

Mr. SPENCE.—I shall do so, sir. One-eighth of all privately-owned land in western Victoria is held by 525 persons, 1,240,000 acres are held by eighteen persons, and over 1,000,000 acres by eleven individuals. We have heard some honorable members opposite declare that they are individualists, and are opposed to interference with private enterprise. These figures should afford them food for reflection. It may be said that the Commonwealth has nothing to do with the lands of the States, but it has been urged again and again that the Labour Party in the Federal Parliament, and those in the Parliaments of the States are controlled by the same organization, and constitute a menace to the well-being of the Commonwealth. That being so, I think we are justified in showing the inconsistency of Government supporters in attacking us, when they themselves really support the policy of our party. When they say that the Labour Party is inimical to the interests of the Commonwealth, they are really attacking their own position. They declare that they are opposed to our methods of seeking to improve the conditions of the people; but they must definitely declare whether they are going to renounce for ever the principles which they advocated before they joined the coalition. They must say where they draw the line.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We say that we are going straight on.

Mr. SPENCE.—The leaders of the Government have stated that they are opposed to Socialism, but they do not say how far they will go. Every honorable member on the Government side who has yet spoken during this debate has intimated that he is opposed to the Labour Party because it consists of socialists. We do not deny that we are socialists. We are proud to say that we are, but we certainly deny that we have ever advocated the ridiculous proposals attributed to us and to socialistic writers about the equal division of property. No true socialist has ever suggested anything of the kind. Statements of this character are purely mythical. They are sometimes made by the ignorant, and repeated as jokes, but they have never been seriously put before the people by the Labour Party. It is a very serious thing for honorable members to make such charges against us, without adducing any specific fact in support of their assertion. I desire to draw from the Government some definite statement as to what socialistic enterprises they favour or disfavour.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable member deny that any socialistic writer has ever advocated the division of the product equally?

Mr. SPENCE.—That is not the point. Honorable members have charged us with a desire to deprive men of their property, and to divide it amongst the people. The leader of the Government has intimated that his policy is an anti-socialistic one, and the Sydney Daily Telegraph, in its issue of 6th inst., puts the position of the Governments very clearly, when it says —

The Government has not come to bring peace to Socialism, but a sword, and unless it makes itself felt in opposition to the aims of the Labour Party, its mission will totally fail. That is what the fiscal issue has been sunk for, and why a coalition between Mr. Reid and Mr. McLean has become tolerable.

That is a clear statement made by a leading newspaper, which champions the present Government. In these circumstances I hold that we have not yet heard enough in regard to the policy of the Ministry.

Mr. WATSON.—They have no policy, and no remarks to offer.

Mr. SPENCE.—The members of an Opposition must naturally be opposed to a Government. We are opposed to the Government on certain grounds, which we have had no hesitation in stating. The Government say that they are opposed to us on certain grounds. They say that we are socialistic, but they do not give us any full insight into their policy. We term ourselves the Labour Party, and put a definite programme before the people, and we say to the Government, "Tell us what are your objections to us."

Mr. McLEAN.—We are not endeavouring to turn the Opposition out. If we were, we should state our objections to it.

Mr. SPENCE.—The mission of the Government is wholly against the Labour Party. According to the Sydney Daily Telegraph, they wish to prevent any increase in the strength and power of the party. As a matter of fact, we have read of more Ministerial statements of policy made outside than we have been favoured with in the House. I have brought these statements before the Government, and I ask for a reply. When I was discussing, a few days ago, the limited and shadowy programme outlined by the Prime Minister, in his declaration of policy, I challenged the Government to show that there was any desire on the part of the Labour Party to crush any section of the community, and to drive men, as was alleged, into the gutter. The Government may, or may not, have a majority, but they should make a straight-out honest statement, and deal fairly with us. Statements should not be bandied about, for which there is no foundation.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—After this, I shall never say anything more.

Mr. SPENCE.—Before the honorable member leaves, I should like him to listen to one short quotation that I intend to read. He had something to say last night about Socialism, and I desire him to hear a short extract from a very excellent address delivered recently in Sydney by Dr. Mercer, Bishop of Tasmania, on the socialistic movement. I do not know whether the honorable member has read the report of that address.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I have.

Mr. SPENCE.—Then he must see that the views of the Bishop—who certainly ought to be accepted as an authority on questions of morals and ethics, and of the religious aspect of any social or political movement—are entirely at variance with those which he has enunciated. Dr. Mercer, in dealing with the socialistic movement said that—

He believed that, while there might be bad motives in it, there were good ones at the bottom of the social movement, and there were a number of educated thinking men who were moved with compassion for the multitude, because of all the sweating and miseries of slum life. He had had eight years' experience in the slums of London, and if any man realized the enormous amount of suffering and degradation there was among members of the human race at the present time, if he had any sympathy at all with the Saviour of mankind when he looked on the multitude in the wilderness, he must have compassion on them, and he believed that there was at the heart of the socialistic movement of the present day genuine compassion for the multitude, and a determination to raise the standard of life for the submerged mass of the race. Then there was the sense of brotherhood to be found in the movement, and he believed in that brotherhood of humanity, and that they were increasingly realizing what that brotherhood could be, because of some of the socialistic ideas. The people might be long in working them out, but he thought they were setting them ideals towards which they could work.

That is but a very short extract from a very excellent address, and I think that the sentiments expressed indicate that the Bishop has made a more correct analysis of the socialistic movement than has the honorable member.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable member call that which he has read an analysis of the socialistic system?

Mr. SPENCE.—I have merely said that the address was an excellent one. I have not said that it was an analysis of the socialistic system.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member used the word "analysis."

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable member must be opposed to Socialism, or he would not associate himself with the party which is now making an attack on something which it terms Socialism. The wild outcry against Socialism is simply a bogey. It has been raised for party purposes. Either it is a case of ignorance appealing to ignorance—because the declamations against Socialism, which we hear, will have no weight with the intelligent, or with those who have paid any attention to the study of the social questions—or it is simply a cry raised for party gains. Having nothing else to urge against the Labour Party, our opponents must raise this bogey. Other persons have raised the cry of “reform,” knowing that it is a good word and that many people have no time to study socialistic questions. The statement has also been made by our opponents that we are going to rob the farmers of their land. They expect to create such an antagonism against the Labour Party that they will be bound to win when a dissolution takes place. That is the plain object of the coalition. We rejoice that they have adopted these tactics. It is the best thing that could happen for our movement. The stronger the reactionary parties outside Parliament fight, the more successful will the Labour Party be. We are on solid ground, and put forward measures which we contend are practical. It is not denied by the Government that they are practical. They have offered some criticism on the only proposal which we have put forward that seems to be debatable in a socialistic sense—the tobacco monopoly proposal. With this exception, they advocate every one of our measures and adopt them as their own. Therefore, their present tactics are merely an attempt to appeal to the prejudice and the ignorance of the people. We are not afraid of that. When we can get the people to understand our proposals we have no fear that we shall secure their support. If, as honorable members opposite contend, they wish to prevent Socialism and promote private enterprise, let them advocate the selling of the Government railways and the putting of all enterprise of that description in the hands of private persons. As we have now reached the usual hour for adjournment, will the Government consent to my continuing my speech to-morrow?

Mr. McLEAN.—We have no objection. Debate adjourned.

House adjourned at 10.32 p.m.

Mr. SPEAKER took the chair at 10.30 a.m., and read prayers.

MOTION OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Debate resumed from 22nd September (vide page 4882), on motion by Mr. WATSON—

That the present Administration does not possess the confidence of this House.

Mr. SPENCE (Darling).—One of the issues raised in connexion with this motion of censure is that, although the fiscal question has been sunk by the people, a movement is being made to raise it again, and I wish to present to the House a few of the reasons why there is an objection on the part of the Government to the raising of it. To show what kind of friends the farmers and pastoralists will have in the present Administration if they get their way, I would like to refer to what happened in my own electorate just prior to the last elections. I was opposed by a single-taxer, a gentleman of the school to which the honorable members for Lang and New England, and some others, belong. He took the trouble to go all the way from Mudgee to Sydney to hear the right honorable member for East Sydney state the policy of the Free-trade Party, and, in presenting his case to the electors, no doubt carefully followed the right honorable gentleman and the official organs of the party, the Sydney Daily Telegraph and the Sydney Morning Herald. The occupations of the people in my electorate, although somewhat varied, come chiefly under the three heads—pastoral, farming, and mining pursuits, and in appealing to these people for support, he denounced taxation through the Custom House as something wrong. But, as revenue was necessary, he supported a revenue Tariff, such as has been advocated both here and on the hustings by the leader of the Free-trade Party. He wished to levy the same rate of duties on all importations. What that rate would be does not matter much for the purposes of my argument, but I think that Sir William McMillan has stated that it would require an average duty of about 15 per cent. to raise the amount of revenue necessary. He would therefore have reduced those duties which now have a protective incidence, and would, on the other hand, have placed duties on articles which are now admitted free. It will be interesting to see what effect that would have upon the people in the country districts. Under our Tariff, only the articles which are specifically named are subject to duty. In addition to those articles there is a long list of articles specifically exempted from duty, while all other articles not mentioned are also admitted duty free. As a matter of fact, the Commonwealth Tariff has about the biggest free list possessed by any Tariff in the world, and contains over 1,100 items in its list of exemptions. I therefore followed my opponent round the electorate, and pointed out to the people what would be the effect of his proposal. I showed them that the articles which they mostly used are now admitted free. In connexion with pastoral work, shears, shearing machinery, woolpacks, cornsacks, galvanized iron, fencing wire, and wire netting, are all admitted free; while the farmers are allowed to import over twenty items of farming machinery free, in addition to the articles which I have named, and which they use in common with the pastoralists. Furthermore, household commodities of which there is a large daily consumption, such as tea and kerosene, are admitted free, while cotton goods, which are so greatly used for the clothing of families, pay a duty of only 5 per cent. My opponent was actively supported by a canvasser for Messrs. Paling and Co., of Sydney, and he was urging upon the electors the desirability of adopting a free-trade policy, such as that advocated by the Prime Minister, under which the duty would be taken off pianos, and the taxes upon the necessaries of life increased. The policy of the Prime Minister is to reduce the duty on the luxuries of the rich, and to levy imposts upon the necessaries of the poor. This would have been a very good policy for Messrs. Paling and Co., who at present have to compete with a local manufacturer, who derives a certain amount of benefit from the protective Tariff. Very few of our struggling settlers are in a position to afford pianos, and these buy only one piano in a life-time. The Prime Minister is sinking the fiscal issue temporarily only, because he has made no secret of the fact that both sides are to keep their powder dry, and to hold themselves prepared to fight the fiscal question at the next election. Therefore, after having obtained the co-operation of the alleged protectionists, the free-traders will endeavour to secure the introduction of what is called free-trade, but which is a mere sham and a humbug. How could our settlers be benefited by the introduction of a system of free-trade which would require them to pay higher duties upon the necessaries of life? I am in favour of allowing the Tariff to stand for the present, because under it the people enjoy a certain measure of free-trade. As a matter of fact, I have been more loyal to free-trade principles than have some of those honorable members who are now supporting the Government. In connexion with the question of preferential trade with Great Britain, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat advocated the raising of the Tariff against the foreigner, whilst maintaining the present duties against Great Britain. The Prime Minister, on the other hand, favoured the lowering of the Tariff wall, so far as Great Britain was concerned, and maintaining it against the foreigner. Therefore, he advocates the adoption of a protectionist policy against the foreigners, and a half-and-half free-trade policy towards the old country. I would point out, however, that about one-fourth of our imports are upon the free list, and that in regard to the articles therein enumerated we might give Great Britain all the preference necessary if we were to impose duties upon imports from foreign countries. The free list embraces tools of trade and a number of other articles which can be manufactured in England as well as elsewhere, and it seems to me that the possibilities of adopting the preferential principle in connexion with this section of our Tariff might profitably engage the attention of our statesmen. The Prime Minister has boasted that in New South Wales he relieved the poor of some of their burdens, and placed them upon the shoulders of the rich; and I think that he might proceed still further in the same direction in connexion with any contemplated alterations of the Federal Tariff. I do not see that any objection can be urged against the proposal to appoint a Tariff Commission. It is highly desirable that we should inquire into the working of the Tariff, with a view to remedying any defects, and removing anomalies. The appointment of such a Commission could not be regarded as committing us to the revival of the fiscal issue. So far as I am aware, the only person who has proposed Tariff revision is the Prime Minister himself. He declared, some time ago, that he was desirous of lowering duties which have a protective incidence, with a view to imposing an equal duty all round.

Mr. REID.—Has the honorable member read the terms of the alliance to which he has subscribed? Do not the words, "Including Tariff revision," appear there?

Mr. SPENCE.—It is merely a question of degree. If we deal with one item in the Tariff only, that may or may not be called Tariff revision. The words to which the Prime Minister has drawn attention do not necessarily imply that we wish to reopen the whole of the Tariff issue. If the question of preferential trade were to ripen—I do not think that it will, within the life of the present Parliament, even if we avoid a dissolution—I claim that we should be able to enter into arrangements with the mother country without any interference with the existing Tariff. Both parties to the coalition subscribe to the idea that a preference should be extended to British goods. To assure our producers that they would be benefited by the imposition of an all-round duty of 15 per cent., is simply to attempt to deceive them. The endeavour to persuade them to regard the Labour Party as their enemies is also prompted by deceit and hypocrisy. Amongst honorable members who sit behind the Government, are some who believe that the single tax is a panacea for all evils. The honorable member for New England and others favour that doctrine, and it is most extraordinary, therefore, that they should join in a denunciation of Socialism. The adoption of the single-tax, which they regard as the solution of the labour problem, would mean that, for the purposes of the community, the State would receive the whole economic rent of land. In other words, all the unearned increment would be appropriated by the State for the general good. Can we conceive of a more socialistic proposal than that? I should like to ask the advocates of that doctrine who constitute a big section of the Ministerial supporters, and who are continually telling the farmers that the Labour Party wish to steal their land, what they would do with this vast revenue when it had been collected. Those who have bestowed most attention upon the matter admit that they would then give the community the benefit of free railways. Would not that be Socialism? Where is the difference? I repeat that those who denounce Socialism most loudly are themselves pronounced Socialists, only they choose to call things by different names. Personally, I have no faith in mere names—I desire to get at realities. The whole of the Government attack upon the Labour Party has centred around the term "Socialism." It is a boggy, but even bogies exert some influence. I think that I clearly demonstrated last night that the organizations to which the Government are appealing to fight their battle are of a most reactionary character, and that they represent merely a class—the smallest in the Commonwealth—which is constantly demanding from the Government concessions which it is not prepared to extend to others. It does not recognise equal rights to every section of the community. The members of the Labour Party receive the support of the wage-earning class chiefly, because their interests in the past have been neglected. We are here to definitely voice their requirements, and chiefly because the needs of other sections are very carefully studied by other honorable members. I do not intend to touch upon the destruction of industries which would follow the carrying out of the Government policy, further than to say that under their proposals we should not have either a free-trade Tariff or a protective one. A so-called revenue Tariff would be merely a sham. I wish to show what the Socialism that we advocate really means, and to appeal to honorable members opposite to give us fair play in view of the necessity to do something to improve the welfare of society, and I use the term in its broadest sense. I am pleased to think that we have at last entered upon the consideration of a question that certainly constitutes the one great issue of the present day—the question of how to improve the lot of all classes. The Socialism which we believe in recognises that the present social system is running more or less rapidly—rapidly, I think—in a direction in which it cannot be permitted to continue. Changes must be made. I shall endeavour to show that the developments taking place in all phases of industrial life among the civilized nations of the world are in the direction of collectivism. The whole industrial movement is in the direction of Socialism, and it is only because words convey different meanings to different minds that that fact is not recognised. This industrial movement towards Socialism is not a conscious one. It is not being specially directed by Governments, Labour Parties, or Socialists. The development of the socialistic movement, some phases of which have been touched on during the debate, is the result of an analysis on the part of the people of the conditions that are being created by the commercial classes and by others who are antagonistic to labour ideals. Just as we find strong evidence of approval of socialistic movements, in the practical sense of the term, on the part of the present Government, so we find an evolution in the same way taking place throughout the industrial life of the civilized world. It is too late for honorable members opposite now to attempt to stem the flood. We call upon them to recognise the movement, and to join with members of the Labour Party who, perhaps, have obtained a fuller insight into the wretchedness and misery of life, in endeavouring, so far as possible by legislation, to secure better conditions for all who work, whether by muscle or by brain. The basis of modern trade and production is simply that of profit. A man cannot employ labour unless he makes a profit on it. In the broad sense of the term there are only two economic elements to be considered, land and labour. Labour is now being massed, and placed under captains of industry. The individualist is disappearing, and it is therefore somewhat surprising to hear some honorable members talk so freely about the necessity to protect the rights of the individual, and to develop individual power. What the Socialists contend is that the existing social system is destructive of individuality. The masses recognise that the employment of labour depends upon whether the employer can make profit on it, and that the measure of gains is affected by factory legislation imposing certain conditions on employers of labour, and by conciliation and arbitration laws, which have a very important bearing in that respect upon them. They recognise that, as the result of these conditions, employers are interested in keeping men out of work. That is the most remarkable state of affairs. It is deplorable that men who control vast interests should be able to profit by the misery of their fellow beings—that workers should be kept out of employment in order that the cost of production may be kept down. But, if men remain out of employment, the demand for the output of those who are producing for a profit is lessened. If the workers form strong trade unions, and become so powerful that they can make demands on employers for conditions which they are unable to meet, the employers may close down their works. They are able to stand out longer than their workmen, and in that way may practically starve them into submission. From the point of view of self-interest the workers recognise that this is not a desirable state of affairs, and they say that the only proper solution of the difficulty is for them to provide employment for themselves. The socialistic movement, which has been referred to as having for its object a co-operative Commonwealth, has underlying it the great principle of increased co-operation on the part of the people. In one sense we are a co-operative people. We are all dependent upon one another. No man can live by himself, and of all classes those who are called independent are in reality the most dependent. They could do nothing but for the labour of those whom they would not think of admitting into their drawingroom. Some of them would not even be able to cook a meal for themselves without the labour which they employ; they would die of starvation without it, and yet it is said that they are independent. That is a misleading term. Notwithstanding all this talk of individualism on the part of certain persons, it is interesting to note the way in which men are forced to do things that they do not want to do. By way of illustration I would refer to an incident that occurred recently to a gentleman associated with an anti-socialistic organization operating more particularly in this State. We have heard of an organization called the Farmers' and Property Owners' League, which is giving its support to the present Government. That league has in its employment a gentleman named Sievwright, who has been carrying on the work of organization. I am not acquainted with him, but he seems to be an educated man. I am told that he is a solicitor, and yet such is our social system that this intelligent, educated man was brought before a court a week ago and cross-examined as to why he had neglected to support certain relatives. I regard that case as one of the saddest pictures and most striking parodies on our present social system. Here is a gentleman of education, with a profession by means of which he ought to be able to do well for his family; and yet, in order to live, he has week by week to preach doctrines which he himself must feel are not true. Mr. Sievwright will be expected to organize the farmers and denounce the Labour Party as the enemy of the producer—to tell the farmers that there is no need for arbitration laws, and that there is plenty of work for everybody. Personally, I think it rather disgraceful that there should be such exposures in connexion with old-age pensions. We hear a great noise made about the inquisitorial character of an income tax, and yet this man is called upon to publicly declare the fact that his sisters are unable to obtain work, that his daughter has to give her services for half-a-crown a week, and that his brother works in a solicitor's office for a wage of 30s. All this is an absolute travesty on our present social system. We hear much prating about individualism, but what do we observe, for instance, in connexion with our leading newspapers and the press generally? Some of the best brains are engaged in advocating in the columns of the newspapers doctrines and policies in which they do not believe. What chance is there to develop and maintain individualism when, in the mere struggle for bread and butter, a man is forced to do that which is revolting to him? I know reporters and others connected with the press who have to earn their crust by writing what to them is personally unpalatable, and who feel that what they do is not honest. Surely there is something in the idea of Socialism, if by that means such a state of things may be altered so that every one may have a chance to do the work for which he is most fitted, and thus lead to the better industrial organization of society. At present people have to select occupations, not from choice, but from force; every father of a family knows that in seeking openings for his sons and daughters, he cannot always find the industry or trade for which they are most suited. I should like to remind honorable members of the position in our great manufacturing industries where men and women become simply parts of the machinery. Where, under such circumstances, is the room for the development of individual liberty? Where is there room for private enterprise? "Private enterprise" is another favourite parrot cry of those who have no knowledge of its true meaning; they cannot realize that for enterprise of the kind there is no opening when each mechanic is forcibly fitted into a groove. Where is the room for private enterprise in the case of the coal miner, who has to produce at so much per ton, knowing that the harder he works the less chance there will be of continued employment? Such a man is forced and driven, and his position can only be described as one of wage slavery. In every industrial branch of life similar conditions prevail. Men know that the harder they work, and the more they produce, the more they are depriving their fellows of employment. There is a cry of denunciation if such men do not work hard enough; we hear complaints of what is called the "Ca-Canny" system in English trade unionism. What is the object of this denunciation? It is to allow some few persons to become rich. Where is the gain? Professor Warren tells us in his interesting study of the subject—

Insufficiently and poorly-paid employment is the greatest single cause of degeneracy.

We hear honorable members speaking of paying men according to what they can earn; and yet we already have conditions of life in which adults and children are insufficiently fed, and even then on adulterated food. And then because these poor people have no possible chance of developing physically or mentally, so as to hold their own with the stronger, they are punished by being told that they shall receive only what they are able to earn. That is a great blot on the system which honorable members opposite favour, and desire to maintain. Have those honorable members ever really studied the matter. As Henschell says—

To allow a class of society to live in idleness and wax fat on the degradation and demoralization of their fellow-men seems to me to be little less than a crime perpetuated by society, and an evil in the sight of God.

That is a statement by a great thinker; and I have other quotations which I have been careful to make from the writings of those who are not associated with the Labour Party, but are observers and students, whose writings I commend to those concerned in the great attack on a movement which is undoubtedly coming, but which is very much misunderstood. The present system only tends to build up an idle rich class, with a sweated poor at the other end of society. One of the great evils, probably the greatest, is the moral degradation which inevitably follows. Then there has to be taken into account the further result of the destruction of human life, and also the class hatred bred of the class feeling inseparable from present conditions. I think there is a great deal of suggestiveness in a short quotation which I wish to make from Dr. Edward Caird, in his presidential address to the Ethical Society of England a short time ago. Dr. Caird said—

As a class, men of culture are not in much danger of being possessed by a frantic love of evil and hatred of good, but sometimes they are in danger of losing a belief in the greatness of the issues of existence which are hid under its littleness, and in the worth of every human life in spite of the triviality and meanness of its appearance.

That is the position of which the Labour Party complain—that there is not enough thought given to those numerous individuals who are, to some extent, lost sight of, and are treated, perhaps, as we are all, from want of thought, inclined to treat those with whom we are not brought in close contact. We read of thousands slain in a great battle, but we cannot bring ourselves into close enough sympathy with the afflicted to realize what that slaughter means to the many friends and relatives of the combatants. And so in the industrial struggle; the idle rich follow a butterfly existence, their wives often regarding it as rather desirable that they should have a chance of exercising charity, so that they may get credit as philanthropists amongst those unfortunate people through whom, and by whose work and energies, their wealth has been obtained. I should like to read another quotation on the same line of thought by Prince Krapotkin, and in which I think he voices the feeling of the workers. He says—

Where, then, are these young people who have been taught at our expense? These youths whom we fed and clothed while they studied? Where are those for whom, our backs bent double beneath our burdens and our bellies empty, we have built these houses, these colleges, these lecture-rooms, these museums? Where are the men for whose benefit we, with our pale, worn faces, have printed these fine books, most of which we cannot even read? Where are they, these professors who claim to possess the science of mankind, and for whom humanity itself is not worth a rare caterpillar? Where are the men who are ever speaking in praise of liberty, and never think to champion our freedom, trampled as it is each day beneath their feet? Where are they, these writers and poets, these painters and sculptors? Where, in a word, is the whole gang of hypocrites who speak of the People with tears in their eyes, but never, by any chance, find themselves among us helping in our laborious work?

We say that that very fine quotation voices feelings of which we may not be always conscious, which are not always given utterance to so clearly, but which are always present. Class feeling and hatred are expressed in those burning words. There is discontent and dissatisfaction, and it must find an outlet if no improvement is made. But in this more or less intelligent age we must have some improvement. In dealing with the relations of the capitalistic class with the worker, what is said by the organizer and mouth-piece of the Federated Employers' Union? We have heard many quotations of what Tom Mann has said, and a great fuss has been made about his views. I am glad that people are taking a note of what Tom Mann has said. We on this side are charged with responsibility for every word he has uttered. I do not know whether every honorable member in this House would like to be held always responsible for every sentence he utters, it may be under some little excitement, but we are told that we must be responsible for all the sayings of Tom Mann. We are prepared to stand by him too, for that matter. But will honorable members on the other side stand by their organizer and take all responsibility for the utterances of Mr. Walpole, who is reported in the Lilydale Express of 18th April, 1902, to have said that—

Marriage was a luxury for the workers as were also "long sleepers," attending theatres and the like, and it was not fair to compel employers to pay for these things.

That is economically unsound, but it is the teaching of these people, and it is what they believe. They have not yet realized that they are not paying the workers. They do not pay any man unless they make a profit out of his labour. As a matter of fact, labour pays itself. Henry George, of whom there are some students on the other side, many years ago made it clear that labour pays its own wages.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Did not the honorable and learned member for Wannon read a letter from a clergyman saying that Mr. Walpole did not make the statement attributed to him?

Mr. SPENCE.—No; the honorable and learned member only said that he had such a letter; he did not read it.

Mr. PAGE.—Who was it said that—Tom Mann?

Mr. SPENCE.—No, Mr. Walpole, a man who gets a very big salary for propagating doctrines of this kind. He is the mouth-piece of the Employers' Union, the members of which are the backers of the present Government. The Government is, therefore, responsible in a sense for the utterances of Mr. Walpole. That is fair logic and good reasoning. If we are to be responsible for what Tom Mann says, and for the writings and sayings of the wildest and most extreme Socialists and anarchists in any part of the world, surely the Government can stand by Mr. Walpole?

Mr. McDONALD.—Is this the same Mr. Walpole who was on the platform with the Prime Minister a little time ago?

Mr. SPENCE.—The same gentleman. This is the Government mouth-piece. This is the agitator who, together with Mr. Sievwright and others, as the organizations are able to raise funds to pay them, is going round to educate the community. The most extreme labour man and the most extreme Socialist in Australia would not say anything resembling that which Mr. Walpole said. This man holds that marriage, as well as long-sleevers and theatres, is a luxury, and that working men should not have any of these things. Of course, they should not. They should not be other than slaves. We say that they are slaves. I believe that Aristotle gave expression to a great truth when he said that the working classes would always be slaves until machinery did the work. Our attitude, in contradistinction to that assumed by Mr. Walpole, may be stated in various ways, but I quote a few words used by Archdeacon Wilson, who states it very well—

We must press forward the popularization of the ideal of making human beings the supreme aim of our nation.

The members of the Federated Employers' Union are opposed to that. They favour individualism, the development of private enterprise, non-interference by the State; and profit-making is their sole consideration. The honorable member for Parramatta made reference to some great law. By interjection I asked the honorable gentleman what law he meant. He did not reply, but I presume that the great law to which he referred is one with which people of his school of thought have always associated themselves. They call it "the law of supply and demand." These people have a set of phrases which they have repeated for a century. I do not suppose that the honorable member for Parramatta is a century old, but his are ideas which were held a century ago, and the honorable member has practically stopped there. It requires but five minutes' reflection to enable honorable members to perceive that private enterprise is interfered with in almost every way already, and that there is no such thing as persons being allowed to do as they like. If they were, the social state would be one of pure anarchy. I say that our one great aim is the development of the individual, the human being. The nation is a nation of men and women. I understand that the statement to which I have referred as having been made by Mr. Walpole was made in reply to a vote of thanks, moved by a clergyman. I presume the clergyman expressed some approval of what Mr. Walpole had said, and I suppose he now feels called upon to some extent to stand by what was said in reply to his vote of thanks. Mr. Walpole did but give expression to what others who think in the same way have not the courage to say. Men of this class believe in non-interference with the law of supply and demand, because if that law is not interfered with they will be able to secure very cheap slaves, and in their own short lives they may become very rich. I do not care to follow a certain line of argument at great length, or I might show that riches themselves take wings and fly when more powerful competitors succeed in crushing out those who possess them. A recent return of insolvencies in the United States of America show that insolvents in that country in one year had failed for £17,000,000. But that is nothing at all compared with what we can do in Victoria. In this great progressive State insolvents in one year have failed for £3,000,000, £4,000,000, £5,000,000, and in the boom time for no less than £8,000,000. Against failures in the United States to the extent of £17,000,000 in a population of 75,000,000, we have had failures in this State, with a population of 1,000,000, to the extent of £8,000,000. It is clear that we can beat the Americans at going insolvent. These figures show that private enterprise does not always result in success. Of ten people embarking in business, three may fail utterly, four or five may struggle along making a bare living, and one or two may make a fortune. A very wise and suggestive thing was said by Cicero—

One thing ought to be aimed at by men, and the interest of each individual and all collectively should be the same, for if each should grasp at his individual interests all human society would be dissolved.

That was said a long time ago, but the truth of it will be evident to every one. Unless we consider the interests of each and all, society must fail. The members of society must be studied entirely from the collective stand-point. Men and women must be continually considered from that stand-point. Only by so considering them, can we afford an opportunity for individual development on the best lines. To do otherwise is to permit a system under which greed is allowed to work injury and injustice to the great mass of the community. Thomas Carlyle, the great thinker, said—

This that they call the organization of labour is the universal vital problem of the world. It is the problem of the whole future for all who will in future pretend to govern men.

I commend that saying of the old prophet to the present Government for their careful consideration—the organization of labour is the universal and vital problem. It is the one problem which is looming large in connexion with the foundation work of this great Commonwealth. But, apparently, the supporters of this Government have something to learn as to what that organization means. Socialists say that the movement referred to is the organization of society as a whole, guided by Government; that is to say, that the evils of industrial revolution, which become every day more and more apparent to every thoughtful and observing person, must be removed, and that certain changes must be introduced by legislation that will permit of social evolution on healthy lines. It is because we recognise the course of this evolution that the Socialist movement has arisen. It is because the founders of that movement have studied it, and know the direction in which it is going, that they have become socialists. They are the only body of people in the world who have a solution to offer, which they claim to be practical in connexion with these great problems. I admit that there are Socialists—in New South Wales, for instance, we have the Australian Socialists' League—who wish to have great reforms brought about quickly. They wish to have them effected by Act of Parliament—in a day. But those are extremists. They are really against us. They make attacks upon the Labour Party. They oppose us at the elections. They run candidates who generally forfeit their deposits. But they are not discouraged by that, and run them again. I think that the Socialist candidate of this school in New South Wales received nine votes in the labour constituency. That fact shows that strength there is behind their proposals. That is the answer which I give to those who twit us with holding the extreme views of the Socialists to whom I have referred. Those honorable members take certain propositions enunciated by such socialists, and which agree to some extent with the principles of more moderate socialists, who do not want reforms to be effected quite so quickly, and accuse the moderates of holding the opinions of the extremists. The healthier class of Socialists, of whom there are many, recognise that the only trend of events which is likely to lead to beneficial results is that which would allow matters to develop themselves steadily and slowly, making changes in our law which would at the same time afford an opening for further developments on right and healthy lines. I desire to make a few quotations to show that there is a justification for certain of the claims which we put forward in support of a position which will have to be faced very shortly. They will show that our views are not merely abstract, and will also indicate to what an extent advanced opinions have been uttered by leading men, great thinkers, who in their day were strongly denounced as being extremists, and as enunciating doctrines which were destructive of the rights of property. Let me show what extreme things have been said by some great writers even within a recent period. Henry George said—

This thing is absolutely certain: private property in land blocks the way of advancing civilization. The two cannot long co-exist. Either private property in land must be abolished, or, as has happened again and again in the history of mankind, civilization must turn back in anarchy and bloodshed.

One could hardly have a stronger statement than that. Professor F. W. Newman said—

To make away into mercenary hands as an article of trade the whole solid area on which a nation lives is astonishing as an idea of statesmanship.

That also is a very strong statement. In connexion with the principles of those who have fought against the private ownership of land, I might quote the old Mosaic law, which is to be found in the Book of Leviticus, and which should be remembered by every one of us—

The land shall not be sold for ever, for the land is mine; for ye are strangers and sojourners with me.

That is true; we live upon this earth only for a short time, and it is a duty imposed upon us to endeavour to improve the conditions of the millions who will come after us. John Stuart Mill, who is a favorite author of even some of our Conservative friends, said—

The land of Ireland, the land of every country, belongs to the people of that country. No man made the land—it is the original inheritance of the whole species. Its appropriation is wholly a question of general expediency. When private property in land is not expedient it is unjust.

Next let me quote a passage from the great W. E. Gladstone. He said—

Those persons who possess large portions of the earth's surface are not altogether in the same position as the possessor of mere personality. Personality does not impose limitations on the actions and industry of man and the well-being of the community as possession of land does, and, therefore, I freely own that compulsory expropriation is admissible, and even sound in principle.

A great man in Gladstone's position could scarcely have made a stronger statement than that the expropriation of land was sound in principle. What do my honorable friends opposite say to that? Herbert Spencer, who recently died, and who was a very great thinker, said—

It may be perceived that equity utters dictates to which we have not yet listened, and we may then learn that to deprive others of the use of the earth is to commit a crime inferior only in wickedness to the crime of taking away their lives or personal liberties.

Now, I do not wish, however, to deal with the land question. I may remark that privately-owned land in Great Britain yields to the owners of the parchments which signify their titles to their properties, a revenue of £250,000,000 per annum, and represents a capital value of £8,000,000,000. The use which I wish to make of that fact is this: The greatest problem of to-day perhaps arises from the changes which are made in industry by the introduction of machinery. The position is very well put by an American writer, Daniel de Leon, who said—

The ladder up which mankind has been climbing toward civilization, the ever more powerful tool of production, is the stormy centre around which the modern social storm rages. The capitalist class seeks to keep it for its own exclusive use. The middle class seeks to break it down, thereby throwing civilization back. The proletariat seeks to preserve it and improve it, and open it to all.

The fact is that the next change, which is being clearly seen in connexion with this matter, is associated with the ownership and control of machinery. I would remind honorable members that in all our States we have by common consent recognised the right of interference with the ownership of land. Gladstone, in his great measure, took the question of rents out of the hands of private owners, and, in so doing, struck a blow at that which used to be called the divine right of owning land. "The sacred rights of property" is one of the many phrases which are gradually becoming obsolete. Men do not talk so strongly now about that phase of the subject. The great work which has been done in that connexion has led in Ireland and England, even in London itself, to the resuming of areas in municipalities, and the compelling of owners to pull down old buildings—things which we are also doing in Australia. The point I wish to establish is that we have gone beyond that stage when such proposals created alarm; we have now reached a period when statements regarding the taking over of machinery and the control of production create alarm. Just as in the other case the State found that it had to interfere to carry out the view of Archdeacon Wilson, to give the people a chance to live and so insure the preservation of the race, so we contend that in regard to machinery the same need will have to be recognised. The position that every individual is in is put very well by Professor Moore in the following quotation:—

The fate which befalls the individual in society is not the fate which he merits always, but is necessarily that which his group makes inevitable. Historic justice is not individual but social.

I shall now read a quotation to show what Socialism is not, and then endeavour to make clear to honorable members the reason for these references to the land question and other changes of ideas. Robert Blatchford, who is an English Socialist, and the editor of the Clarion, gives in his Merrie England an answer, which I shall quote in reply to the statements made by the leader of the Government and other random speakers about what Socialism is. Blatchford says—

Socialism does not consist in violently seizing upon the property of the rich and sharing it out amongst the poor. Socialists do not propose by a single Act of Parliament, or by a sudden revolution to put all men on an equality and compel them to remain so. Socialism is not a wild dream of a happy land where the apples drop off the trees into our open mouths, the fish come out of the rivers and fry themselves for dinner, and the looms turn out ready-made suits of velvet with golden buttons without the trouble of coaling the engine. Neither is it a dream of stained-glass angels, who never say damn, who always love their neighbours better than themselves, and who never need to work unless they wish to.

No; Socialism is none of these things. It is a scientific scheme of national government entirely wise, just, and practical.

Mr. MAUGER.—Who says that?

Mr. SPENCE.—That statement is made by Robert Blatchford in his Merrie England, which honorable members opposite should read. The book is written in a simple form for those who have a limited intelligence, and therefore is one from which honorable members opposite can learn the A B C of Socialism. A perusal of its pages would give them more correct ideas on the subject. Socialists understand, from close study, what they are aiming at. That they differ in opinion on details is a matter of no consequence, because that occurs in regard to all proposals. Probably the ideas of Louis Gronland who has gone largely into details of how to run a co-operative Commonwealth, would not suit the English or Australian people. The Germanic brand of Socialism is intended for a people who have grown up under a different system, under which every man can be located, and has to fit into a place. It would be natural for writers in that country to be tinged with bureaucratic ideas. But that is not the view generally adopted by English Socialists, and certainly not by the leaders of the movement here which is being termed Socialism. I propose to read a quotation to illustrate the spirit which underlies Socialism. It displays an earnestness which should be recognised, and which justifies us in calling upon our opponents to show that our proposals are wrong and impracticable. It is taken from a work by J. Bruce Glasier on the religion of Socialism, and it is submitted to the consideration of honorable members because statements have been made in this Chamber about the religion of Socialism. The writer says—

And by implying that Socialism has, or is, a religion—what must we be understood to mean? This and no more: that Socialism gives us our highest ideal of the conduct of life, and calls from us the highest service of thought, emotion, and deed—that it is our aim and prophecy, and to it is due the utmost and gladdest devotion of all our gifts and powers.

The next quotation I propose to read is taken, not from one of the great writers, but from John Tamlyn, of Burnley, a propagandist and active worker in the movement, who is well acquainted with the every-day life of the people, and does not reason out his subject on abstract lines. Here is one view which he presents—

What is Socialism? I will give what commends itself to me as a practical working definition. Socialism is an attempt by State Organization of Labour to make every individual of the community perform some honest part of the labour of the community, and to prevent individuals becoming parasites, and shirking behind the labour of their fellows. Socialism recognises the fact that man has the same selfish instincts as the other animals. Socialism recognises the further fact that when men are left to their own free will—to seek their own good in Society—their tendency is, obeying the lower instincts of their nature, to seek their own good at the expense of their fellows. Socialism declares that in spite of all the preaching to love their neighbour, at present this is the case: the common good has decayed, and a few heap up masses of wealth on the one hand, while thousands live in the direst poverty on the other. Socialism declares that such a state of things, which allows each individual to seek his own particular good at the expense of his fellows, is not Society but anarchy.

Mr. MAUGER.—Who said that?

Mr. SPENCE.—John Tamlyn, of Burnley. This quotation is taken from one of the propaganda tracts which are scattered broadcast among the masses of the people. And I challenge any honorable member on the other side to say that it is not a reasonable answer to the statements made by the right honorable gentleman at the head of the Government that Socialism would make all men equal, destroy individuality of character, cause a dividing up, tempt the weak to live on the strong, and so on. But no Socialist advocates the dividing up or taking away of the property of other persons. Let honorable members refer to the writings of those who are authorities on the subject, and study those writings, and then let them discuss the problem on its merits. Only mischief is done by making political cries of words, instead of paying attention to the true meaning underlying those words. The leader of the Government is reported in the Sydney Daily Telegraph of the 1st September to have said—

His own belief contained two ideals: He believed it was a true ideal in politics to use the national power in every conceivable way to advance the welfare of the community. The other ideal he had was to leave individual power as free as he could, consistently with proper national legislation. The mistake of the Socialists was that they would destroy the one ideal so that they might push the other to extreme limits. Under the Socialist's ideal the weaker man would be leaning on the stronger.

We accept the first two statements. The ideals of the right honorable member, so far, are our ideals. But we deny that any Socialist holds the views that he sets forth in his third statement. To put such views forward as socialistic ideals is to misrepresent the Socialists, and it shows that the right honorable member has not paid proper attention to the subject. Apparently he has been reading Lord Salisbury, from one of whose speeches I will quote a much stronger statement—one which honorable members might use in their propagandist work. Lord Salisbury said—

There is Socialist legislation, and that is the most popular, which is pure robbery. When you hear people say that all the instruments of production ought to be taken into the hands of the State you know that you are in the presence of mere brigands. They are simply proposing to steal that which does not belong to them. With them no kind of negotiation or terms is possible. They are the enemies of the human race. We must resist them with all the energy and organization in our power.

Later on in the same speech—I leave out a passage which has no relevancy to my present argument—he said—

There is a third proposal to which the term Socialism is freely applied, and that is where it is proposed to use the machinery of the State for the purpose of achieving objects in which the community generally is agreed. Now, in that Socialism in itself, I can see no harm whatever.

It is the kind of socialism there spoken of that we advocate; and that is the kind of socialism in which the leader of the Government has declared himself to be a believer. We claim that he occupies the same ground as we do, so far as those views are concerned. Although he calls himself an anti-Socialist, his own words show him to be a Socialist. The first passage which I have read from Lord Salisbury's remarks misrepresents the aims of Socialists. Nothing is proposed by them to which the term "robbery" could be rightly applied. What we really wish to do is to prevent robbery. But the term robbery, or exploitation, is not used in the ordinary sense; it does not refer to something illegal. In dealing with these questions it must be our endeavour to get behind mere legal ideas. If that was not done in connexion with all legislation, we should have no new laws. Our existence as a Parliament is an acknowledgment of the fact that existing conditions and existing laws require to be altered, and we are constantly amending old Acts. Therefore, the mere fact that something is legal does not justify it; it may at the same time be immoral and injurious. A law may suit the conditions of society at the time of its passing, but later on its enforcement may create great injustice. Moreover, our aims are impersonal. Altogether there has been a great misinterpretation of terminology. It is manifest that if all exchanges between man and man were on the lines of equivalent for equivalent, no one would become richer than another. It is only because men are able by means of the law to take advantage of their fellows, that they succeed in becoming richer. It is claimed, of course, that superior ability should obtain its reward, and no doubt superior ability is sometimes a natural gift. At present, however, the poor cannot give their children the opportunities which the rich are able to give them, because the struggle for existence is so keen that ambition can play no part in their lives. I wish now to give one or two illustrations of the kind of socialism which we consider practical, which is now in operation, and which we think can be extended; and I will afterwards show the justification for extending it. In the old country there is a vast amount of voluntary co-operation, and millions of pounds are invested in co-operative concerns. In some cases co-operative societies grow their own grain, carry it to their own ships, while their own people bake it. All concerned are shareholders, and the middleman has entirely disappeared. Such systems would prevent what we have recently read of in Victoria—the monopolization by middlemen, to the extent of thousands of pounds, of butter bonuses granted to assist the unfortunate farmers. In Kilmarnock, in Scotland, 86 per cent. of the community are shareholders in co-operative societies, while in several places in England, 60 per cent., and in many other places 10 per cent. of the people are shareholders in co-operative societies. This co-operation is voluntary, and has been organized, not by great statesmen, but by the despised trade unionists. It is doing away with middlemen as unnecessary. In seventeen of the towns and municipalities of the United Kingdom, the profits on electric lighting last year amounted to between £300,000 and £400,000, while five municipalities which manage their own tramway systems obtained profits amounting to £400,000. Glasgow, which was included in the five, obtained a profit of over £200,000. Those are instances of the success of municipal socialism. We do not propose that everything shall be done by the State. The term "State," when used by socialistic writers, is understood to mean the public, and the work I have spoken of has been done by the people for the people.

Mr. CAMERON.—The honorable member wishes to make co-operation compulsory, whereas in the cases to which he has referred the people acted voluntarily.

Mr. SPENCE.—We cannot pass laws, except with the consent of the people.

Mr. CAMERON.—That is, the majority of the people.

Mr. SPENCE.—All our laws are passed with the consent of the majority of the people. There is no question of the majority imposing upon the minority something to their detriment. In none of the cases to which I have referred has any desire been manifested to reverse what has been done.

Mr. CAMERON.—The enterprises mentioned were entered upon by the majority, whilst others stood out; whereas under legislation such as that favoured by the honorable member all the members of the community would be compelled to stand in.

Mr. SPENCE.—In the case of Glasgow there are really no opponents of the socialistic movement, so far as it has been followed by the municipal authorities.

Mr. FOWLER.—There may be a few malcontents.

Mr. SPENCE.—Perhaps so; but practically there is no opposition, and it cannot reasonably be said that coercion is being applied. We desire to educate the people to such a point that they will appreciate the benefits of voluntary action upon socialistic lines. Adam Smith said that it was impossible to legislate beyond the aggregate intelligence of the community. In other words, the community must agree to observe the law. Laws are made to compel small minorities to do that which the community voluntarily does. All laws are based upon the customs of the people, upon their voluntary observances. No laws can be enforced except by the voluntary obedience of the majority of the people. Of course, there will always be a few people who will not obey the law voluntarily, and they have to be compelled. Laws are required even in connexion with voluntary co-operative enterprises, for the registration of companies, for defining the duties of the directors, and for otherwise providing for the proper management of such concerns. We cannot do anything of a voluntary character except under the law which protects the individual. The State-owned tramways in Sydney notably illustrate the advantages to be derived from the application of the socialistic principle to that branch of enterprise. They provide facilities much superior to those afforded by the Melbourne tramways, and the fares charged are among the lowest in the world. Much the same could be said about the Glasgow tramways. In Glasgow public washhouses have been established to which housewives can repair and perform in an hour or two work which under ordinary conditions would occupy a whole day. I desire to bring under the notice of honorable members the extent to which the socialistic principle is applied in our midst. I am sorry that the honorable member for Wannon is not present, because I wish to direct attention to one or two cases in his electorate. In Hamilton, the largest town in the Western district of Victoria, sometimes called the Chicago of the West, gas is supplied by a private company at the rate of 13s. per 1,000 feet. At Port Fairy, a very much smaller town, the gas works are owned by the municipality, which supplies gas at the rate of 10s. per 1,000 feet.

Mr. KELLY.—Is Hamilton as well situated as Port Fairy so far as the coal supply is concerned?

Mr. SPENCE.—No; but Port Fairy is only a fishing village, and cannot be compared to Hamilton. At Port Fairy, the baths are owned by the municipal council, which provides hot sea-water baths for 6d., whereas the charge made at the privately-owned baths in Melbourne is 1s. 6d.

Mr. KELLY.—Does it pay the municipality to provide hot salt water baths for 6d.?

Mr. SPENCE.—Yes. The municipality cannot afford to run its institutions for nothing. Now, returning to Hamilton. Some years ago the cattle sale-yards were in the middle of the town, and were in a disgracefully insanitary condition. They were privately owned, and the two auctioneers who conducted most of the sales had to pay half their commission for the right to use the yards. Eventually the municipal authorities woke up and established yards outside the town, which are kept in splendid order, and are under the charge of an inspector. There are now eight salesmen in Hamilton, all of whom use the yards, and the revenue derived by the municipality ranges from £500 to £800 per annum. I have compiled from memory a list of the various operations which are performed amongst us upon a collective basis. I do not say that in all cases the State exercises control, but in every instance the collective system is in operation. In fact, most people would consider it very difficult to eliminate that element. In the first place, we run our Defence Forces upon the collective system. Our Police Force, the administration of justice, and the collection of debts are under State control. Then our Post and Telegraph services are conducted by the State. Not only are letters conveyed through the Post, but also parcels up to 11 lbs. in weight. Our mercantile firms send large parcels of goods into the country through the Postal Department, and the tendency is to extend rather than do away with this system. Our railways and tramways are also run by the State. We control the currency system, and, to a certain extent—although it may not be generally known—we undertake banking business. We regulate weights and measures, and we construct roads. All these things are undertaken either by the municipalities or by the State. Similarly, certain municipal bodies are responsible for the lighting of towns. The State also conducts a scheme of life assurance and controls our educational system. I ask honorable members if they are prepared to revert to the system of "private enterprise" in the education of our children? Do we not realize that it is absolutely necessary to see that they do not grow up in ignorance? My own idea is that we ought to expend more money in perfecting our educational system, I would further point out that the State undertakes vaccination, and has established a system of pensions in connexion with the retirement of our Judges. It conducts museums, libraries, and art galleries, and we encourage art by purchasing pictures collectively. We provide pilots for the safety of our shipping, and the harbors, wharfs, jetties, and, indeed, some steam-tugs, are State-owned. As a matter of fact, we undertake advertising collectively. We provide parks and gardens for the public benefit, and hotels are conducted very successfully by the State. Indeed, the idea is gaining ground that it would be a good thing if the people owned all the hotels.

Mr. McLEAN.—Does the honorable member know where the honorable member for Melbourne Ports can get a cheap hotel?

Mr. SPENCE.—I believe that the honorable member for Melbourne Ports would vote for any proposal in favour of the State owning all our hotels. I know that he believes in local option, and we should have full option then because the State would entirely control the liquor trade. Further, we construct railways and build bridges. We carry out irrigation works, manufacture rolling-stock for our railways, and perform foundry work of all kinds. In the same way the State undertakes surveying, issues weather reports, and collects statistics. It owns public batteries and factories. In New South Wales the Government have established clothing and boot factories. The State has founded observatories, and already owns some of the ferries. It cares for the sick, the aged, and insane, and for children of tender years. Some honorable member has characterized the proposal of a German Socialist that the State should take charge of children as a "mad" one.

Mr. WILSON.—He proposes to take them away from parental control.

Mr. SPENCE.—Honorable members opposite have a wonderful genius for imagining that other people are utterly devoid of sense. I wish them to recognise that they themselves are Socialists, and I desire to know whether or not they are prepared to draw the line of demarcation at what has already been accomplished?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The Minister of Trade and Customs preserves a sphinx-like silence.

Mr. SPENCE.—The Minister will have an opportunity to speak next week. I am speaking nearly all this week. The result of the experiment of the State of South Australia taking care of children has proved a great success. They are so well looked after by the lady inspectors that the mortality rate amongst them is very much lower than that it is where they are under the control of parents. In many cases the State, by force of law, has taken children from their parents and cared for them.

Mr. CAMERON.—Is it true that three men listened to the honorable member for two days, and at the end of that period went home and died?

Mr. SPENCE.—I hope that some of my honorable friends opposite will die politically, after the division on the motion has taken place. I know that no members of my party will leave the House as the result of it.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member appears to have frightened a good many of them out of the Chamber.

Mr. SPENCE.—We do not expect a large attendance of honorable members on Fridays. I recognise that my remarks have been somewhat drawn out, but I shall not trespass much further on the time of the House. I repeat that the care of children by the State has proved an excellent system. Then, again, I would point out, in support of my contention that we are a largely socialistic community, that the State carries on printing, lithography, photography, all branches of book-binding and engraving, ship-building, and even dairying and poultry-farming.

Mr. WILSON.—Is the honorable member referring to Mr. Tom Mann's projected poultry-farm?

Mr. SPENCE.—I am speaking of what the people of the States are doing collectively. I have mentioned only a few instances of State Socialism. Among other things, the State also deals with sanitation and other matters relating to health. Municipalities are required to attend to local sanitary arrangements; and when they neglect to do so they are brought to their bearings by a Central Board of Health. In this way the people are coerced by the State to do anything that is necessary in the interests of public health. In Sydney, the city of the beautiful harbor, the State Government found it necessary to step in and appoint men to clean up the back yards of persons who would not do this work for themselves. That step was rendered necessary owing to the outbreak of the plague. Aldermen of the city, most of whom were property-owners, had appointed an inspector, who carefully shut his eyes when he visited premises owned by them. One lane which had been passed as clean was subsequently inspected by State officials, and 70 tons of filth were removed from it. The fact is that we cannot do without coercion. It is necessary for the State, in the interests of the community, to interfere from time to time with private enterprise. In spite of the adverse conditions surrounding almost the whole of our industrial system, the average length of life of persons engaged in industries has been increased by about two years since the State insisted upon the observance of sanitary laws.

Mr. FISHER.—It has been increased by more than two years.

Mr. SPENCE.—Perhaps I have underestimated the average, but I would rather understate it than overstate it. I like to be moderate.

Mr. MCCAY.—The honorable member is a moderate Socialist.

Mr. SPENCE.—No; I am a practical Socialist. We exercise control over fisheries; our municipal councils control public baths; and the State also controls banking, and lends money. The Minister of Trade and Customs, who is half a Prime Minister, is one of the strongest advocates of State money lending. He would build houses for all our industrious farmers.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He is an old Socialist.

Mr. SPENCE.—An extreme Socialist. The Government of New Zealand own coal mines, and in Australia the State carries on assaying and prospecting. The Postmaster-General is a strong Socialist, in the sense that he would give every possible assistance to those engaged in the mining industry. As a member of the State Parliament, he showed that he favoured Socialism, by supporting the erection of public batteries for the use of miners. A considerable sum of money has been spent by the States Governments of New South Wales and Victoria in prospecting, so that it may well be said that we, as a community, engage in mining. We interfere with private enterprise to such an extent that there is scarcely any branch of industrial life in which the State does not take a part. We also engage in the export trade, and the New South Wales Government has established a fund for the relief of those injured while following mining pursuits. That fund is maintained by contributions from the State, the mine-owners, and the workers, and the arrangement works admirably. I have given only a short list of those industries in which the States take a part. I have a list of about seventy-four of these industries.

Mr. REID.—The honorable member, judging by his notes, is not yet half-way through his speech. Is he not getting tired?

Mr. SPENCE.—I shall not inflict upon the House the whole of the subject-matter dealt with in my notes. I always leave a few remarks unsaid.

Mr. WILKS.—After that, I think that the honorable member is an Irish Socialist.

Mr. SPENCE.—I shall have to ask Hansard to put at the foot of my address the words, "To be continued in our next." The difficulty is that when I rise to speak on such a broad and general question as that now before us, so many subjects occur to my mind which I have not dealt with in my notes, that my address is generally much longer than I intended at the outset it should be.

Mr. WILKS.—Is the honorable member preparing a political romance.

Mr. SPENCE.—I am giving the House not a romance, but some of the hard facts of life. I wish to make a short quotation, which indicates the spirit in which we view the question of the classes, from a speech delivered by a Socialist member of the French Chamber of Deputies, M. Guesde. In answer to an interjection, "What is Socialism?" he made an impromptu statement with which I am sure we must all agree. I have frequently given expression to similar views. He said—

Once more I bid you observe that I accuse no man. I arraign only institutions, not individuals. What distinguishes us Socialists whom you charge with incitements to class hatreds, is the knowledge and affirmation of the utter irresponsibility of men set against each other by interests which dominate and determine all their acts. As they stand, the capitalist is no more responsible for living on the backs of the proletariat than are these for being daily, hourly exploited. The situation is an economic historical fatality. Humanity only progresses, and only has progressed, in the midst of pains, and through blood and ruins. It has always been compelled to climb its Calvary to the summit, and to pass by the agony of the cross to reach its redemption by science.

The proposals of the Labour Party—of the Socialistic Party—are on those lines. When we speak of exploitation and robbery we do not blame individuals, but we blame the system; we do not attack capitalists as men, but attack the system which produces capitalists and poverty. Indeed, many capitalists are themselves Socialists, and we do not blame them for taking advantage of the present system in the struggle for life; we can quite see that they are forced to do so. When a man who has been taught a profession or has learned a business in a mercantile house or workshop commences for himself, as he is justified in doing, he does not consider his competitors. He goes into a town and endeavours by energy and advertising to draw custom, and thus secure a living and a competency, though he may be the means of driving others into insolvency. As I said before, under the present system men are compelled to go into occupations and do work which is repugnant to them—in some cases to be unjust to and sweat their fellows. That is the kind of thing we say that only Socialism can alter—

Mr. KELLY.—In the socialistic State will all people be able to choose their own avocations?

Mr. SPENCE.—I shall answer the honorable member by citing the case of a friend of mine—a working man and a labour agitator. This man was a contractor under the Shire Council of Penshurst, on the borders of the Wannon constituency. He was an excellent worker and manager of men, and in one year he cleared £400. When the time came for tendering again, he called together the men who had worked for him, and said, "I made £400 last year, but it was by your work, and not all by my own energy." This man is most powerfully built, and, in a general way, might be said to be equal to two men. He continued, "It is not my money; I consider I have taken advantage of you, and I now propose that we should work co-operatively."

Mr. CAMERON.—What would have happened if he had made a loss?

Mr. SPENCE.—Wait a moment. I am about to relate a fact that will answer the honorable member. This man, who is now a selector in New South Wales, went on to say to his men that it was not he who had earned the money, and that he proposed in future they should work in co-operation. He said that he would tender for the work, and take care that the price was high enough to make it pay. Thereupon, one of his men, who was powerfully built, pointed out that another of the workmen was not so big as himself, and asked why he should be called upon to share alike with him. That is exactly the position. The answer that my friend, Jack Reid, made—

Mr. REID.—Reid!

Mr. SPENCE.—A very good name. The present Socialistic Government—this butt-gang Government, equal in all things—is following the same principle. The only difference is that the Government are not equal in talking, seeing that we cannot get any Minister except the Prime Minister, to speak. The answer that my friend made to the man was, "That smaller man can drive the dray just as well as you can, though he may not be as good as you in your special work as a quarryman; his special line is driving a dray, and he is just as necessary to the work as yourself."

Mr. REID.—Sheer despotism! To put one man in the quarry and the other in the dray!

Mr. SPENCE.—At any rate, an arrangement was made which was satisfactorily carried out. Lest honorable members may draw a wrong inference from the case I have cited, which is a case of simple co-operation, I ought to say that Socialists do not advocate equality of pay.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Some schools of Socialists do.

Mr. SPENCE.—I have already said that there are different schools of Socialism; but I am talking of the school to which we belong—the Australian school, if honorable members like. We do not propose an impracticable socialism which would do away with wages. In the voluntary co-operative system in England trades union wages are paid, and the profits are divided; and it is not fair to say that we advocate simple communism. A great deal of what has been said outside against Socialism applies to communism, and it only shows that those who use the words have no knowledge of the subject. I am not saying that communism may not once more prevail. The early Christians were communists.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Is it not a fact that some of the best Socialist philosophers say that communism is the only method?

Mr. SPENCE.—I am not saying that it is not so. What I am dealing with now is the living present, and I am justifying certain changes which are advocated. I do not propose to speculate as to the future—as to the possibility of communism. One of the most disgraceful facts in our present civilization, with our degree of widespread education, is that nearly all our worries and our work concern the buying and selling of food and clothing, of which nature supplies such an unlimited quantity that every living soul could, under another system, have all he could possibly consume. It is because of that fact that Socialism is advocated. I should like to quote from Mr. Sidney Webb, as showing the school of Socialism in which we believe. He said—

Advocates of social reconstruction have learnt the lesson of democracy, and know that it is through the slow and gradual turning of the popular mind to new principles that social re-organization bit by bit comes.

That is the position we take up.

Mr. WILSON.—Where do honorable members propose to draw the line?

Mr. SPENCE.—We do not draw the line; it is the people who draw the line, according to their judgment of existing conditions. That statement by Mr. Sidney Webb marks the guiding line of our movement. I have mentioned that a certain school of Socialism—the Australian Socialistic League—want to accomplish a change by revolution—constitutional revolution, by Act of Parliament. We do not belong to this school, the members of which denounce us as anti-Socialists. We say that they are impractical, and that we must have the consent of the people for every step we take. The people have already done much, and will do still more in the direction of Socialism, and the movement is certain to advance. The condition of affairs which may be eventually developed, may be considered communism, when, owing to the advance of science, it may be but mere exercise to supply the wants of all the people. It is estimated, even now, that if everybody did his share of work, the labour of all for two hours a day would produce all that could possibly be utilized. This may be considered only an estimate and calculation by mathematicians, but it shows that we have already reached a time when by the exercise of our powers we could remedy many of our difficulties and miseries. Sidney Webb further says there should be a—close examination of materials composing the structure of society, their relations to each other, and their ideas regarding the moral rights of each and also—

Change comes by the will of the people, democratic, and slow enough to avoid bad effects morally.

We can only succeed by a proper recognition of these principles. This is an important phase of the matter with which I desire to deal, and I connect it with the references I have already made to the changes which have taken place in the minds of a great many on the subject of land ownership. In this connexion I last night purposely quoted some figures with respect to the Western District of Victoria. It is recognised and admitted that it is against the interests of the people as a whole that the land in that district, to which I referred, should not be put to its proper use. The equal ownership of land as the source of all wealth is now very generally recognised as desirable. But Socialists recognise—and the opposition to the idea is now one of the biggest difficulties which they have to surmount—that machinery is in the same position, and its control must be taken in hand by the community. Machinery is being introduced very rapidly, and it is displacing men. When land was occupied only by sheep the door was closed on the natural opportunity, which all should have, of access to the source of all wealth. That is generally recognised and admitted, and we claim that the position is exactly the same with respect to machinery. When there is placed in the hands of an individual or group of individuals the control of machinery which displaces labour, where is labour to go? If all production is to be performed by machinery, what is to become of the labourer?

Mr. KELLY.—Would the honorable member abolish all machinery?

Mr. SPENCE.—I am not quite a fool. I do not object to reasonable interjections, but I am now dealing with a very important question, which I hope the honorable member for Wentworth will study, because I am unwilling to give up hope that the honorable member may some day become a democrat. It is only because honorable members have not studied the matter that they fail to recognise that the position with respect to land and machinery is the same. After all, what is machinery? We have taken many of the latent forces of nature from the land, which is the storehouse of nature. We have exploited nature to some extent, and have availed ourselves of some of its forces. We have made use of substances found in nature. Iron and steel have been placed in certain relations to each other, and, utilizing certain forces of nature, we have taken control of them. The principle is exactly the same as that involved in men taking control of land, and shutting other men off that land. The man taking control of machinery which displaces labour, shuts that labour out from benefiting by the introduction of that machinery. So that, unless we have machinery under the control of the community, and unless production becomes production for use of the community, rather than for profit of the individual, we can have no hope that we shall be able to do away with the social evils and misery which now exist. I think honorable members must see that. They are aware of the alarm which was created by the proposal to nationalize land; but that that is a wise proposal is now recognised, and admitted even by the Premier of Victoria. That honorable gentleman has undertaken to give effect to the principle, and no one is likely to charge him with being a Socialist, or, at all events, a conscious Socialist. The other half of the Prime Minister has advocated the same principle, and I wish honorable members opposite to see that it is inconsistent on their part to abuse the nationalization of other things when, to a limited extent at all events, they agree to the nationalization of land. It need hardly be asserted that no one proposes that we should take anything from anybody. We propose to take land, but we do not propose to do so without compensating the owner of that land. As a matter of fact, we compensate him handsomely. We pay him for something he never produced at all. We pay him for more than his improvements, because he very often takes the unearned increment to which he is on no moral ground entitled. In connexion with the nationalization of machinery, we see no reason why it may not be gradually effected, by following on the lines which I have already indicated. We may gradually extend the number of factories managed and controlled by the State, or it may be that when the ownership of machinery develops into a monopoly we may see fit to take over that monopoly. This is the present policy, in a practical way, of the Labour Party. The trend of the present industrial system is distinctly in the direction of trusts and monopolies. In America the whole telegraphic system of the country is in the hands of two companies, bossed by a single syndicate. There is there also what is known as the "Triple Alliance," in the shape of the oil, sugar, and whisky trusts. We say that here we have already reached a condition of monopoly in one industry, the tobacco industry, and that other monopolies are coming. When industries have reached that stage we say that the community should take them over. We do not say that they should all be taken over now. We are quite willing that the evolution should go on, and should in fact be conducted by the anti-Socialists, if honorable members please, who are at present working as hard as they can for Socialism. Those of us who have studied these questions know that we are proceeding in the right way, and we desire that others shall come to believe that it is the right thing that monopolies should be taken over by the State. All monopolies enormously cheapen the cost of production, and we shall be able to do away with a vast number of unnecessary middlemen who are now engaged in the general struggle for existence, and at the same time serve to increase the cost of the article to the consumer. We desire that all that should be wiped out altogether, and it is only by the adoption of Socialism that that can be done. I defy any man who gives any study to this question to propose any other means that is not a revolution. We cannot change men suddenly by Act of Parliament; the alteration can be effected only by a gradual change in the ideas by which they are governed. Unfortunately many persons go around with their mental eyes shut, and they fail to recognise these things. They are like a man in a dream, or like an individual known to myself, who is so absent-minded and absorbed in the solution of problems that he has often passed his own wife on the footpath, and she has had to bump him with an umbrella before he has recognised her. We desire that the minds of men shall be concentrated honestly on this subject, not for any party reasons at all, but because we believe that when they think the matter out fully they will realize that the Labour Party, whose members have studied these questions, are not proposing drastic and extreme measures. We do not propose to put society on a right footing by means of Acts of Parliament. We do not propose to take anything from anybody, but we do propose to allow to the poor and down-trodden some chance of a reasonable living. What has been our work, so far, but to attempt to secure by means of trades unions proper conditions, and something like a living wage for working men, and by our factory laws to secure for them reasonable hours of labour? These measures are all palliatives of existing industrial conditions. The real and final solution of the question must come from every one having an equal opportunity to earn his living, and from having that opportunity assured to him. What impulse is there for a man to do his best when he knows that the harder he works the more the price of his labour will be cut down? What nonsense it is to talk of individuality being developed under such conditions! We see now a fierce struggle for existence in which the workers are driven to work by the lash and by the fear of starvation staring them in the face; and, to make matters worse, their employers sneer at them. I know that the honorable member for Parramatta is an intelligent man and a student. He has worked amongst the coal-miners himself, and he knows that there are men in this country engaged in manual labour who are equal in ability to honorable members in this House. We who have worked amongst them, and know them as mates, are aware that the intelligence, and the brain power of this country is not concentrated in its Parliaments, and certainly not in the Commonwealth Parliament. These intelligent men have less class-feeling than some honorable members would think. They have no hatred against the employing class. They are aware that it is the system that is at fault, not the individuals who benefit from the system. Personally, I am an admirer of the tyrant, wherever he may be found. He has his value. I have often said, and I say again, that if I had a hand in the erection of monuments to eminent people I would erect them to the tyrants of the world. I have no feeling of hatred towards the most avaricious capitalist or sweater. He makes men realize that there are faults in the social system under which they live. He awakens them from apathy, and causes them to realize the necessity for bringing about a more healthy condition of affairs. Many of those who condemn the Socialist programme clearly show that they have no knowledge of the subject. They merely appeal to the prejudice and the class-feeling of people. The preaching of reactionary doctrines never had any other effect than to lead the masses in the direction of democracy. I had a number of other points to make, but I will not deal with them to-day. I should require a couple of hours more to complete my points, but I will leave them for another opportunity. I have made a remark about the constitutional position. I wish to repeat it. It is a fact which honorable members opposite must realize—that the people of Australia elect their Parliament on the broadest franchise, and that nothing in the way of legislation can be done except with their approval. We must demand that every candidate who submits himself to the people shall state definitely what he proposes to do. The people should set their faces against the independent—the man who hides what he intends to do when he gets into Parliament, and who takes upon himself the privilege of declaring that he is to be the best judge of his actions as a representative. That is not how representative institutions should be conducted. It is not in accordance with the true principles of democratic government. I again ask this Government what they propose to do? They seem to have no policy except to appeal to class prejudices. The Government declare themselves to be anti-Socialists; but I hope the people will realize that it is not safe, especially at the present juncture, to intrust the administration of affairs to men who have no definite programme. There is safety only in intrusting the government to men who know what they want to do; because when a man has studied a subject, and knows what he wishes to achieve, he is less likely to fall into errors than are those who are driven along blindly. The Government having no policy in a concrete form, simply live on the vague misunderstanding of a word. They are supported in the country by the ideas of men like Mr. Walpole, who has argued that marriage is a luxury, and who would deny to a working man the chance of going to a theatre or having a drink of beer perhaps to make him forget his miseries. Do the Government intend to appeal to the country on the policy that marriage is to be declared a luxury? They should declare what they mean, or it must be dragged out of them. I am sure that the honorable member for Wilmot, before he will consent to vote with the Government, will want to know what he is committing himself to. I do not think that he would be opposed to anything that could be shown to be for the general good. That is all that the party to which I belong is seeking. We have a right to be judged by our platform, and not by any prejudice created over the mere misunderstanding of a word. We have adopted the title of the Labour Party, not because it is a nice sounding term, but because it describes our aims. The very adoption of the word labour is a proof that we intend to use our powers in the interests of mankind—for the development of all that will promote the happiness of manhood and womanhood. That is the great aim which we have before us. We desire to so change the conditions under which society is governed, that men and women shall possess equally a good environment, to the end that we may be able to produce a race of whose qualities, physical and mental, we shall have just cause to be proud.

Mr. LEE (Cowper).—I do not suppose that a motion of no-confidence in the Government can be discussed without the introduction of personalities. The honorable member for Darling lifted this debate from the region of personalities, and carried us into the clouds, and it is now time for us to descend to earth. There were one or two matters on which he touched in the same manner as he did in his electioneering campaign. He tried to make his constituents believe that if the free-traders had their way they would impose a duty on seven or eight hundred articles, which are now free. But he forgot to tell them that the Tariff, as introduced by the right honorable member for Adelaide, was considerably modified by the free-traders.

Mr. TUDOR.—That is pretty rough on the protectionist half of the Ministry.

Mr. LEE.—The honorable member for Darling has a perfect right to give free-traders credit for what they do. We are quite prepared to stand our ground. We have been able to defend our position. New South Wales has been dragged into this discussion a good deal, and very unnecessarily, I think. But she is quite able to look after her own finances. At the last general election, she showed the Labour Party that she intends to do without their aid, for she returned to power a party which is not at their domination. The Labour Party now comprise only a little over one-fourth of the Legislative Assembly, and therefore occupy a very different position from that which they used to hold. Their number has been increased at the expense of the then Ministerialists. The Opposition party at the time came back from the polls more powerful than ever, although they had lost several seats as the result of the splitting of votes.

Mr. PAGE.—Do not let it happen again.

Mr. WILKS.—Let us have a second ballot so that the majority may rule.

Mr. LEE.—It would be a very good thing if our Electoral Act provided for the holding of a second ballot. In this session very little legislation has been passed. We have had a debate on the Address-in-Reply and on two Ministerial statements, and now a vote of censure upon the Ministry is being discussed. The debate on the last Ministerial statement fizzled out because it awakened very little interest. The present debate is dragging itself wearily along. Personal explanations constitute its principal feature. Nearly every day an honorable member has to rise and make a personal explanation. That is a very peculiar way of carrying on a debate on a no-confidence motion. The chief charge against the Ministry is that they are a coalition. For the first time the free-traders and protectionists have sunk their fiscal differences for the purpose of carrying on the Government in a constitutional manner. It was certainly a great concession for the free-traders, as well as the protectionists, to agree to sink the fiscal issue.

Mr. BAMFORD.—When knocked out.

Mr. LEE.—There has been no sacrifice of principle on the part of the free-traders. We have, however, decided to sink our fiscal differences, and carry on the Government of the Commonwealth, as far as possible, in a constitutional manner.

Mr. PAGE.—The free-traders in the Labour Party are all right.

Mr. LEE.—I believe they are. When this session was opened, the House was divided as nearly as possible into three equal parties.

The then Prime Minister decided that such a state of things could not be allowed to continue; that he would not hold power at the bidding of any party which was not loyal.

Mr. TUDOR.—Why did not the honorable member support him and keep him in office?

Mr. LEE.—Why did not the Labour Party keep the honorable and learned member for Ballarat in office? At the earliest opportunity, the honorable and learned member made up his mind to test the feeling of the House, so that the Government of the Commonwealth could be carried on in a proper and constitutional manner. There is no act which reflects greater credit on that honorable and learned member than his decision not to hold office at the bidding of a party which was not loyal to him, and sitting behind him. The same position is taken up by the present Ministry, who do not wish to hold office without a majority at their back.

OPPOSITION MEMBERS.—Hear, hear!

Mr. LEE.—My honorable friends on the other side will see when the time comes that the Government have a majority behind them.

Mr. STORRER.—The honorable and learned member for Ballarat would not take office in the coalition Government.

Mr. LEE.—The honorable and learned member for Ballarat is the head of the Protectionist movement in Victoria. He considered that now that a truce had been declared, and a coalition formed, his duty was still to be ready to lead his forces if any great protectionist issue were raised.

Mr. WILKS.—He is the watchdog of the protectionists.

Mr. PAGE.—He is the watchdog of the Reid Ministry.

Mr. LEE.—The honorable and learned member for Ballarat is still leader of the Protectionist Party, and although a fiscal truce has been declared, there has not been one jot or tittle of principle given away by either party on this side.

Mr. PAGE.—They had nothing to give away.

Mr. LEE.—Nothing to give away! Why we have taken a leaf out of the book of the Labour Party. How have they been able to advance so much? Because the free-traders and the protectionists were continually fighting one another over the fiscal question. The Labour Party decided to sink the fiscal issue, and persuaded free-traders and protectionists to waive their fiscal differences and fight under the banner of labour. And now, because we have sunk the fiscal question—

Mr. PAGE.—What an admission to make! The honorable member is the only man who has admitted that he has sunk the fiscal question.

Mr. LEE.—We have entered into a truce and the question of the Tariff is not to be raised during this Parliament. We have decided that, for the life of this Parliament, there shall be a coalition for the purpose of carrying on the Government in a constitutional manner. There were some honorable members who were not in favour of that proposal. The protectionist wing thought, after looking all round, that the wisest thing they could do would be to fall in with the Labour Party and form an alliance.

Mr. WILKS.—It is a "fall in" all right.

Mr. LEE.—It is a "fall in."

Mr. WILKS.—Mr. Anstey says it is a "fall in."

Mr. PAGE.—Who is he?

Mr. WILKS.—The honorable member's "boss" leader in Victoria.

Mr. LEE.—The protectionist wing considered that their wisest plan was not to invite the opposition of the Labour Party at the next general election, and therefore they decided to fall in with them as far as possible. I remember an alliance in New South Wales between the right honorable member for East Sydney and the Labour Party, who had been supporting his Government. At the general election he advised his free-trade supporters not to oppose labour candidates; in fact, he went so far as to ask me to go and support a labour candidate, which I did. But the very men whom he supported then, whose return he helped to secure, afterwards put him out of power. Those honorable members who think that they will escape opposition from the Labour Party are very much mistaken. I am sure that they will not lower their flag to save any man. They believe in their principles, and they have a right to insist that every man who receives their support shall sign their pledge. They have put their platform before the world, and every man who allies himself with the party should be ready to subscribe to their tenets. After the honorable and learned member for Ballarat retired from office the Labour Party took up the reins of Government, but existed as a Ministry on sufferance only.

Mr. PAGE.—The present Government are in exactly the same position.

Mr. LEE.—We shall soon find out whether or not that is so.

Mr. TUDOR.—The Prime Minister has stated that the Government can do no business unless the Opposition give him their assistance.

Mr. LEE.—The honorable and learned member for Ballarat said that he was prepared to give the late Government fair play, and he kept his promise. No vote of censure was moved during the whole of the time they were in office.

Mr. TUDOR.—They were stabbed in the back.

Mr. LEE.—We amended the Arbitration Bill, and improved it in every possible way, but the Labour Party were not content. They wished to have clause 48 recommitted, so that the amendment restricting the power of the Court to grant preference to unionists might be modified. They told honorable members that, unless the previous vote was reversed, they would resign office; but, with one or two exceptions, those honorable members who had voted in favour of the amendment remained true to their principles. The late Government chose their own battle-ground, and suffered a well-merited defeat. The Arbitration Bill, which was brought prominently before the electors at the last general election, has involved the fate of two Ministries, and we have yet to see how the present Government will fare. The measure has been greatly improved by the modification of the provisions with regard to the common rule, by the restrictions placed upon the power of the Court to grant preference to unionists, and by the removal of the agricultural industry beyond the scope of the measure. The best interests of the community would have been menaced if the agricultural industry had been brought under the operation of the Bill. I do not see how the Labour Party can reasonably object to the coalition formed by members on this side of the House, who have, in accordance with the understanding arrived at at the last election, sunk the fiscal issue.

Mr. WATKINS.—How did the honorable member secure his election?

Mr. LEE.—I stood as a straight-out free-trader.

Mr. WATKINS.—Then the honorable member did not sink the fiscal issue.

Mr. LEE.—I have agreed to sink the fiscal issue for the present, because I realize that it is of no use to run one's head against a wall. The Labour Party have sunk the fiscal issue.

Mr. PAGE.—Never.

Mr. LEE.—We have been told that it is intended to again raise that issue; but I do not believe that the Labour Party will fight under the protectionist banner.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable member has sunk his electorate.

Mr. LEE.—I am not afraid to face the consequences of what I have done.

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable member for Gwydir will not have only Colonel Onslow to oppose him at the next election.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Perhaps the honorable and learned member will come up and fight me.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am very sorry to again have to call attention to the remarks passing between honorable members across the Chamber. Such conversations are entirely out of order, and I shall have to mention the name of the next honorable member who offends. I should be extremely reluctant to take such an extreme course, and I hope that I shall not have occasion to do so.

Mr. LEE.—It has been stated during this debate that the free-traders have swallowed the protectionists, but I would point out that the Minister who holds the purse-strings is a protectionist, and that the Minister of Trade and Customs, and also the Minister who stands behind the guns, are of the same political faith. Therefore, I do not think that there is much swallowing in the case.

Mr. PAGE.—Where do the free-traders come in?

Mr. LEE.—One stands at the top of the tree. I do not think there is any danger of the protectionist members of the Ministry being called upon to act contrary to their principles, or of their suffering from their association with the free-traders any more than the members of the Labour Party will suffer owing to their connexion with the protectionists. In the eyes of the Labour Party it is apparently almost a crime for free-traders and protectionists to form a coalition. We have, however, joined forces in the interests of constitutional government, and we intend to do our best to defeat the efforts of the Labour Party to force their socialistic ideas upon the community. I am very much surprised that the Labour Party have entered into an alliance with the Protectionist Party. That alliance has been brought about by the parliamentary representatives who belong to the party, but I do not think that it will be approved of by the labour organizations outside Parliament. If it is, we shall have a new set of conditions, and I think that the Labour Party will be those who will suffer most by the change. So long as the party remains distinct from the other parties in its aims and methods, it will be a power in the land; but if it allies itself with other parties, it will lose influence. The alliance which has been made is to last for this and the next Parliament; but honorable members have no right to make promises which will bind the members of next Parliament, because they do not know that they will be here then. Half of those who joined the alliance may not be returned. I do not pretend to be a prophet, but my words may nevertheless be true. We may have to go to the country very shortly.

Mr. WATKINS.—The honorable member will then have to consider his own chances of re-election.

Mr. LEE.—I consider them very seriously. We have to look at all these matters straight in the face. The motion for the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the operation of the Commonwealth Tariff, of which the honorable and learned member for Indi gave notice just prior to the moving of this motion of censure, was merely an electioneering move. Almost all the talk about the necessity for revising the Tariff has come from two or three of the protectionist representatives of Victoria. We do not hear anything about it from the protectionists of the other States. The terms of the honorable and learned member's motion, however, are so indefinite, that it might equally well have been brought forward by a free-trader. The free-traders are just as anxious as are the protectionists for a satisfactory Tariff.

Mr. STORRER.—Then why does the honorable member say that the giving of notice of the motion was a political move?

Mr. LEE.—Because it was done immediately before the moving of this motion of want of confidence. Although the honorable and learned member for Indi could have given notice of his motion months ago, he deferred doing so until the present time, so that if there happens to be an election he will be able to tell the electors that he was ready to do something for them. In my opinion, there should be no alteration of the Tariff until the constituencies have spoken in regard to the matter. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat, who was at the time Prime Minister, let it be distinctly understood in Victoria prior to the late general elections that he declared for fiscal peace, and that position was afterwards accepted by the right honorable member for East Sydney and the honorable member for Bland. When the new House met, the three parties had agreed that in the interests of legislation the fiscal issue should be put on one side for a time. Now that there are only two parties in the House, the question is being brought forward again, so that if there is an appeal to the country, those who have given notices of motion may be able to profit by their action. The Prime Minister has been twitted for refraining from referring to the old-age pensions question when making his policy speech; but we must accept his statement that he did so through an oversight, and we know that the policy of the Government in regard to the matter was declared by the Attorney-General in another place, and subsequently by another Minister. The leader of the Opposition has stated that it was the intention of his party to provide for a Commonwealth old-age pensions scheme during the present Parliament, whether the States were satisfied or not, to use his own words. The Government, however, propose first to consult the States in the matter, which is the more reasonable course to take. At the present time New South Wales and Victoria, which contain two-thirds of the population of the Commonwealth, have old-age pensions systems in force, and if there is anything in the boast of the Labour Party that Queensland and Western Australia are under Labour control, I ask why do they not bring old-age pensions laws into force in those States? The old-age pensions system is a very difficult one for the Commonwealth to provide for, because, in order to obtain through the Customs House the £1,500,000 which would be necessary to establish it, £6,000,000 would have to be raised, in order to comply with the provision of the Constitution which requires that three-fourths of the Customs revenue raised by the Commonwealth shall be returned to the States. It would be preposterous to propose the levying of so much additional taxation, and the fact shows that the Labour Party are not in earnest when they speak about providing for Commonwealth old-age pensions without making preliminary arrangements with the States.

The honorable member for Barrier interjected, when the subject was discussed before, "Cannot we raise a land tax?" but I do not think that the Labour Party are prepared to go to the country in advocacy of the imposition of a land tax for the purpose of providing old-age pensions.

Mr. TUDOR.—I am.

Mr. LEE.—I think that the honorable member is the only one who would do so. It would be wrong to deprive the States of a means of revenue upon which they now so largely depend. The Commonwealth would have no right to step in and take from the States the right to impose taxation upon land. We hear a good deal about interference with States rights. If some persons had their way, there would be no States rights at all. The proposal of the Prime Minister to enter into an arrangement with the Treasurers of the States before providing for any Commonwealth old-age pensions system is the right one, and I am sure will be carried into effect if the States are agreeable to the establishment of a Commonwealth old-age pensions system. The Ministry are certainly doing right in refusing to impose direct taxation to provide for a Commonwealth old-age pensions system, and it would be unfair to increase the heavy Customs burdens which the people bear. Then, the leader of the Opposition considers that the Commonwealth should at once appoint a High Commissioner to represent it in London, without first conferring with the States. It must be remembered, however, that each of the States now maintains an Agent-General, and it is necessary to confer with them, before appointing a High Commissioner, to see whether it is not possible to get him to discharge the duties now performed by these Agents-General, and thus save expense. I believe that the establishment of the proposed Department of Agriculture would prove very beneficial to the Commonwealth. Such a Department would be able to impart useful knowledge to those engaged upon the soil.

Mr. WATKINS.—Would not that be Socialism?

Mr. LEE.—I do not think so. It would not take anything from the people, neither would it interfere with individual liberty. Instead of each State having a Department of Agriculture, and commercial agencies, I am of opinion that the Commonwealth should establish a central office, and control the whole business. The programme of the Government is a good one, and I believe that they are able to give effect to it. They have a perfect right to the support of honorable members, and I am satisfied that when they are called upon to face the country, they will be returned by a very large majority. When the present Parliament opened, there were three parties in this House. Now there are only two parties, though they are of very nearly equal strength. In that respect, I believe that an improvement has been effected. I repeat that when the electors are called upon to express their opinions through the ballot-box, they will clearly demonstrate that the Ministry possesses the confidence of the country by adding to the strength of their supporters.

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra).—I had no idea that the attack upon the Government would fall so flat at this early stage of the debate. If that attack is to terminate with what has been said by members of the Opposition who have already addressed the House, it is one of the lamest that has ever been levelled against any Administration. Even the supporters of the honorable member for Bland have acknowledged that his speech was absolutely without vim and force. It has been urged that inasmuch as the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, and the honorable and learned member for West Sydney—two ex-Ministers—had spoken, Ministers should have replied. But I would point out that there was nothing in their indictment for Ministers to reply to.

Mr. WATKINS.—Or defend?

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable member for Newcastle will have an opportunity of stating his own views presently. When the Prime Minister replied to the attack of the leader of the Opposition, there was nothing to be added by Ministerial supporters. Nothing that was said by the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne and the honorable and learned member for West Sydney calls for any comment, if I except one of the most scurrilous and disgraceful attacks on the part of the latter that is to be found in parliamentary history. The honorable and learned member has made his explanation, and that explanation has gone forth to the whole of Australia. Personally, I feel satisfied that when the time comes, the wharf labourers of West Sydney, who have a scrupulous regard for honesty, and do not believe in trickery, will deal with the honorable and learned member who resorted to such disgraceful tactics in the manner that he deserves. The honorable and learned member for Corio also made a bitter personal attack upon the Prime Minister. Time after time during the course of his speech, I called upon him to produce the letter from Mr. T. A. Dibbs, the manager of the Commercial Bank, Sydney—one of the foremost financial institutions in New South Wales—in which the honorable and learned member declared it was stated that Mr. Reid had “cooked” the public accounts of that State. It is true that he did produce a letter from Mr. Dibbs, but it contained no such statement as had been attributed to him. Evidently the sole object of the honorable and learned member was to besmirch the name of the Prime Minister as much as possible. When I asked him to produce the letter stating that the accounts had been “cooked” he was unable to do so. These are the tactics to which Opposition members have resorted in supporting a motion of censure against the Government. In reality they have not attacked the present Administration. Their action has been animated by a paltry feeling of jealousy. They realize full well that they cannot rise to the heights of statesmanship to which the present Prime Minister has attained. They recognise their weakness, and that the only way in which they can drag his name in the mire is by adopting these despicable tactics.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Anybody would think that the honorable and learned member was serious.

Mr. FULLER.—I am serious, but I am not so anxious concerning the result of this motion, as is the honorable member. I am perfectly willing to face my constituents, because I have always acted a straightforward part; but the manner in which the honorable member and the tail of the Protectionist Party have acted will call for a great deal of explanation. Despite all the promises which have been made, the so-called alliance between honorable members opposite has not been consummated in the way that some people imagine, and I venture to say that no agreement to the contrary will prevent selected labour candidates from opposing their allies at the next election. Experience has shown that those who assist the Labour Party to effect liberal reforms, in the interests of the masses, are the first whom they stab and put down. The honorable member for Bourke is playing a very dangerous game. He is placing himself in the hands of a section which knows no party but its own. The whole history of the Labour Party in the New South Wales Legislature shows that its members are always ready to support a Government in return for concessions. The Labour Party in this Parliament has no power to enter into an alliance with any other party. Any person who allies himself with it must carry out its ideals. Members like the honorable member for Bourke will yet receive their just reward for deserting the party with which they were previously associated. Honorable members opposite wish to know why we have not had speeches from more members of the Ministry, but I should like to learn why some of the big guns of the tail of the Protectionist Party on the Opposition cross benches have not yet spoken. So far, the honorable and learned member for Indi, the honorable member for Hume, and other members in the Opposition corner have remained silent as to their present position. I have not the slightest doubt that when some of these honorable members see fit to speak and to say whether they have become disciples of Tom Mann, members of the Ministry will be prepared to reply, and to put their position fairly before the people. We know that the disciple of Socialism to whom I have referred is at present being paid by a body, which was responsible for the return of the Labour Party, to lecture in various parts of Victoria and other States in support of Socialism. Honorable members in the Opposition corner who have joined the newly-formed alliance are in one of two positions: either they are disciples of the Socialism preached by Mr. Tom Mann—which was so prominently put before the House the other day by the honorable and learned member for Wannon—or they are not. The leader of the Opposition has publicly applauded the socialistic sentiments advocated by Mr. Mann, and by the Queensland Worker. He is the connecting link between Mr. Tom Mann and honorable members on the Opposition cross benches who have joined the alliance, and in the interests, not only of themselves, but of their constituents, these honorable members ought to declare their position in regard to the socialistic movement. The honorable member for Bourke, amongst others, should do so.

Mr. STORRER.—According to the honorable and learned member's argument the protectionists on the Government side must have become free-traders.

Mr. FULLER.—I do not say anything of the sort. I am supporting the coalition because I believe that it was necessary for us to combine in the interests of constitutional and responsible government. I went before my constituents as a free-trader, and as such was returned to the State Parliament, as well as to the first Federal Parliament. But free-traders on entering the present Parliament recognised that they were in a minority, and had to consider the best position to take up, in view of the fact that they had been defeated on the fiscal issue. We have not given up our free-trade principles. Let not my honorable friend from Tasmania think that I, at any rate, have done so. We have entered upon this coalition for the life of the present Parliament, believing that it is necessary in order to secure responsible government in the interests of the people. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, when speaking in this House shortly after the last general election, said that now that we had a fiscal truce there was practically no difference between honorable members sitting behind the Deakin Government and those of the then Opposition. An honorable alliance between those honorable members was the only way in which to secure a return to responsible government.

Mr. HUME COOK.—If there be an alliance between the two sections supporting the Government, what are the terms on which it is based?

Mr. FULLER.—So far as I am concerned, the terms are that as long as the Ministry carries on constitutional and responsible government in a proper way, without raising the fiscal issue during the life of this Parliament, it will receive my support. As soon as this Parliament has expired I shall be perfectly free to go to my own or to any other constituency, and to fight, as I have done in the past, for the free-trade and other principles in which I believe.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Is that all?

Mr. FULLER.—It is. The honorable member for Darling, in the course of his speech this morning, said that honorable members on this side of the House were only the sham friends of the farmers, their true friends being the members of the Labour Party, and those at present in alliance with them.

Mr. WILKS.—The men who would give them a land tax.

Mr. FULLER.—I think that honorable members will acknowledge that I have endeavoured to do my duty to the farmers, as well as other classes, of Australia ever since I entered this House. Where were those honorable members, who now profess so strong a desire to help the farmers and the pastoralists of Australia, when I appealed time after time to the House, a year or two ago, to secure a remission of the fodder duties, in order that the pastoralists and others in New South Wales and Queensland, who had suffered severely from the drought, and whose flocks were dying by thousands every day, might secure fodder with which to save the remnants of them? Where were the Labour Party, who now pose as the friends of the farmers, when I and the honorable member for Canobolas sought a revision of the fodder duties? Did they endeavour to assist us?

Mr. PAGE.—Yes.

Mr. FULLER.—One or two members of the Labour Party may have done so, but the party as a whole did not. At that time they were in possession of the Opposition cross-benches, and were driving the Barton Administration. They occupied a position of vast influence, but while they now pose as men who desire to pass legislation to assist the great farming and pastoral interests of Australia they never attempted then to exercise the great power they possessed to assist them. The assertion of the honorable member for Darling, that the Government and their supporters are sham friends of the farmers, reminds me that the party of which he is so strong a member has itself been guilty of a few shams. It will be remembered that when the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill was introduced by the Barton Government, the right honorable member for Adelaide, who was then Minister of Trade and Customs, resigned because the Cabinet refused to accept his view that it should also include certain navigation clauses. If the right honorable member was anything at all in that Administration, he was the spokesman of the Labour Party, and I think that the way in which that party subsequently stood by him redounds to its credit. Subsequently the Navigation Bill was introduced, and was submitted to a Royal Commission, but the Watson Administration proposed to insert these navigation clauses, which then formed part of that measure, in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. What was its object? The Government knew perfectly well that, as the labour representatives from Western Australia were strongly opposed to the inclusion of these clauses in the Bill, there was no hope of carrying them. Every one was agreed that the proper course had been adopted in referring them to the Royal Commission on the Navigation Bill, but the Watson Government brought forward a proposal to embody them in the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, in order that it might be whitewashed, together with its supporters, in the labour constituencies of Australia. The whole proposal was an absolute sham. The late Government knew that there was no likelihood of securing the insertion of those clauses. There was a second sham perpetrated by the late Administration in connexion with the preference clause. I may here say that so strongly was I supported by the trade unions in my constituency at the last election—so true a representative of their interests did they regard me—that, notwithstanding the great efforts made by the Labour Party, they gave me a “walk-over.” But in connexion with the preference clause, the unions desire to discard majority rule. The amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella, on which the late Government were defeated, simply provided that if a majority of those interested in common with the applicants, were in favour, preference could be granted; and majority rule has been a strong democratic point for years past. It is the system adopted by the Labour Party all over Australia in their political unions, and it is the system adopted by the Labour Party caucus in the House. Even if there be only a majority of one in the caucus all the rest of the members of the Labour Party, no matter what may be their individual opinions, must sink their convictions.

Mr. RONALD.—The honorable member is utterly incorrect.

Mr. FULLER.—If I am wrong, I am only saying what has been stated in this House time after time.

Mr. TUDOR.—By whom?

Mr. FULLER.—By numerous honorable members.

Mr. RONALD.—By men who know nothing about the matter.

Mr. FULLER.—Am I to understand that the majority do not rule in the labour caucus?

Mr. RONALD.—In the caucus a member has a free hand when his principles are at stake.

Mr. WILKS.—A free hand as to a vote of censure?

Mr. RONALD.—Yes.

Mr. FULLER.—I thought my adhesion to the great democratic principle of majority rule would bring me into favour, and not disfavour, with the more democratic of my constituents. But the services of the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs were brought into requisition, and an amendment was accepted by the late Prime Minister, which meant that a union with any political “trimmings” or character would not be able to take advantage of the Arbitration Court. Now we are told by the honorable member for Darling and others that, in consequence of the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella having been accepted by the House in preference to the amendment of the late Prime Minister, trade unions will refuse to register under the Bill. But I say that the late Prime Minister and the late Government emasculated the Bill, from a trade union point of view, when they accepted the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs. That, in my opinion, is sham No. 2. There is also another sham which was perpetrated by the Watson Government, supported by the Labour Party. That is in connexion with the employment of lawyers in the Arbitration Court. Those of us who have had close communication with the trade unions of Australia, as I have had in my constituency, know that one point insisted upon was that no lawyers should be employed in the Arbitration Court.

Mr. KELLY.—It is the second item on the Labour Party's programme.

Mr. FULLER.—I think that is so.

Mr. ROBINSON.—The late Government gave way to the honorable and learned member for Indi.

Mr. KELLY.—And sunk their principles.

Mr. FULLER.—But what was done by honorable members who are supposed to represent the labour political unions throughout Australia? The honorable and learned member for Darling Downs has shown himself to be a champion “bridge builder,” not only in this but in other matters which have come before Parliament. The services of that honorable and learned member were again brought into requisition, with the result that the Prime Minister accepted a disgraceful suggestion that lawyers should be allowed to appear in the Arbitration Court with the consent of the President. That is a nice position in which to put the President of a high judicial Court, which we trust will have the respect of the whole community.

If, with the consent of the President, lawyers were allowed to appear in a case which went contrary to the unions, we should find the President subject to the villification of every disappointed litigant, from one end of Australia to the other. The complaint made by the leader of the Opposition is that the programme of the Government is too short. The honorable member seems to think that a great many more measures ought to have been included; in fact, that the whole programme for this and the next session should have been fully outlined. But we have to remember that under ordinary circumstances this session cannot last much longer; and a sufficient number of proposals are put forward to fill up the available time. We must further recollect that if the motion before us fails we shall have to discuss the financial position of the Commonwealth. The leader of the Opposition, when making that complaint, mentioned some of the measures which, in his opinion, he considered the most necessary. It will be remembered that in the programme put forward by the Prime Minister, it was stated that before a High Commissioner was appointed, there would, in his opinion, have to be a consultation with the States Premiers; and, from my point of view, I think such a course highly desirable. The leader of the Opposition, in order to prove his case, referred honorable members to Canada; but he cannot have been aware that the Dominion has no States representatives in London, a High Commissioner representing the whole of the country. In Australia, on the other hand, each State has an Agent-General, and various commercial agents as well. As one who represents the dairy industry—one of the largest producing industries in Australia—I know how much has been suffered in the absence of a proper representation of Australia in London. At the same time, the Agents-General, more particularly Mr. Henry Copeland, whose decease we all so keenly regret, have done good work in the interests of the producers. While I am in favour of the appointment of a High Commissioner with the least possible delay, I think that, in the interests of economy, and the interests of the whole of the people, there ought to be a Conference between the Prime Minister and the Premiers of the States before a definite step is taken.

Mr. FISHER.—We have no power to do away with the States Agents-General.

Mr. FULLER.—Then there is all the more reason for consultation with the States Premiers. One or two honorable members have referred to the suggested conference, and amongst them the honorable member for Darling, who seems to be of opinion that the Commonwealth Parliament Government, in their dealings with the States Governments, ought to take a high and mighty stand. I agree with the honorable member that the Federal Government should be superior to the various States Governments; but it should not be forgotten that we are yet in the early stages of the Federation, that we are merely laying the foundations at the present time, and we should be very careful indeed not to do anything which would cause friction between the different States. The leader of the Opposition next proceeded to fill up his programme with the subject of old-age pensions. It is remarkable that although the Labour Party have been strongly represented in the House since Federation was accomplished, for about three years, they did practically nothing in connexion with this matter which they now put forward so prominently.

Mr. WATSON.—We had not the power to do very much until quite recently.

Mr. FULLER.—When the honorable member, as leader of the Labour Party, sat on the Opposition cross-benches, he had a power which he did not possess as Prime Minister, and which he does not now possess as leader of the Opposition. The honorable gentleman was then in a position to drive the Ministry of the day in almost any direction he wished, and indeed he did so drive it.

Mr. McCAY.—The honorable member for Darwin had a motion dealing with the subject on the notice-paper all that time.

Mr. FULLER.—I believe that is so. I contend that this subject should not be dealt with without the consent of the States, because honorable members are aware that until the Braddon section of the Constitution is removed, £4 will have to be raised through the Customs for every £1 devoted to the payment of old-age pensions. The matter is for this reason not within the range of practical politics at the present time. However, the honorable member for Barrier has suggested a way out of the difficulty. The honorable member has said that the proper way in which to raise money to provide for old-age pensions is by a Federal land tax. I presume that the members of the Labour Party would not be bound by a suggestion from the honorable member for Barrier; but I believe he has expressed the opinion of the whole of the members of the party. I know it is the opinion of the leader of the party, because, speaking at Young, on 28th November, 1903, on the subject of old-age pensions, the honorable member for Bland said—

The funds for such a purpose could be raised by the imposition of a tax on absentee landlords and direct taxation.

We shall, therefore, be justified in assuming that in connexion with this matter of old-age pensions, honorable members opposite, including the honorable members for Bourke, Hume, Indi, and others, are now in agreement with their leader, the honorable member for Bland, and are agreed that the proper way in which to raise money to provide for old-age pensions is by a system of Federal land taxation.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Where does the honorable and learned member get that?

Mr. FULLER.—I think it is about time that the farmers of the Hume, Indi, and Corio districts, and other portions of Victoria and New South Wales were made aware that this is the proposal which honorable members opposite are supporting in connexion with the establishment of old-age pensions.

Mr. HUGHES.—Are there none on the other side?

Mr. FULLER.—I do not know whether I should contradict the honorable and learned member or not, because his word is of such little value in this House at the present time that, so far as I am personally concerned, I do not propose to take any notice of his statements. After the explanations which the honorable and learned gentleman has been called upon to make within the last two or three days, I shall be very doubtful concerning any statement which he may make in the future.

Mr. HUGHES.—I thank the honorable and learned member.

Mr. FULLER.—On this subject of old-age pensions, I find that the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, speaking on the Address-in-Reply at the opening of this Parliament, is reported, at page 297 of Hansard, to have made these remarks—

In connexion with this matter of old-age pensions, it does not need much logic to come to the conclusion that old-age pensions is not within the pale of practical politics at the present time.

Mr. McCAY.—Was that said this year?

Mr. FULLER.—Yes, this year. The honorable and learned member expressed himself so strongly on the subject, as to say that it was “not within the pale of practical politics”; and it appears to me that the Prime Minister was right in stating, as he has done time after time, that the matter has been put forward by honorable members opposite merely to gull the old people of Australia.

Mr. KELLY.—To what party does the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne belong? He does not belong to the caucus, and he does not belong to the honorable and learned member for Indi.

Mr. FULLER.—I think that the honorable and learned member occupies a very peculiar position in this House at the present time.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—All we can get out of the honorable and learned member is that it is his business.

Mr. FULLER.—At public meetings held in Melbourne, the honorable and learned member has praised the caucus and the labour pledge; he was a member of the Labour Administration, and though he has such an admiration for the labour pledge, when asked whether he had signed it or not, he said, “That is my business.”

Mr. MAUGER.—The honorable and learned gentleman said “No.”

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—He said “No,” and when I asked him why, the honorable and learned member said, “That is my business.”

Mr. FULLER.—The leader of the Opposition made use of these remarks—

Unless we hold out some hope to the people that there is something inherent in the Government to lighten their load, the people, instead of advancing, will go back.

The men who have developed Australia, and brought it to its present condition, have been the men who have gone on the land, the men who have opened up the country, and who have worked and developed our mines. These pioneers have struggled in many vicissitudes, in the midst of great privations and difficulties, in the work of developing the country. What prospect is held out to farmers, pastoralists, and others in this country by the views held by honorable gentlemen opposite in connexion with the socialistic principles which have been put forward, the proposal for a Federal land tax to meet old-age pensions, and the various disabilities, in connexion with the arbitration law in particular, which have been suggested?

Mr. FRAZER.—The honorable and learned member's leader promised them the cold southerly winds of the world's competition a little time ago, and he now offers them the warmth of his bosom.

Mr. FULLER.—I am very glad to have heard that nice little quotation from the honorable member for Kalgoorlie. I sincerely trust that now that the honorable member has left the cold strong winds of a bachelor life, he will shortly arrive at a better frame of mind. These are the hopes held out to pastoralists, farmers, and others, men who have to struggle, not in the market of Australia, but in the markets of the world. Our pastoralists, wheat-growers, dairy farmers, and others to-day are producing far more than we can consume, and we have to depend for the price of our produce on what it brings in the London market. We are handicapped by heavy freights; we have competitors within a few days' sail of that market, and we now have suggested additional disabilities, in the form of Federal land taxation, in addition to the States land taxes in operation at the present time.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Where does the honorable and learned member get that from?

Mr. FULLER.—Although I lost my seat in the New South Wales Parliament, partly by advocating a land and income tax in that State, because I believed, and still believe, in such a tax for State purposes, I am of opinion that the whole power of direct taxation should be left in the hands of the various States Governments, and that for Federal and national purposes we should raise money only through the Customs, on a revenue Tariff basis. I shall resist to the utmost of my power any attempt to subject the people of Australia to a Federal land tax, especially for the purpose for which it has been suggested by honorable members opposite. The honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne said that the sooner a dissolution came the better it would be, so that the country could determine whether there was to be a sham or a real Arbitration Bill.

Mr. KELLY.—That was said after the Political Labour League had decided not to oppose him at the next election.

Mr. FULLER.—That, as the honorable member for Wentworth reminds me, was said after the honorable and learned member had an assurance that he would not be opposed by the Political Labour League. As far as I can judge, according to a very great many honorable members, including the honorable and learned member for Northern Melbourne, a sham Arbitration Bill, from his point of view, would be one which would deal fairly and honestly by all sections of the community who would come under its jurisdiction; whilst a real Arbitration Bill, from his point of view, would be one which would operate specifically in the interests of a special section of the community, and hand over greater power to the political labour leagues. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports shakes his head at that statement. What is his position now? The other day he was a protectionist revivalist. Now he acknowledges himself to be a Socialist. I should like to know whether other honorable members associated with him are Socialists also. I have a few more words to say about the Arbitration Bill, because I have been brought rather prominently forward in connexion with it by reason of the action which has been taken in my constituency by one of the largest unions in Australia. In consequence of my vote in connexion with the preference clauses, the delegates of that union have unanimously condemned me. I feel sure that those delegates and the members of the union generally, when they come to consider the question and the circumstances surrounding it, and when they know how my vote was given, and what was done by the Government, and understand that the late Prime Minister himself said, that there was practically no difference between his own proposal and the amendment of the present Minister of Trade and Customs, will hold a different opinion.

Mr. WATSON.—I said that there was so great a difference that I would retire from office sooner than accept the amendment of the Minister of Defence.

Mr. FULLER.—I shall point out what the honorable member said directly. If I say anything that is not correct, I feel sure that he will give me credit for not attempting to misrepresent him, and I shall be very glad to be corrected. It has been wrongly represented to the unions of Australia that the question between the leader of the Opposition and the present Minister of Defence was one of the granting of preference to unionists. The question never came into the dispute in connexion with either of the proposals then before the Committee. The only question was that of the terms and conditions under which the Court —to which power had already been given to grant preference to unionists—was to grant that preference. The honorable and learned member for Corinella, and practically all members, including the leader of the Opposition, thought that those terms and conditions should be set out on the face of the Bill. The amendment, which was adopted, read as follows:—

And provided further that no such preference should be directed to be given unless the application for such preference is, in the opinion of the Court, approved by a majority of those affected by the award who have interests in common with the applicants.

The present leader of the Opposition proposed to substitute for that amendment the following:—

The Court, before directing that preference shall be given to the members of an organization, shall be satisfied that the organization substantially represents the industry affected in point of numbers and competence of its members.

The honorable member for Darling is, perhaps, the most experienced trade unionist in this House, having, I understand, been president of the union which he represents for some fifteen years. He has said that in consequence of the amendment which was carried, his union will refuse to register. But he acknowledges that what applies to his union does not apply to all the unions in Australia. Knowing how numbers of shearers join that union from time to time, then cease to be members, and go back to their homes, and subsequently join again. I can, myself, see that there would be some difficulty in their case. The honorable member said there would be great difficulty, and I am quite prepared to accept his statement, because he is a man who has had great experience. But he admits that that difficulty would not apply to other unions. What difficulty would there be in the application of the amendment of the Minister of Defence to the coal-mining industry? What difficulty would there be in finding out whether there was a majority of the workers in favour of giving preference to unionists? There would be none whatever. Take the great coal-mining industry of Illawarra and Newcastle. Practically the whole of the men engaged in the trade belong to the union. If a dispute should occur in that trade, which extended beyond the limits of one State—and that would be the only kind of dispute to which this Bill could apply—there would be no difficulty in ascertaining the opinion of the majority of the men engaged in the industry.

But there is a further point. There are a large number of workers who think that their whole welfare depends upon the passage of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. We have an Arbitration Act in force in New South Wales which deals with all State disputes, and will continue to deal with them whether the Federal Bill be passed or not. The Federal measure is intended to deal with disputes of magnitude extending beyond the limits of a State. In the great coal-mining industry in which, as I have said, a large number of persons in my constituency are engaged, if a dispute should occur and should extend beyond the limits of the State, there would be no difficulty in proving the opinion of the majority of the workers. There would, indeed, be less difficulty in proving the opinion of the majority than in proving what was provided for in the proposal of the ex-Prime Minister—that the applicants “substantially represent” the majority. A majority is a simple clear thing that the smallest child in a public school could understand. All that the representatives of any industry would have to prove to the Court would be that they had the vote of a simple majority.

Mr. WATSON. — They would have to prove first of all that they were likely to be affected by an award.

Mr. FULLER.—But substantial representation as provided for in the honorable member's amendment would have to be argued about in every case that came before the Judge in every possible connexion. It would be a matter for judicial interpretation. It would be a matter of Judge-made law in each case brought before the Court. I should like to ask those honorable members who represent labour interests and labour constituencies, whether they want to put the workers—more particularly in the case of the workers in the coal fields of Australia who have to work in the bowels of the earth—in the position of having to take money out of their hard earnings, which are required for the benefit of their wives and children, in order to put it into the pockets of the lawyers? Do the representatives of labour constituencies wish that to be done.

Mr. FRAZER.—We would trust the Court where we would not trust the present Ministerialists.

Mr. FULLER.—I should be willing to trust the Court a good deal if it were properly constituted. I know of no reason why, after our experience of judicial appointments in New South Wales, we should not have absolute trust in the Court.

Mr. FRAZER.—Does the honorable and learned member insinuate that the Court would not have been properly constituted had the Watson Government remained in power?

Mr. FULLER.—I never made that suggestion for a moment.

Mr. FRAZER.—Then, why did the honorable and learned member use the words "if it were properly constituted"?

Mr. FULLER.—That phrase casts no reflection on the late Government. Being a member of the legal profession, and having the privilege of knowing a good many of our judicial officers, I should be the last man in the world to suggest such a thing. In the debate on this question, the leader of the Opposition made these remarks, which may be found on page 4045 of Hansard—

The practice in nearly every case, in all the Arbitration Courts, has been to grant a preference only when the majority, reasonably ascertained, is in favour of such a preference. I am not so foolish as to anticipate that the practice laid down by the Arbitration Courts of New Zealand and New South Wales will be departed from by the Judge appointed to the Federal tribunal. Any one who imagines that the Judge in the Federal Court would lay down a new line of procedure—that he would grant preferences to unions which manifestly represented only a minority of those employed in the industry or in the district in respect of which the preference was asked—cannot have paid any attention to the general procedure under legislation of this kind.

As the honorable member very properly pointed out, the practice in the Arbitration Courts has been to grant a preference only when the majority has been reasonably ascertained. He further said—

The Government do not desire that preference shall be granted to minorities.

Feeling perfectly satisfied that that was the wish of the honorable member, and, I presume, of other members of his Administration, I cannot understand why they took such strong exception to the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella.

Mr. WATSON.—Because it was unworkable.

Mr. FULLER.—It will be remembered that on various matters in connexion with the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, the late Government had to back down. In fact, they had backed down on so many occasions, that they were tired of being defeated. They had to make a stand on some question, and the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Corinella appeared to afford a favorable opportunity for them to make a stand. I feel that I am quite safe in saying that a number of the followers of the late Ministry did not approve of the action of its head on that occasion. We know that the late Ministry climbed down in connexion with, first, the amendment of the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, and then the political nature of the unions. We also know that they climbed down in connexion with the question of lawyers appearing in the Arbitration Court and agreed to allow them to appear only with the consent of its president. I felt, as any honorable man must have felt, that the late Prime Minister was tired of this continual climbing down. He felt that the moving of this amendment by the honorable and learned member for Corinella furnished to him the opportunity to make a stand, which he did, although he practically said that there was very little difference between that amendment and his own. So far as I could see, there was about as much difference between the amendments as there is between Tweedledum and Tweedledee. When all these circumstances are pointed out in the various labour centres, where the unions have in some cases passed resolutions objecting to the action of their representatives here, in connexion with this Bill, it will not be a matter for the consideration of the delegates only, but also of the rank and file, who constitute those bodies. For example, the men who constitute the union in the Illawarra district—over 2,000 strong—are, as regards political and other matters, amongst the best informed class in the community. Many honorable members, if they went amongst those miners, would be surprised to find out what a grasp and knowledge they have of political matters. When I, who have hitherto enjoyed their confidence, and I believe their respect and esteem, point out to these Illawarra miners that the sole thing I did was not to vote against preference to unionists—

Mr. MAHON.—But to vote the Labour Government out.

Mr. FULLER.—Of course my vote had that result. When the Illawarra miners find that I voted on that occasion, not against preference to unionists, but as to the conditions on which it should be granted; when they know that all sides of this House, including the late Ministry, were agreed that some conditions should be laid down, and that in the opinion of the late Prime Minister there was very little, if any, difference between the amendments—

Mr. WATSON.—That is not so.

Mr. FULLER.—I am relying on the honorable member's own words.

Mr. WATSON.—If the honorable and learned member will read a few sentences further on, he will find that I said that there was no substantial difference in the object aimed at, and that while one amendment was unworkable ours was workable.

Mr. FULLER.—I have not the report of the honorable member's speech here, so that I am unable to refer to that passage. When these facts, I repeat, are pointed out to the men who constitute the unions, who are able to think for themselves, and who recognise that some of us have stood firmly and faithfully by our pledges to them in the past, they will not be led away by the promoters of any political movement, but, on the contrary, will stand firm and fast by those representatives who on that occasion stood firm and fast by the great principle of majority rule.

Mr. WATKINS.—These same coal-miners have been out-voted by a majority of "blacklegs" before.

Mr. WILKS.—From Victoria.

Mr. WATKINS.—No; from Sydney.

Mr. FULLER.—The only other matter to which I wish to refer is the protectionist revival by honorable members who sit on the cross benches. The mere mention of the subject makes the honorable member for Melbourne Ports wake up. I hope that in their interests there will be a little revival in connexion with the protectionist cause; but I fail to see how it is to be obtained from the allies with whom they are joined. If the honorable member for Barrier and other honorable members, after the pledges which they have given to their constituents, and the manner in which they stood by those of us who, during the consideration of the Tariff, fought so resolutely for the reduction of duties upon tools and implements used in the mining fields, and against the imposition of duties upon timber required for mining operations, help those honorable members, it will surprise me very much indeed.

Mr. MAHON.—Well, the honorable and learned member will be surprised.

Mr. FULLER.—The honorable member for Coolgardie tells me that I will get a surprise, and therefore I am justified in asking him if the Labour Party is in the future to be the Protectionist Party? Is that the surprise that we are going to get?

Mr. MAHON.—The honorable and learned member will know when the time comes.

Mr. FULLER.—Is the great Labour Party to cease to rule the destinies of Australia, and to become subservient to the honorable and learned member for Indi and the tail of the Protectionist Party? Can any one credit that statement? I do not for a moment. I know what are the aims and the objects of the Labour Party. I know how they have progressed in the past and what they are pressing forward to in the future, and it would surprise me very much if the interjection of the honorable member for Coolgardie should turn out to be a true statement of fact, and the Labour Party became the Protectionist Party. So far as I am concerned, I will support the Government on this occasion. I am not altogether enamoured of the alliance which has been come to, but I believe that it was necessary in the interests of good government, and the electors of Australia have declared in favour of a fiscal truce, for the time being, at any rate. Even the honorable member for Melbourne Ports went to the country pledged to the observance of a fiscal truce. Moreover, I represent a district whose people belong to two of the large producing interests of the Commonwealth—the dairying industry and the coal-mining industry. It is the producers on whom Australia depends, not upon the great cities of Melbourne and Sydney, which are mere parasites upon the country. The wealth of Australia is earned by her pastoralists, her farmers, her miners, and her other producers, who are spread over the face of the land, not by the few manufacturing industries on the banks of the Yarra and the Parramatta. That is shown very clearly when we get a severe drought, and the pastoral industry, for example, suffers. Therefore, anything that would cripple our primary resources would be one of the worst things that could happen to us. I believe, however, that the legislation proposed, and the socialistic doctrines promulgated, by the Labour Party, and those who support them—and their supporters now include the honorable and learned member for Indi, and the honorable members for Bourke and Hume—would, if put into force, be inimical to the best interests of Australia, and I shall, therefore, fight against it as much as I can.

Mr. RONALD (Southern Melbourne).—The fact that the present Administration do not possess the confidence of the House has been demonstrated continually during the debate by the state of the benches on the Ministerial side of the Chamber. When the first Parliament assembled in Athens, and on one side of the House were gathered the Prime Minister Necias and his supporters, and on the other side Alcibiades and his followers, we had, for the first time in history, two leaders of a political assembly sitting face to face, supported by the presence of their followers. But during the present debate the supporters of the Reid-McLean Administration might have been counted on the fingers of one hand. That state of things appears to me to make it unnecessary to try to prove that the Administration does not possess the confidence of the House. They are obviously at all times practically dependent on the Opposition to keep a House. There are, however, one or two other matters to which I wish to refer in the few minutes which remain before the adjournment—because I cannot be expected to finish my speech to-day. One of the facts that lie before us at the present time is that the three parties in this House are to all intents and purposes one party, and that that is why the present confusion exists. Every Government that has been in power since the Parliament met—and this is the third Administration which we have had—has put the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill in the forefront of its programme. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat brought in the Bill, and professed to be in favour of its principles; but if he had been true to those principles the measure would by this time have been placed on the statute-book. When he was defeated in Committee, however, on a question of detail, he resigned office in a pique, and the Watson Administration supplanted his own. That Government, in its turn, resigned because it was defeated on its proposal to grant preference to unionists, which it regarded of vital importance. Now we have the Reid-McLean Administration, and the question naturally suggests itself, “Will they make anything vital?” It will not reflect credit on the intelligence of the House if the three parties find themselves so much in general agreement—and almost every member of the House has declared that the measure is urgently needed—and cannot agree as to details. We are told that there is no opposition to the principles embodied in the Bill, and that fact is borne out by the action of each party as it has come into power in turn, in declaring that the first measure on its programme would be the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. What we really want to know is, are honorable members sincere in their professions of belief in the principle of conciliation and arbitration? Are they in earnest in the desire to settle industrial disputes amicably and peaceably by judicial authority?

Mr. MAUGER.—I do not think so.

Mr. RONALD.—I believe that the honorable member is right, and that beyond the shadow of a doubt what we have seen is sheer and unmitigated political hypocrisy. If honorable members are anxious for industrial conciliation and arbitration, why has there been all this waste of time over details? We have been here for many months, and have nothing to show as the result of our labours. The only point upon which we differ is as to who shall occupy the Treasury bench, and that fact is a reflection upon the earnestness and integrity of honorable members. If we were earnest in our desire to legislate in the best interests of the country, we should put an end to the present unseemly and un-Godly scramble for office. I could understand the last two Governments being displaced, if they were succeeded by a new Administration which was prepared to declare its utter disbelief in socialistic legislation, but I cannot understand any section of honorable members pretending to be in favour of the measure that has been before us since the beginning of the session, and making a dispute with regard to petty details a pretext for ousting the Government from office. Conciliation or no conciliation should be the issue before us.

Mr. McDONALD.—I do not wish to be included amongst those who have been scrambling for office.

Mr. RONALD.—The honorable member is like the Pharisee. He thanks God that he is not as other men are, and I might join him to that extent. I strongly deprecate the subversion of all other considerations to that of obtaining possession of the Treasury bench. The present Government is a sham. It came into office as the professed friend of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, after having ousted the previous Government, which placed that measure in the forefront of its programme.

Mr. McCAY.—The late Government insisted on going out of office.

Mr. RONALD.—We may have our own opinions with regard to the wisdom, or unwisdom, of the course adopted by the late Government, but I do not wish to enter into that question. As a matter of fact, the present Government is an anti-socialistic combination.

Mr. MAUGER.—What is Socialism?

Mr. RONALD.—The question "What is truth?" has never yet been answered, and the question "What is Socialism?" is not likely to elicit a satisfactory reply until men are supplied with consciences, as well as with the power of reasoning, and are able to appreciate mental and moral truths. The root of the word "Socialism" is the Greek word socios, meaning a friend, an ally. Therefore, Socialism means nothing else than an alliance, a friendship, a brotherhood, an association or co-operation for a given purpose. All Governments are in their very essence socialistic. If the words "Socialism" and "alliance" are to be regarded as synonymous, we should not seek for any special definition of the former term, because we are sufficiently familiar with the meaning of the latter. If honorable members in this House were divided into Socialists and anti-Socialists, the latter would eventually prove to be anarchists, because anti-Socialism and anarchy are practically identical. Those who are opposed to Socialism, or alliance for the purpose of maintaining law and order and good government—and the term is capable of no other definition—must needs be anarchists. I must protest against the references which have been made to paid agitators in the Labour Party, and to the engagement of Mr. Tom Mann as an organizer. We have been told that we have set a bad example, but we might be more reasonably charged with following a bad example. We have followed in the footsteps of the Employers' Federation, and we claim that, whilst one side is using its wealth to hire agitators, the Labour Party, which has no press to support it, would be very foolish indeed if it failed to take advantage of the services of a man who is so well fitted for the work of organization. So long as one class in the community is permitted to employ agitators, the other side cannot be blamed for following its example. A great deal has been said during the course of this debate—in order that it may be scattered far and wide—against the morality of this proceeding. As to the morality of the teaching of our representative, I claim that it will compare very favorably indeed with the unseemly and dangerous instruction imparted by the paid agitator of the Employers' Federation. At any rate, we never acknowledge or countenance any attack upon the sanctity of the marriage tie. But the hired agitator of the Employers' Federation has descended to the lowest depths of immorality by declaring that marriage, which is the foundation of our family life, and the one institution in our civilization that is worth preserving, is a luxury which should be placed in the same category as long beers. That is the teaching of this moralist, this instructor in the ethics of politics. He has proclaimed to the world that the Labour Party is to be reprobated for all that is vile, because it will not indorse that sentiment. To me it is manifest that the present Administration do not possess the confidence of this House, and if for no other reason than is supplied by the programme which they have presented, they should be deposed. So far as the members of the Government are concerned individually, there are no men in this House whom I should be more pleased to see upon the Treasury bench. They are gentlemen of whom this Parliament or any other Legislature might well be proud. I find no fault with the personnel of the Cabinet, but I claim that it is possible to respect them without in any way agreeing with their political views. I very much deplore the washing of dirty political linen which has taken place during the course of this debate. Whatever our differences may be, I trust that they will always be differences of principle, and that our respect for each other will be maintained. In my opinion, the coalition between the avowed protectionists and the declared free-traders in this House is an unholy one. On the other hand, the alliance between the Labour Party and the liberal protectionists is a natural alliance, because their members have many things in common. The liberal protectionists are democrats. Personally I hope to see the day when the term "Labour Party" will disappear. "Democratic Party" would suit my taste far better. Nevertheless the word "labour" is associated with all that is honorable, and I have no objection to it. But there are those who do object to it, and I hope, as the result of this alliance, to see a new party spring into existence which will absorb both. We shall then have a clear line of demarcation between the democrats and the conservatives. Our alliance is not based upon a mere negation; it is a positive alliance, whereas the coalition between honorable members opposite is based upon a pure negation. It is anti-labour. History demonstrates that no movement will ever make for the good of the community which is founded upon a mere negation. If we are to achieve any good, it must be by having something positive. What is there that is positive in the programme of the Government? Nothing but what has been taken out of the policy submitted by the Watson Administration. Some time ago, a very ludicrous advertisement was posted up all round Melbourne. It pictured a certain distinguished gentleman in a very unbecoming, not to say nude, state. Later on, his figure was obliterated, and the public were informed that he had gone to be clothed at a certain establishment in the city. The recollection of that advertisement leads me to say—speaking in a political sense—that he went to the bathing boxes of the Labour Party, stole their clothes, and came back dressed in arbitration breeches, a conciliation coat, a free-trade waistcoat, and a protectionist belltopper. The present Administration found the Labour Party bathing, and stole their clothes. Such a grotesque figure is not likely to commend himself to the people as one who is properly clothed, and in such a state of mind as to warrant him being charged with the conduct of the political affairs of the Commonwealth. Because he is so grotesquely arrayed I think he should be arrested, and a speedy termination put to his Ministerial existence. If I am a prophet as well as a parson, we shall find upon an appeal to the electors that the Government do not possess their confidence. The Ministerial programme is a miserable piece of patch-work, which contains nothing but that which has been filched from their predecessors in office.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Motion (by Mr. REID) agreed to—

That Orders of the Day, Government business, Nos. 1 and 2, have precedence over all other business this day.

PRIVILEGE.

Sir JOHN FORREST (Swan).—I rise to a point of privilege. In the Age newspaper of Saturday last the following passage occurs in a report of a speech of the honorable member for Southern Melbourne:—

Last night Sir John Forrest had boasted of having introduced conciliation and arbitration into Western Australia, and had said that preference to unionism was the basic principle of his Bill. And yet this was the man who was opposing preference to unionism at the present time, with the desire to make the Bill null and void. Such unmitigated humbugging of the people whilst professing to be actuated by a regard for their welfare was shameful.

The honorable member's statement that I had said that "preference to unionism was the basic principle of my Bill" is incorrect, as my remarks were the very opposite of those attributed to me. They are reported at page 4857 of Hansard, as follows:—

I was the first man in Australia to introduce and pass a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, brought up to date with the provisions of the Act then in force in New Zealand, with one or two exceptions.

Mr. GROOM.—With preference to unionists?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No. That was not in the measure. I am opposed to preference to unionists, as being unnecessary and unfair. I do not think it was in the New Zealand Act at that time.

Mr. GROOM.—It was held to be.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I did not know that at the time. I do not think the State Parliament of Western Australia would have passed a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill giving one man an undue preference over another.

Mr. GROOM.—Has it passed it since?

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I may tell the honorable and learned member that even now, though the measure I passed has been amended, with the assistance of the Labour Party, which was not in existence in my day, and has been liberalized in some directions and brought up to date with the New Zealand Act, there is no preference to unionists in it, and the Court in Western Australia has refused to give preference to unionists.

Mr. FRAZER.—That is why they are amending the Bill again now.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I am not speaking of what is to be done, but of what has been done. I wrote to the honorable member for Southern Melbourne, pointing out to him—

Mr. McDONALD.—I rise to a point of order. The right honorable member commenced by saying that he wished to state a question of privilege; but he has not told the House whether he intends to conclude his speech with a motion. I do not know if it is his intention to conclude with a motion, but I ask if he will be in order in not doing so? If he continues his criticisms, and does not conclude with a motion, the honorable member for Southern Melbourne will be prevented from replying to him, and other honorable members will be debarred from taking part in the discussion of the subject.

Mr. SPEAKER.—There are two or three courses, any one of which may be taken on a question of privilege. The right honorable member for Swan is well within his rights in stating to the House in such manner as he may desire, but at not too great a length—and he certainly has not yet occupied very much time—what the question of privilege is. It will be competent for him then to leave the honorable member for Southern Melbourne to make any rejoinder which he may desire to make, or the right honorable member may conclude with a motion. He is, however, entitled to state to the House, first of all, for its information what the question of privilege is which he desires to bring under its notice.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I wrote to the honorable member for Southern Melbourne, pointing out the error which he had made in attributing to me the statement that “preference to unionism was the basic principle of my Bill”; but, instead of replying that he had made an error, or had misunderstood my remarks, the answer which I received from him this morning states that he is surprised at my objection to his words, as he does not disclaim the report. The whole point of his remarks was that I had said that “preference to unionism was the basic principle of my Bill,” and that notwithstanding what I had said, I had, in this Chamber, opposed preference to unionism, the inference being, to use his own words, that I have been “humbugging the people, and that my conduct is shameful.” There is only one way in which the honorable member for Southern Melbourne can now act, and that is to express his regret at having altogether misrepresented me. When an honorable member misrepresents another, the only proper course for him to take is to say at once that he misunderstood him, or unknowingly and unintentionally misrepresented him. No one who has read the Hansard report of or listened to my remarks can doubt that I have been absolutely misrepresented by the honorable member. Such conduct is unworthy of a member of this House, and if the honorable member allows it to stand against him it will be simply scandalous.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The question raised by the right honorable member for Swan is not one of privilege, nor is any further step necessary in connexion with it. The right honorable gentleman was perfectly entitled to make a personal explanation—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—That is what I intended to do. I should have said “personal explanation” instead of “point of privilege.”

Mr. SPEAKER.—If the honorable member for Southern Melbourne desires to make a rejoinder he is at liberty to do so.

Mr. RONALD (Southern Melbourne).—I received the right honorable member's communication, in the form of a note containing a quotation from a newspaper report, which, I may say, was not a verbatim report of what I said. It must have been known to the right honorable gentleman that the West Australian Bill was based upon the New Zealand Act, and that at the time the measure was passed, the Legislature had before it not only the New Zealand Act, which contained a provision for preference to unionists, but also the decisions of the Courts in support of such preference. Therefore, if the right honorable gentleman had desired to oppose the granting of preference, he should have indicated it upon the face of the Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I believed that all references to preference had been omitted from my Bill.

Mr. RONALD.—I have looked up the decisions of the Courts—

Mr. SPEAKER.—I would remind the honorable member that the one point for explanation, and the only one, is in regard to the complaint of the right honorable member for Swan that the honorable member stated that he said a certain thing which the right honorable gentleman denies having uttered. We are not concerned with what was included in the Bill, or what was accomplished by that measure. The sole question is whether the honorable member did, or did not, make the statement attributed to him, and I should be glad if the honorable member would confine himself to that.

Mr. RONALD.—It is my intention to reply to the right honorable gentleman in my speech upon the motion of want of confidence. I shall content myself at present by stating that the report that I said that the right honorable member for Swan made preference to unionists the basic principle of the Bill is not correct. What I said was that preference to unionists was the basic principle of the Bill.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—If the honorable member had stated to the House at once that the newspaper report was incorrect the matter would have been ended.

SUPPLY BILL (No. 4).

POSTAL, TELEGRAPHIC, AND TELEPHONIC SERVICES: BREWERS' LICENCES: SUPPLY OF RIFLES TO CLUBS: SURPLUS REVENUE PAYABLE TO STATES: DUTY ON ADVERTISING MATTER.

Mr. SPEAKER reported the receipt of a message from His Excellency the Governor-General, recommending that an appropriation be made from the consolidated revenue for the purposes of this Bill.

In Committee of Supply:

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Balaclava — Treasurer).—I move—

That a sum not exceeding £430,421 be granted to His Majesty for or towards defraying the services of the year ending 30th June, 1905.

I had proposed to make the Budget statement last Tuesday, but other business intervened, and I was not in a position to carry out my original intention. Whatever our differences may be, the public servants and the public creditors must be paid, and, therefore, whilst it may seem a little extraordinary to interrupt the course of a no-confidence debate in order to ask for Supply, we must have the grant of Parliament to provide us with the money necessary to meet the payments which fall due at the end of the present month. Our present supply is exhausted, and we must have a further grant before the end of the month.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Will the Senate be able to pass the Bill?

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—I am anxious to pass the Bill through this Chamber to-day, in order that the Senate may have an opportunity to deal with it to-morrow. Honorable members will see that even if the Bill be passed to-morrow, a very short time will be left for carrying out the necessary arrangements. Our practice is as soon as the Royal Assent is given to the Supply Bill to send telegrams to the various officers, so that they may make all the necessary payments during the last two days of the month. The items in the schedule of the Bill are of the ordinary character. They do not comprise any debatable items, and the passing of the measure will not in any way deprive Parliament of an opportunity to discuss the balances of the votes. I regret that it is necessary to ask for further supply. Owing to circumstances over which he had no control, my predecessor was unable to make the Budget statement at the end of July, and, therefore, it has been necessary to pass more monthly Supply Bills than has been altogether desirable. In my view, the Estimates should be brought down at the earliest possible moment. I do not know, however, that it is wise to begin their discussion very early in the session. I tried that plan once in Victoria, and it seemed almost as if we should have time for nothing else but the discussion of the Estimates during that session. At the same time, it is only right that honorable members should have an opportunity to peruse the Estimates at an early stage. I have satisfied myself, after consultation with the responsible officers, that nothing is now being asked for that cannot safely be granted by Parliament.

Mr. WATSON (Bland).—I admit that it is unusual to interrupt debate upon a motion of want of confidence with a proposal of this character, but I do not see any escape from the situation. We must meet the engagements of the Commonwealth, and in view of the assurance of the Treasurer that the Bill contains no items beyond those usually included in such measures, I think that we may safely agree to pass it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume).—Honorable members have not had an opportunity of looking through the Bill.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—It was circulated on Friday night.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—At any rate, I have not had an opportunity of examining it. I presume, however, that the schedule includes items providing for ordinary expenditure such as salaries, and payments in connexion with works that are proceeding.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Not payments in connexion with new works.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—No, but payments in connexion with works that are completed or are proceeding. I desire to refer to one or two works, in respect of which payments should have been made some time since. A number of works have been practically completed, and the contractors still remain unpaid.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—Those works are not included in the schedule of the Bill; they are dealt with in a separate Bill. Any payments that may be necessary under such contracts can be made out of the Treasurer's advance vote; there is plenty of money available.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Certain works have been carried out at Tumut, Cootamundra, and Albury, for which the contractors have not yet been paid. I have endeavoured, during the past two or three months, but without success, to induce the Department of Home Affairs to take action in the matter.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—If the honorable member will submit the particulars to me, I shall have the cases investigated.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I have brought them under the notice of the Minister of Home Affairs. It is not fair to the contractors they should be kept out of the money to which they are entitled. Then, again, in connexion with the telephone service, I presume that there is money available to pay for those services and the salaries of the telephone attendants, and I wish to bring under notice an apparent absurdity in connexion with the arrangements in New South Wales. I rang up a country telephone office the other day from Sydney, and was informed that I could not be connected with the subscriber with whom I wished to communicate because the instrument which I was using was not registered. As a result I was compelled to walk three-quarters of a mile to the central office, where I was first required to pay 1s. 3d. for the transmission of the telephone message. I was then shown into a little bureau where I was called upon to drop threepence into a slot machine.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—With which station did the honorable member communicate when he was required to pay 1s. 3d.?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—That was the fee which I had to pay for communicating with Katoomba. The demand was made that I should place threepence in the slot as payment for the use of the bureau, making a total charge of 1s. 6d. I need scarcely remind honorable members that I could have despatched a telegram for ninepence. Personally, I should not complain of this, but the public complain of it very seriously. Some change must be made in the existing arrangement. It seems absurd that I should be required to pay 1s. 6d. for the transmission of a telephone message after being called upon to walk three-quarters of a mile to despatch it, instead of being permitted to use the nearest available instrument. If the Postal Department will not remedy the evil, this House should consider it, and deal with the Minister and officers who refuse to alter the present system. Not only is the Department at fault in this particular, but the service throughout is deficient. The method adopted in connexion with the erection of telephones and the junction of branch lines with the main lines throughout New South Wales is monstrous. I have always conceived it to be the duty of the Government and the officers of the Department to accommodate the public as far as possible. Surely in the outlying and sparsely-populated districts where the telephone is a great convenience to the residents, we ought not to throw obstacles in the way of the erection of telephone lines, and then charge a high fee when persons wish to use them. In my own electorate, near Cootamundra, I know of one case where a telephone has been erected to within seventeen chains of a post-office. Great trouble was experienced by the residents—owing to the objections urged by the Department—in getting the line carried across an adjacent reserve. Now it cannot be used in consequence of the charges of the postal officials acting under instructions from the head office. I have no desire to deal with these instances in detail at the present stage, because I intend, within a very short time, to bring forward a number of specific cases in support of my statements. There is another matter which is a source of considerable inconvenience to residents in New South Wales. If a letter be posted in Melbourne, and only a penny stamp be affixed to it, the recipient in New South Wales is required to pay not only the additional postage required, but also a fine.

Mr. PAGE.—That is the true Federal spirit.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not think so. Business people and others in Victoria frequently post letters addressed to New South Wales upon which they affix a penny stamp. Upon their delivery, not only is the extra penny charged for postage, but a fine is exacted from the individual who receives them.

Mr. PAGE.—The Government in which the honorable member was a Minister passed the Act under which that charge is made.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I do not know that we did, but I think we adopted the system which had previously operated in Victoria—the penny postage system. The present practice affects a large number of people, and causes a great deal of friction. This condition of affairs should be speedily remedied. There is still another question to which I desire to direct attention, and concerning which the Minister of Trade and Customs may know something. I wish to inquire whether anything has been done in the way of reimbursing Mr. Sandford the large sum of money which he was required to pay as duty upon old iron which, when crossing into New South Wales, was charged for as steel rails. This matter has been under consideration for a long time.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes, whilst the honorable member himself was a Minister.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If my colleagues chose to divulge what took place in Cabinet, honorable members would know that I brought this matter forward upon six occasions.

Mr. REID.—Cabinet secrets.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It is not a Cabinet secret, because the statement has been made openly.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Is not the case being tested? At the time we left office it was.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I was not aware of it. I recognise that it is a difficult matter to deal with. If I had had the power to do so, I should have dealt with it in a very summary fashion by remitting the amount of the duty. There was an entirely technical offence. These rails were imported to be, and were smelted down as old iron, and Mr. Sandford was charged duty upon them as if they were steel rails being imported into New South Wales. Perhaps the Minister of Trade and Customs can give me some information as to what is to be done in the matter. There is still another practice which is responsible for a great deal of friction—especially at Albury—at the present time. It has reference to certain licences which are being issued. I am not sure whether these licences are issued by the Commonwealth Government, but I believe that some of them are. What I wish to point out is that when an attempt is made by persons resident in New South Wales to work under these licences in Victoria, they are prevented from doing so, and are made the subjects of a prosecution.

Mr. McCAY.—To what licences does the honorable member refer?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Licences in respect of beer, spirits, and wines.

Mr. McCAY.—That is a State matter.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I think there is a Federal licence issued in connexion with beer. I know that Messrs. T. H. Mate and Co., of Albury, are subject to very serious inconvenience on account of the action of the police in Victoria in refusing to allow them to sell their beer upon this side of the River Murray. Another question of very great importance has reference to the brewers' licences. The other day I saw a reference to this subject by the Premier of Victoria. Under the Excise Act power is given to persons to brew beer, and a Federal licence-fee is charged. In New South Wales a licence-fee of £30 annually is also charged in this connexion. The brewers of New South Wales are compelled to pay the two amounts, which aggregate either £45 or £55 a year. A test case was recently heard by the police magistrate at Cootamundra, who decided in favour of the brewer; but on appeal to the High Court, it was held that the licence-fee charged by the Commonwealth Government only covered the right to brew, and that the issue of licences to sell was under the control of the State Government. Thus, whereas, previously the one licensing fee enabled the brewers both to brew and to sell their beer, they are now called upon to pay a State as well as a Federal licence. The Premier of Victoria referred to this matter the other day—

Mr. GROOM.—He said that he would make the brewers pay.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—It seems to me a very hard case indeed for the brewer. If the licence-fee which was formerly charged by the State was sufficient, I fail to see why the amount should be increased. I believe that the passing of the law in the form in which it at present stands was the result of an accident.

Mr. McCAY.—Has not the High Court said that we cannot prevent the States Governments from imposing their charges?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—If we cannot do that, I say we should not impose another licence-fee. One charge or the other should not be levied.

Mr. HIGGINS.—Why not come to some understanding with the States in the same way that is proposed by the Government in connexion with old-age pensions?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—This matter constitutes a very serious trouble in New South Wales. The brewers all through New South Wales feel that they have a grievance, and, as the Premier of Victoria says, this will very shortly be an acute question in Victoria. If the States Governments will not do anything in the matter, I suggest that, in the case of other States following the same practice, communications should be opened up with them in order to see whether some compromise or arrangement cannot be arrived at. If no arrangement can be made, it only remains to amend the law so that the charge made by the Federal Government may cease. There is another matter to which I desire to call attention. A few days ago I asked a question concerning a scheme submitted for the destruction of rabbits, which cause so much loss not only in New South Wales, but throughout Australia. On that occasion the Prime Minister said that any application in this connexion should be made to the States, and that he had received no communication on the subject. I urge the Prime Minister to make representations to the States, so that the matter may not be allowed to remain dormant. There is no doubt that a great deal of power may be exercised by the Commonwealth Prime Minister in the way of making representations to the States Governments; and there is no matter of greater importance to Australia than the destruction of the rabbits. If the Prime Minister were the representative of a country constituency in almost any part of Australia, he would know what a serious plague this is, especially in the western and northern areas of New South Wales and Victoria. Something effective should be done to remove a pest which has been devastating the colonies for very many years past. The question requires urgent attention, and while, in the absence of action by the States, I do not know whether the Federal Government can interfere, something ought to be done, and at once; and there is an opportunity at present. I hope the remarks I have made in regard to these two or three matters will not be allowed to go in at one ear and out of the other, because they are important, and worthy of the most careful consideration. I urge on the Government not to allow these matters to drift, but to act with vigour in their settlement.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK (Parramatta).—I echo the hope which the honorable member for Hume expressed a moment or two ago, that the remarks he has made will not be allowed to go in at one ear and out at the other, as, apparently, similar remarks have been treated during the last three and a half years. There is, however, scarcely anything new in the complaints made by the honorable member, because time and again I brought those matters under the notice of the Government of which the honorable member was a member.

Mr. GROOM.—The beer tax?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—That is the exception. I should welcome the honorable member as a most valuable ally on grievance day, were the position he takes not such a recent and sudden development on his part. However, the honorable member has told us that he was engaged in a death struggle with his colleagues while he was a member of the Government. We understand that, but for the fact that he was presiding over a Department as a member of that Government, he would have revolted concerning these matters long ago—that the Cabinet in which he sat presented one long course of grievance-mongering initiated by him. The House will, I think, welcome this revelation of the unhappy state of the Government so recently deceased, and be glad that the train of events has put an end to the honorable member's political misery in this regard.

Mr. WATSON.—We had similar revelations from the right honorable member for Swan.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There is no doubt that we are only beginning to realize what an unhappy family that Government was.

Mr. WATSON.—The right honorable member for Swan was always in a minority.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We are only beginning to realize how much it is to be desired, in the interests of Cabinet solidarity, that those warring members should not be tied together again.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—What about the coalition Cabinet?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I should imagine that differences in the coalition Government are very mild as compared with the fierce antagonism which prevailed throughout the whole period of the existence of the Government of which the honorable member was a member. I sincerely hope that no coalition Government, which may hereafter be formed, or may be in existence now, will witness this airing of individual grievances at the Cabinet table, and subsequently on the floor of the House. I make these remarks, because time after time, when a member of the Opposition, I belaboured honorable members on the Government side in respect of many of the matters to which the honorable member for Hume has referred. Mr. Sandford's rebate is, I believe, a matter three and a half years old, beginning, as it did, at the outset of the Commonwealth Government; and whoever is responsible—

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am not.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Whoever is responsible, it reflects in the gravest way on the character of the Government that something has not been done to reach finality.

Mr. FISHER.—The case has been sent to the Court now in order to get a decision on the facts.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I was just about to refer to that matter. A week or two ago I saw Mr. Sandford, and he informed me the case was before the Court, and as it is sub judice I suppose we ought not to further discuss it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I did not know the case was before the Court.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member apparently has had no communication with Mr. Sandford very recently. I understand, however, that Mr. Sandford is rather favorable to the present coalition Government.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—This is very amusing. I saw Mr. Sandford last week.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Perhaps the honorable member has heard of the attitude of Mr. Sandford, and hence the honorable member's mysterious development of intense sympathy with the interests of that gentleman. However, I shall say no more since the subject being before the Law Courts is taboo. I think there is a genuine grievance in the matter of the telephone service. In the case referred to by the honorable member for Hume, a man who goes into the post-office at Sydney and desires to telephone to Katoomba, Newcastle, Bathurst, Lithgow, or any place connected with a long-distance line, has to pay not only the schedule charge, but also an initial fee. A parallel case would be that of a man who was charged an initial fee for entering a store before he could either see or buy goods.

Mr. WATSON.—How long has that regulation been in operation?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—It has been in operation ever since the wonderful postal administration of the Commonwealth Government commenced.

Mr. WATSON.—And how long was it in operation previously?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The regulation is something new.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I think the regulation came into operation when the honorable member for Parramatta was Postmaster-General of New South Wales.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member for Eden-Monaro is quite wrong. The honorable member has heard me refer to this matter on numerous occasions during the last three years, and it is very singular that he should only now hazard that guess. But what does it matter how long the regulation has been in operation? The fact remains that before a person can take advantage of the telephone service he has to pay in order to be admitted into the telephone office; and such a regulation ought to be abolished at the earliest possible moment. We ought to remember that the conditions of the telephone and telegraph services have been completely altered since the reduction of the telegraph rates by this Parliament. State messages are now only 9d., while within certain defined districts messages may be sent for 6d.; and that means that where previously it paid a man to send a telephone message it does not pay him to do so now. The efforts of the Department seem to be directed to reducing the competition between the telephone and telegraph services; and that ought not to be. So far as I can see, it is inevitable that telegraphy must be confined more and more to trunk and long distance lines between the various States. Wherever the telephone is introduced and can compete successfully with the telegraph, the competition ought to be permitted; there ought to be no "cutting" between the two services. The present competition acts in a way which will be realized from an instance within my knowledge. Recently several fruit-growing centres in the county of Cumberland, New South Wales, were connected by telephone with the fruit markets in Sydney, but now they are not allowed to telephone unless they pay a fee of 9d. per message. Seeing that they can send a telegram for 6d. the telephone is of little use to them. This is a matter which ought to be looked into; and I urge the Postmaster-General to take some action in regard to this very real grievance.

Mr. MAHON.—Do they not have three minutes' conversation for 9d.?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Yes, they have. But when a fruit-grower uses the telephone he usually wishes to ascertain what is the price of fruit upon the market. If he can get that information for 6d. he prefers to use the telegraph rather than the telephone. The object of allowing the telephones to be used in this way was to give additional advantages. A person ought to be able to obtain the use of the telephone as cheaply as the telegraph. I hope that my honorable friend will look into the matter, and see if he cannot alter a state of things which has already continued too long.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—It has been stated on the best authority that the Treasurer has submitted to the States Treasurers an estimate of the revenue to be received by them from the Commonwealth for the current year. Seeing that this Bill is not to be treated formally, I wish to ask the right honorable gentleman whether he is in a position to state officially the probable amount of revenue for the year. I think that it is only fair, now that the information has been given unofficially, that we should know it from the Treasurer at the earliest possible moment. The right honorable gentleman will agree with me that we are here as representatives, and the sooner we know the facts the better it will be for the States Governments. It will also enable honorable members to make their arrangements accordingly.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN (Eden-Monaro).—On the principle that honorable members should have their grievances redressed before we grant supply, I also desire to bring some facts under the notice of the Postmaster-General. In listening to the speeches of the honorable member for Parramatta and the honorable member for Hume, I, knowing them so well, could understand the reasons which actuated them in the remarks they made. But there are other people who suffer under the present telephone arrangements, and who appear to me to have quite as great a grievance as the persons alluded to by the honorable members. The trouble is brought about by the fact that it has always been held that the Post Office should be run upon a commercial basis, and that before the Department could grant to persons in an isolated portion of New South Wales, or any other State, the telephone facilities that they asked for, there should be a guarantee that the revenue would be sufficient to cover the expenses. There are springing up in various parts of the country new mining settlements, as at Yambulla and Pericoe, where hotels have been erected, where butchers' and bakers' shops thrive, and where people are building dwellings. The fields promise well, but, although repeated applications for telephone facilities have been made, the people are told that unless it can be shown that a telephone will pay from a commercial stand-point, or unless they are prepared to give a guarantee against loss, the work cannot be carried out.

Mr. MAHON.—An election is coming all right!

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I should judge that that is so when I observe how comfortable the honorable member appears to be. All that I can say is, that while I have no desire to run the country to the cost of £50,000 for a general election, I am just as ready to face the people as is the honorable member who interjects. But, to make the grievance under which people in the back-blocks are suffering the sport of parties, is unworthy of us.

Mr. PAGE.—I rise to a point of order. Is the honorable member for Eden-Monaro in order in referring to a general election when he knows how it hurts the feelings of honorable members?

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—The honorable member must know that there is an easy way open to him to prevent the feelings of honorable members being outraged, and their purses being emptied in the manner suggested. I recommend him to take that course if he "feels bad" himself. Apart from that consideration, it is a remarkable circumstance that ex-Ministers who have had opportunities to remedy grievances should stand here and voice the grievances of their constituents. We have, for instance, the honorable member for Parramatta complaining of an arrangement, although he himself is responsible for a good deal of the resulting trouble, because it was inaugurated while he was Postmaster-General in New South Wales.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—No.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—I suppose the honorable member wishes to throw some blame on the honorable member for Macquarie, who is now Postmaster-General, but who has not yet had time to put his house in order. I will give the Postmaster-General this credit—that he has already intimated through the press that he is prepared to regard the matter of conferring telephone facilities from a different stand-point from that from which it was regarded by his predecessors. I believe that that is an intimation which will commend itself to every honorable member. As regards the Sandford matter and the rails that have been mentioned, I think it is time that the whole business was cleared up. I have every hope that something definite will be done. It appears to me to be very hard that a good citizen like Mr. Sandford should be told that he must go to the Court.

Mr. FISHER.—To ascertain facts of the case; that was Mr. Sandford's suggestion.

Mr. REID.—The law of the case.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—It seems to me that people ought not to have to go to the Courts to ascertain the facts of a case. They go to Court to get justice; and we ought not to force good citizens like Mr. Sandford—who has established a very large industry, and gives a considerable amount of employment—to go to Court if we can possibly avoid it. We ought to be anxious to give a man of his type every possible encouragement, but instead of that we appear to be endeavouring to discourage him. In regard to matters that have been alluded to by the honorable member for Hume, I have not much to say. While I was a member of the late Cabinet we were very happy. I should not mind if we were back in office again. I do not think that it is a good thing in our public life that ex-Ministers should bring before this House the worries and troubles that have occurred in Cabinet. If a Minister cannot stand by the acts of his colleagues the best thing he can do is to leave the Cabinet and fight the matter out upon the floor of the House. It is very hard that the people of this country, especially those resident in the back-blocks, should be made the sport of parties—and to a very large extent there can be no doubt that they are now in that position. I hope that when the present storm has blown over the Postmaster-General will take into consideration what has been said with regard to the telephones. We have lately read something in the newspapers with regard to the Pacific cable. We are informed that it entails an annual loss of something like £100,000 a year. Where cables are concerned, there is no question about working them on a commercial basis. I see that the Secretary to the Postmaster-General defends what has been done in regard to the Pacific cable. He says that there is a good reason for incurring the loss of £100,000 a year. But the Department declines to lose £10 a year in extending telephone facilities to people in the back-blocks of Queensland, New South Wales, or Western Australia, and refuses them what they ask for unless it can be shown that it will pay. All that I can say is that that matter ought to be looked into carefully. If the present Postmaster-General would but devote half the time to this matter which he devoted to watching me in this House a little time back, we should soon have an alteration. I trust that the honorable members for Maranoa and Coolgardie are false prophets, and that there is not going to be an election, and I hope that when this little storm is over the Postmaster-General will look into these matters, and will also see that the complaints I have made are dealt with.

Mr. BROWN (Canobolas).—It is very amusing to hear ex-Ministers complaining of the neglect of the Departments over which they have had control. Their experience while in office should be of value to the House now that they are in the cool shade of opposition for a little time. Ever since the Federal authorities took over the control of the Post and Telegraph Department this has been a stock grievance. On almost every application for ways and means this has been the one subject of grievance under consideration. It is strange that the honorable gentlemen who have been in charge of the Department were unable while they had control to rectify the grievances they discovered. Apparently during the time they had control of the Department they sat under them quite contented. I welcome their assistance in debating the subject from our side of the question, and I trust that it will result in the men on the land, and people in the country districts generally, getting some little consideration. I desire to ask the Treasurer whether any provision is made in the measure before us to meet the expenses of the Royal Commission which recently inquired into certain matters which occurred in New Guinea. If such provision is made in the Bill, I should be glad if the right honorable gentleman would inform the Committee as to what was the cost of the Commission. We should have some information upon the subject, and even if the vote for the Commission is not included in this proposal, it will be of some interest and value to the community if the right honorable gentleman will make a statement of its cost.

Mr. MAHON (Coolgardie).—Before the Bill passes, I hope the Ministry will be able to inform the House what is proposed to be done with the classification scheme of the Public Service Commissioner. In some cases the Public Service Commissioner has increased the salaries paid to officials, has transferred others from one grade to another, and in other cases removals are arranged for. I believe that certain post-offices have also been classified into various grades. I should like to know how soon the recommendations will be given effect to, and whether the Government propose to give the House an early opportunity to discuss the classification scheme. In Western Australia the post-offices have all been graded on some plan of which I have never been able to find the principle. I do not agree with the grading there, and I think we should have an early opportunity of considering the whole matter. I hope the Treasurer will tell the Committee whether it is proposed to pay salaries, where there are increases according to the Commissioner's grading, from the date on which his report was laid on the table of the House. I believe it is the anticipation of a large number of public servants that they will receive the increases proposed from the time the report was tabled. I do not wish to say anything concerning the complaints as to telephone and postal facilities, except to express surprise at the remarks of the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, who was whip of the Government which passed the Post and Telegraph Act, and who advocated the section of the Act which compels the Postmaster-General to consider whether any new facilities asked for will pay their way.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member was merely indulging in an exercise of Yes-No.

Mr. MAHON.—I remember distinctly that the honorable member for Parramatta did question the wisdom of that provision when the Bill was going through Committee, but I have no recollection that the honorable member for Eden-Monaro ever said a word against it. The honorable member was the Government whip at the time, and did his utmost to carry the measure as submitted by the Ministry of the day. It is rather late now for the honorable member to come to this House and complain of the officials of the Department for carrying out the law as they find it. The honorable member has not been consistent, except in his inconsistencies, and possibly we may accept his action in this case as being consistent with what has gone before.

Mr. AUSTIN CHAPMAN.—Will the honorable member tell us about his threat about the galvanized iron, and what he was going to do?

Mr. MAHON.—I did not catch what the honorable member said; but if he requires any information from me I shall be able to give him some about the number of futile and unreasonable applications which he has made to the Department since he has been a member of the Federal Parliament. I have some information for the honorable member on that subject whenever he desires it, and in all friendliness I advise him to keep very quiet as to his transactions with the Postal Department. I hope the Government will be able to tell us something about the Public Service Commissioner's classification scheme, the grading of the public servants, and also of various post offices.

Mr. CHANTER (Riverina). — I also wish to say a little about telephones. It appears to me that the cry for economic reform which was taken up by the press and spread throughout Australia paralyzed not only this Government, but preceding Governments to such an extent that they have attempted to go to the other extreme, and have done a great deal to injure the Post and Telegraph Department, which, perhaps more than any other in the Commonwealth, is closely connected with our social life. It is impossible to say on what grounds other than those of false economy this Department can be working. I have one or two instances to bring before the Committee. In one very important centre of a large wheat-growing district for years past a telephone line has been asked for to connect the two towns of Daysdale and Oaklands, which are twelve or thirteen miles apart. The honorable gentleman at the head of the Department very properly says that there is no necessity to be at the expense of erecting telegraph poles where the natural timber as it grows can be utilized, but honorable members will be surprised to hear that the officer employed to prepare estimates for this particular line suggests an expenditure of between £200 and £300. The people are perfectly willing to erect the line if they can only get the permission of the Department to do so, but Minister after Minister has absolutely refused to allow them to do this, except under impossible conditions. I am not blaming one Minister more than another, but the policy of the Department. All through New South Wales post and telegraph offices which have been in charge of efficient officers are being suddenly reduced in status and classed as non-official offices. The officer in charge of a post and telegraph office is withdrawn, an interested person in the town is put in charge of the telephone, and there is absolutely no secrecy for the messages which a trader or farmer or other person may send. Take, for instance, the town of Daysdale, which is situated between Corowa and Jerilderie. Although for very many years its post and telegraph office brought in a large amount of revenue, still a considerable time ago the Department determined that it should be placed in charge of a non-official person. The whole district, by petition and otherwise, has protested against this action. I have protested to the Ministers personally, whom I have also asked by letter to comply with the wishes of the residents, but the request has been absolutely refused. It is intended to place the office in this town in charge of a trader.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Is it carried on at a loss?

Mr. CHANTER.—No; and I sent to the Department a letter, intimating that the rental of the premises would be reduced. The residents of a place meet the Department in every way they can in order that the post and telegraph office should be a paying concern: but the Department seems to have got into a groove from which it cannot be induced to depart. It is determined to establish non-official post and telegraph offices throughout the back portions of the States. I wish to know why certain advantages are being enjoyed by people resident in the cities at the cost of the people living in the back portions of the States; for the latter are being charged with the deficiency in the revenue. A telephone, for instance, was required to connect Warmatta with Berrigan. The residents of Warmatta, not acquainted with the intricacies of the bond drawn up by the Crown Law officers, willingly bound themselves to pay any deficiency on the line. There was an old-established post office at the place, and the Department absolutely came down on those persons, and demanded from them the deficiency on the working of not only the telephone but the post office. These grievances have been represented to the Department times without number. It almost makes one tired to go to the Department; it cannot be persuaded to move.

Mr. PAGE.—Perhaps the Department is tired.

Mr. CHANTER.—The Department is not too tired to do wrong in these matters, or to apply to the residents in the back portions of the States a different policy from that which they apply to those who live under more favoured conditions in the cities of the States. Take again, the difference in the postage; and on this point the Premier of Victoria and the Premier of New South Wales may have something to say. Revenue is being lost to New South Wales, and credited to Victoria. The postage per half-ounce is one penny in Victoria, and twopence in New South Wales. Day after day, letters are sent from Melbourne to towns near the border of New South Wales, and every unfortunate addressee, before he can receive his letter, has to pay a deficient postage of one penny, in addition to a fine of another penny. That grievance ought to be redressed as rapidly as possible. I should think that it could be remedied by adopting a kind of zone system. Then, again, take the services. Although two trains leave Melbourne daily for Echuca, still the mails for Moama and Deniliquin, on the other side of the river, are held in the Echuca post office until about half past two o'clock next day. Under this new-born regulation, although Moama and Deniliquin are distant only 150 and 200 miles respectively from Melbourne, it takes three days before one can get a reply to a communication from Melbourne. Surely it does not need a heaven-born statesman or administrator to grapple with these things quickly, and give some relief to the people concerned. What is the consequence to the border towns? The legitimate revenue of the various post-offices is decreasing, and the classification of the officers is being interfered with, simply because persons take letters across the river and lodge them in Victorian post-offices, in order to secure the benefit of the penny postage. That is not fair or just to the border towns of New South Wales, nor is it economical. This Department, I claim, should not be administered from the point of view of whether the revenue will defray the expenditure. It is intended to meet the convenience of the people of Australia, no matter where they live. I am quite sure that the residents in the cities are quite prepared to bear any little loss which may be incurred, in order to give the residents of the back blocks the convenience of communication, whether by telegram, letter, or telephone. I sincerely trust that the Postmaster-General will strike out a new policy, quite irrespective of departmental traditions, and see that justice is meted out to these people without further delay.

Mr. FULLER (Illawarra).—I had not an opportunity of hearing those honorable members who first discussed the question of telephonic communication, but I can thoroughly indorse the remarks made by the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, and later speakers. I was glad to notice that the Postmaster-General had not been in office very long before he initiated a progressive policy, and proposes, among other changes, to utilize the trees and timber through the various districts where telephones are required by the residents. On different occasions I have had reason to complain of the administration of the post and telegraph office, more particularly in connexion with telephonic matters. I made a complaint once concerning the treatment of an application for telephonic communication to a place in the Camden district, called Yerranderie, at which there is now a fair-sized silver mine, employing a large number of men. It is absolutely necessary to the prosecution of the industry that quick communication should be had with the metropolis. I sincerely trust that the Postmaster-General will carry out his progressive policy in this instance. Hitherto the application has been blocked by reason of the large expense of erecting poles, and the requiring of a large guarantee, the order being that the line should pay from the start. Ever since the Federal Parliament first met I have repeatedly brought before the postal authorities proposals for the extension of telephonic communication to Illawarra, which is one of the most important industrial districts in Australia, containing as it does ten or a dozen coal mines in active work, some large smelting works, and a harbor at Port Kembla, where the State Government has spent thousands of pounds upon breakwaters, and where eventually about £750,000 is to be expended. But when I approached the first Federal Postmaster-General on the subject I was asked for a cash guarantee of £750. Now, what is everybody's business is nobody's business, and people will not put their hands in their pockets to pay these guarantees, although there were, and still are, men who are ready to carry out the work at their own expense if given the opportunity. The giving of telephonic communication to a district without first requiring a guarantee is not without precedent in New South Wales. The telephones from Sydney to Newcastle and from Sydney to Bathurst were erected without expense to the inhabitants of either of the towns named. The Illawarra district has to compete with the Newcastle district in the coal business, and as the Newcastle people were provided with telephonic facilities without guarantee or expense, I think that the Illawarra people should be similarly treated. I trust that the Postmaster-General will, in the interests of an important district, have it connected with the metropolis by telephone at as early a date as is possible.

Mr. PAGE (Maranoa).—I am very sorry indeed that the honorable member for Eden-Monaro has so repeatedly referred to the prospect of an early dissolution and a general election. I, for one, am not desirous of anything of the kind.

Sir GEORGE TURNER.—There is no provision in the Bill for it.

Mr. PAGE.—It is certainly a very strange thing for the Government to be asking for supply when a motion of want of confidence is before the House, though, no doubt, the Minister has no official knowledge of the likelihood of a dissolution. I wish to bring under the notice of the Minister of Trade and Customs the following letter which I have received:—

Chamber of Commerce, Rockhampton, 22nd September, 1904.

Dear Sir,

I have the honour, by direction, to send you a copy of a resolution adopted by my chamber to-day, viz.:—

"That, in the opinion of this chamber, the imposition of duties on market reports, catalogues, price lists, &c., is inimical to the best interests of trade, and a serious obstruction to business, and the Government of the Commonwealth be respectfully asked to reconsider the regulation relating thereto, with a view to its immediate withdrawal."

In transmitting this resolution, I am to say that the chamber find the regulation in its operation is proving a serious obstruction to business, and the resolution has been sent to the Minister of Trade and Customs, Melbourne. I am also directed to ask your support towards securing the withdrawal of this regulation.

I have the honour to be, Dear Sir,

Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) THOMAS PARKER,
Secretary.

Mr. R. EDWARDS.—I got that matter settled a fortnight ago.

Mr. PAGE.—I should like to know from the Minister of Trade and Customs if the regulation which is complained of has been rescinded?

Mr. McLEAN.—Circulars which are clearly in the nature of advertisements are now dutiable, while publications conveying information regarding the state of the Home markets are not.

Mr. PAGE.—I am very pleased that that arrangement has been come to. Advertising matter no doubt should be dutiable, but trade and market reports and catalogues should be free; because it is necessary for our people to have them, in order that they may order what goods they require from the old country. I wish, also, to bring under the notice of the Postmaster-General the differences between the allowances granted to officers of his Department who are located in western Queensland. In one office which I have in my mind, one officer receives less than £100 a year, another £160 a year, and a third £200 a year, while the postmaster gets over £300 and a house to live in.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Are there any official postmasters in the honorable member's electorate who receive only £36 a year?

Mr. PAGE.—No. If a man has been three years in the service of the Commonwealth, and has reached the age of twenty-one years, he is entitled, under the Public Service Act, to a salary of £110 per annum.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I know a case in which a person who has been seven years in the service is not paid that salary.

Mr. PAGE.—Then the right honorable member is neglecting his duty as a representative of Western Australia in not bringing the matter before the House. If such a state of things existed in my electorate, honorable members would have heard about it three or four years ago.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I have been trying for two years to get matters righted.

Mr. PAGE.—The honorable member ought to have done something when he was in a Ministry. The system of which I complain affords another illustration of the proverb about greasing the fat sow. Three of the four men to whom I have referred stay at the same hotel, and pay 25s. a week each for their board, although the man whose salary is less than £100 a year receives only £11 a year in allowances, while the postmaster is given an allowance of £30 a year. Then in another place in my electorate, the line repairer, who is paid less than any other officer in the local office, has a wife and four children, and receives an allowance of £11 a year, while the postmaster, who is a single man, receives an allowance of £30 a year. What fairness is there in such an arrangement? The loaf of bread which the poor man buys costs him as much as is paid by the man who is getting a higher salary. I do not know on what principle these allowances have been fixed, and, although I have repeatedly asked the Department for an explanation, all I can learn is that they have been fixed by regulation, and that when a man's pay is increased his allowance will be increased. But the man who needs a large allowance is the man who is receiving a small salary. I should like to give some of those who have framed the regulations a taste of their own physic. Let them take their wives and children to the back-blocks of Queensland, where the only vegetables they would see would be those which they, if very lucky, grew themselves. Let them experience all the trouble and monotony of a pioneer's life, day after day, month after month, and year after year, and see if they would then think that £11 a year is enough. At any rate, I do not see the fairness of giving one man an allowance of £11, and a fellow-officer an allowance of £30. I am sorry, so far as the motion of want of confidence is concerned, that Mr. Speaker cannot accept the suggestion of the Argus, and take a secret ballot on it, instead of a division of the House. If that were done, there would be an overwhelming majority against it. If it is defeated, I intend to divide the House on the question whether the monstrous regulation to which I have referred should remain unaltered. I hope that the Minister of Home Affairs will bring this matter under the notice of the Public Service Commissioner. It is of no use for me to go to the Commissioner. He would ask me to state a specific case, and then it would be a case of "good-bye" to the officer who made the complaint. Political influence is bad enough, but social influence is worse, and many public servants in western Queensland believe that social influence has brought about the results which are now the cause of complaint. As many honorable members know, the conditions of life up in the Gulf country are not of the most attractive character. The temperature ranges from 112 to 116 degrees in the shade for the greater part of four or five months in the year, and the means of communication are very far from perfect. At the best of times many people receive only one mail a week, and during the drought period they could not rely upon even a weekly service. The mail used to arrive once a fortnight, or once a month, or even less frequently. Men who have to submit to such conditions are deserving of some consideration, and the poorly-paid men are entitled to allowances on a more liberal scale than those granted to more highly-paid servants. I hope that the Minister will confer with the Commissioner with a view to framing regulations which will be more equitable in their operation than those now in force.

Mr. FOWLER (Perth). — I am constrained to swell the chorus of complaints with regard to the management of the Telephone Department. Our telephone arrangements require to be brought up-to-date. In other countries telephone facilities are being extended much more rapidly and at much smaller cost than in our case.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—We are better off than a good many people.

Mr. FOWLER.—There is plenty of room for improvement in Western Australia.

Mr. CONROY.—Is not that the fault of the Act?

Mr. FOWLER.—No. I believe that the administration is at fault, and I shall endeavour to show honorable members that the regulations are sometimes of an unduly rigid character. In my electorate there is a town which has sprung into existence within the last few years, and is rapidly becoming an important business centre. About two miles away there is an older settlement, a quiet little village, to which telephone communication was extended in the good old days when money was abundant, and faithful electors were rewarded for their services by an obliging Administration.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I do not think that was done.

Mr. FOWLER.—I do not think that I am overstating the case. The residents in the smaller town possess all the advantages conferred by a telephone office, whilst the inhabitants of the larger and much more important centre are compelled to pay double rates because it is less than three miles distant from the older settlement. I believe that there is an absolutely rigid rule in the Department that no telephone office shall be established within less than three miles of an existing office. I wish to protest against any rule of this kind. The Department which relies upon such a rule confesses its inability to deal with every case on its merits. Local conditions should be taken into account. The honorable member for Maranoa referred to the question of allowances under the classification scheme of the Public Service Commissioner. I quite agree with his remarks. I would point out, further, that in Western Australia the Public Service Commissioner and his inspectors have totally ignored the local conditions. The scale of payments to public servants in Western Australia is upon practically the same basis as that adopted in the other States. In some respects, perhaps, the Western Australian public servants are worse off in the matter of actual salary, and when local conditions are taken into account they are undoubtedly placed at a great disadvantage. Even under the most favorable conditions—such as obtain in the coastal settlements—the cost of living is at least 25 per cent. higher than in the centres of population in the eastern States. That is a matter which should receive consideration at the hands of the Commissioner. I hope that if the Government survive the present crisis they will afford honorable members an early opportunity to criticise the proposals of the Commissioner, which require to be very closely examined. The officers of the various Departments are precluded from offering criticisms, but I have received a formidable number of complaints, which, for the most part, seem to be reasonable, and I hope that an opportunity will be given for their further consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON (Lang).—I am glad that this discussion has taken place upon the question of the establishment of telephonic communication, even though it may, to some extent, anticipate debate upon a motion dealing with the same subject, which I had placed upon the business-paper. I have frequently had occasion to draw attention to the need which exists for providing telephonic facilities in my own electorate, and ever since I have been a member of this Parliament I have been endeavouring to secure the establishment of a telephone office at a place called Miranda. As evidencing the difficulties which are placed in the way of reasonable telephonic extension, I may mention that Miranda is distant from Sydney only about thirteen miles. Under the existing system, city and suburban rates are charged within a radius of ten miles of the metropolis. Beyond that distance a special charge is levied. In some instances, however, the ten-miles limit is exceeded without any extra charge being imposed. I know of one line which extends twelve and a half miles from Sydney, and upon which the city and suburban rates are charged. In the case of Miranda, an additional half-mile only would require to be covered. I obtained a guarantee of twenty subscribers from residents in the vicinity, provided that they could obtain telephonic communication at the city and suburban rates. Although the local post-office is situated within a few hundred yards of a private telephone wire, I have been unable to obtain that brief extension during the whole time that I have occupied a seat in this House. Unfortunately, it has been customary for previous Postmasters-General to rely too much upon the reports of the departmental officers without taking the trouble to personally investigate individual applications, and to deal with them upon their merits. The trouble with departmental officers is that, whenever they are called upon for reports, they base their estimates upon the most elaborate schemes imaginable. I am glad that in the present Postmaster-General, we have a practical man of keen common sense and business ability, who is prepared to disregard these elaborate reports, and to so utilize existing facilities as to provide cheap telephonic communication wherever it is possible to do so. In the case of Miranda, notwithstanding that I had obtained a guarantee of twenty subscribers, upon the basis of the city and suburban rates, the departmental officer reported, as the result of his investigation, that there would not be half-a-dozen calls a week there, although the locality is thickly populated. When I tell honorable members that it is a place which is visited by hundreds of people every week, upon the very face of it his report is absurd. I trust that when the Estimates-in-Chief are under consideration, provision will be made for telephonic extension, and for giving effect to a cheaper system than that which has been hitherto adopted.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON (Capricornia).—I have received a resolution from the Rockhampton Chamber of Commerce, similar to that to which the honorable member for Maranoa has directed attention. It reads—

That in the opinion of this Chamber the imposition of duties on market reports, catalogues, price lists, &c., is inimical to the best interests of trade, and a serious obstruction to business, and the Government of the Commonwealth should be respectfully asked to reconsider the regulation relating thereto, with a view to its immediate withdrawal.

In my opinion it is absolutely monstrous that any tax whatever should be imposed upon market reports and catalogues, which are intended to encourage trade in the country. I would urge the Minister of Trade and Customs to withdraw the particular regulation dealing with these publications.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I desire to direct attention to what I conceive to be a gross injustice, resulting from the stringent manner in which the regulations of the Postal Department are administered. At Paddington, Brisbane, a telegraph employé was entitled to six months' leave of absence on full pay. This leave was granted to him; but, owing to departmental requirements, he continued to discharge his duties, and in the interim was attacked with an illness to which he succumbed. His widow, very naturally, applied to the Department for the salary represented by his six months' leave of absence. The Department, however, in its iron-bound way, replied, "Oh he is not now a member of the service, and we cannot help you." I claim that it will be an outrage if nothing is done for this poor woman.

Mr. SKENE (Grampians).—It seems to me a matter of regret that the Postmaster-General has not been longer in office, so that we might criticise him more severely in respect to many of these matters. It is a remarkable thing that, whenever a Government attempts to conduct its Departments upon commercial lines, it does so in the most cast-iron fashion. It seeks to make an absolute profit upon everything, whereas, whenever a business house wishes to expand its operations, it is usually content for a time to sustain a loss. I have even heard of a business in Melbourne, in which £1,000 per annum was lost in one department, but made up in another department; and in departing from more elastic methods of this description, officers under Government control make a very great mistake. The justification for Government management is the opportunity it presents to develop the country. Conveniences given to people in country districts have the effect of gathering population; and in some of the later discovered wheat areas of Victoria. I know, from my own experience, that there is a considerable trouble in obtaining proper postal facilities. I frequently have applications made to me in this regard, but the conditions are so strict and strange that, in some cases, the people cannot understand them. In many cases there may be applications from places which are not likely to extend, but wherever there seems to be a likelihood of growth, the system of guarantees might be done away with. Sums of £5 to £20 seem somewhat large to very small collections of people, but amount to little in the working of a big department; and if a great undertaking pays on the whole, it ought not to be expected to pay in every little detail. I merely voice the opinions expressed around me in this regard; and I know that the present conditions, if they are not arousing great dissatisfaction, are regarded by the people as pin pricks, resulting from a pennywise and pound-foolish method of business. Most of these matters we know will right themselves; big rivers are made up by little rivulets, and we cannot expect a postal system in small outlying places to pay from the outset. But if, as I say, the whole system pays, we might very well be liberal to people who live far out in the country. That is the spirit in which the Post Office should be administered; we should not wait until there is sufficient population to make a service pay. People could, under such conditions, see to the mail service for themselves. In my own young days I have had to carry the mails from station to station. I hope, however, we have got beyond those primitive conditions. Only to-day a case was brought under my notice in which people in an outlying district are asked for a guarantee of £20, and there are many similar instances. I am glad to hear that the Postmaster-General is prepared to take a liberal view of the matter, and if he does so he will give great satisfaction to the people of the Continent.

Mr. MALONEY (Melbourne).—I desire to bring under the notice of the Treasurer the fact that, in answer to a deputation a short time ago, a distinct promise was given by the Premier of Victoria, and by the Prime Minister, that overtime would be abolished in the Government Printing Office. I understand that, so far as the State Government are concerned, overtime has been stopped, but that under the Federal Government men are working twelve and fourteen hours a day. In view of the dearth of employment amongst compositors, whose calling has almost been removed from the category of trades, owing to the invention of the linotype, such a system is all the more unjustifiable. I ask the Treasurer to, as far as possible, see that no overtime is worked, at all events in Victoria, where the register of the Government Labour Bureau shows that many people are in want of employment. I should like to take an early opportunity to say that, when the Military Estimates are under consideration, I shall give my vote for such an increase of expenditure as will make the coal resources of the sister State of New South Wales absolutely secure. In military matters, when nation fights nation, coal is almost more valuable than powder and shot. We know how helpless Australia would be if our coal resources ever got into the hands of an enemy, and with the "yellow peril"—that terrible evil which threatens Australia more than it can any European country—we ought to take early steps in order to make ourselves secure in this regard. I am sorry to say that, in the Postal Department, one of the most infamous systems of sweating was brought under the notice of the House, but, thanks to the late Postmaster-General, the subletting of contracts has, I believe, been permanently stopped. In order that there may be no doubt about the matter, I trust the Treasurer will represent to his colleague, the Postmaster-General, that it is absolutely necessary that the men who do the work of carrying the mails of Australia shall be adequately paid, and not robbed, as they have been in too many cases in the past. In the case of the mail from Yarra Glen to Torlangi, the pittance which was offered to the contractor was an insult to an intelligent man. As to the telephones, I do not think the expressions used by honorable members can fail to influence the Postmaster-General in making some change in the management. With a nationalized system of telephones, such large sums ought not to be demanded. In Sweden and Norway telephones of the highest type are supplied at a cost immeasurably less than that charged in any of the Australian capitals. Another ground of complaint worthy of attention is that the officers who look after the compilation of the rolls—and this may be most interesting to us all in a few short weeks—are at the beck and call of their superiors in the Postal Department. An officer may be in the midst of the work of making up a roll, and yet he may be transferred to another place; and I have heard of a case in which such an officer, who, I may say, is unknown to me personally, was shifted without rhyme or reason by a superior official, who, I am credibly informed, has an animus against myself. In this case wrong information was given in three separate instances—as, for instance, the date the officer left—but I do not desire to refer further to the matter or to get any one into trouble. I do not know what may be taking place in the other States, but I know that in Victoria officers engaged in compiling the rolls may, at the behest of a superior officer in the Department, be compelled to leave the work half finished. I need say no more, because I believe the Minister is devoting some attention to this matter, and I hope that the result will prove more beneficial in the matter of the rolls than has the administration in the past.

Mr. WEBSTER (Gwydir).—I do not rise for the purpose of merely re-echoing the sentiments which have been given expression to by various country representatives in connexion with the troubles of the people who have to eke out an existence on the arid lands of a large portion of the Commonwealth. Unless we give some postal conveniences to people who are building up this country for those who are to follow—unless we, in the initiatory stages, give them some encouragement, so that they may successfully settle on the soil—we shall be lacking in our duty to those who are engaged in this valuable work. The postal, telegraphic, and telephonic system is practically the nerve centre of our commercial and social life; there is no doubt it has more to do with bringing men together in all the affairs of life than has any other convenience, either of the State or of the Commonwealth. And because so much depends upon the expedition with which this service is rendered, consideration should be given to the people who live in the country districts. As to the system which the Postmaster-General now proposes to extend, I have very grave doubts whether his idea will be successful in practice. I fear that the life of the wires would be very much shortened by bush fires and other destructive agencies which prevail in the country districts if they were put upon trees through the bush. Apart from that consideration, it is absolutely essential that the regulations which appertain to the extension of telephones in the sparsely-populated portions of Australia should be liberalized. But it is generally known that the right honorable gentleman who at present occupies the office of Treasurer insists upon conducting affairs of this kind on a strictly financial basis. I do not blame him altogether. But still, it is idle to talk of liberalizing the telephone system while we have at the Treasury, a gentleman who is well known to be so tight fisted. Whilst his policy may be beneficially applied to most of the services of the Commonwealth, there are cases such as that with which we are now dealing to which reasonable consideration should be applied, having in view the fact that the extension of facilities would benefit not only the people concerned, but also, indirectly, the Commonwealth as a whole. The present system of administration has surprised people in the country districts. Before the establishment of the Commonwealth, they had not the same difficulty in obtaining consideration to their requests, simply because the people who administered the law in the States understood the difficulties, and knew the advantages that would accrue to the State from a liberal administration. It has been stated that in other countries the telephone service has been cheapened. That is a fact. No one can deny that in England, in Germany, and in Sweden, the people get cheaper telephonic communication than we have in Australia. But the reason for that has not been given. It has been found, from experience, that the system which prevails in Australia to-day is not a sound one. In the countries I have mentioned, what is called the toll system has been inaugurated. A person having a telephone is allowed to make so many calls per annum at a given price, but for every call over and above the specified number a toll is charged, equivalent, we will say, to a penny for each call. By that means, those who use the telephone very largely are made to pay for the use which they get from the instrument, and the authorities are thereby enabled to grant concessions to those who do not require to use the instrument to such an extent. At the present time, I am authoritatively informed, a great expenditure is necessitated by the large number of frivolous messages that are passed along the telephone wires by gossiping persons—either men or women—who happen to have telephones on their premises, which they use for the purpose of arranging visits, sending invitations, and chatting with their friends. Under the toll system, such persons would get the full value for their money; but for every message that they sent along the wires, over and above the specified number, they would be required to make a payment at a very low toll. By the adoption of that system, a great deal of the time of the switch operators that is now occupied in attending to persons who desire to send frivolous messages would be saved. At the present time we have Mrs. Jones sending a telephone message to Mrs. Kilpatrick, who lives in the same street, telling her that her daughter is coming along by-and-by. Messages of that kind increase the cost of administration by reason of the time of the switch attendants being taken up, and inconvenience persons who desire to use the telephone for what may be regarded as more useful purposes. The present system prevents the use of the telephone expeditiously by business people for business purposes. I am perfectly well aware that a system such as I recommend would not be viewed with favour by the large business houses, but it must be remembered that every message that a business man sends across the telephone probably saves him what he would otherwise have to spend upon a telegram sent at the price stipulated by the regulations. When they get the telephone they consider they are entitled to unlimited use of it at a minimum of cost. I say that the same principle should be applied by the Department; there should be a liberal concession with regard to the number of messages which might be sent for a given sum, but for all above that number a toll should be imposed, if it is to be possible for us to give effect to the desire expressed by honorable members who have already spoken to extend to the people in remote parts of the Commonwealth these conveniences of civilization. The honorable members for Hume and Riverina have spoken of the irritation arising under the penny postage system existing in Victoria in connexion with letters transmitted to people just over the border. I see no immediate remedy for that. I think that of all the Departments of the State the Post and Telegraph Department is the one that should not be run on a commercial basis. It should be administered on a practical business-like basis, due regard being paid to the service which is to be rendered to the people. I am of opinion that the time is not far distant when we should adopt an Inter-State penny postage system. That will be the only cure for the disabilities existing as between Victoria and the other States.

Mr. PAGE.—Where are we going to raise the revenue from?

Mr. WEBSTER. — That is a question which I did not expect my honorable friend to trouble about. I have no doubt that the Treasurer will provide the money if honorable members will pass the necessary measure to give effect to Inter-State penny postage. I think that this is a concession which might well be expected from the Commonwealth Government in addition to cheaper telephonic communication. I am aware that the adoption of such a system would result in a loss of revenue if the matter is considered from the point of view of £ s. d. But if considered from the stand-point of the settlement of people upon the land, and the providing of facilities which will tend to build up the great Commonwealth we all desire to see established, there can be no doubt that the adoption of such a system would result in distinct advantage. The Prime Minister who met this Parliament, the honorable gentleman who succeeded him, and, I believe, also the present Prime Minister, are agreed that the States Governments should bring in some kind of land legislation which would better attain the settlement of the people on the land than past legislation has done. I direct the attention of the present Prime Minister to the fact that a new Government has recently assumed office in New South Wales, and since they are anxious to bring about reform and an amendment of the law, we might advantageously make an appeal to them in the interests of closer settlement and the populating of the Commonwealth. I therefore ask the right honorable gentleman to enter into correspondence with the Premier of New South Wales, asking him to induce his land Minister to adopt a rational progressive system in place of the retrogressive system he has formulated and placed before the people of that State. If the system at present proposed by the Government of New South Wales is carried out all our talk on this subject will be of no avail. I hope that the present Postmaster-General, of whom so much is expected, will take into consideration the whole question of telephonic communication. I hope that the honorable gentleman will consider the report which has been formulated by a conference of the officers of his Department, indicating a proper commercial method of administering the telephone service. I do not desire now to delay honorable members by making quotations from the report, but at some later period I shall go into the matter more fully, believing, as I do, that what is suggested would be the means of relieving the Minister of numerous applications which it is impossible for him to grant, and also of relieving honorable members generally of persistent applications by constituents to secure telegraphic and telephonic extensions.

Mr. WILKINSON (Moreton).—I have no desire to delay the passage of the motion, but there are one or two little matters to which I should like to direct attention. I do not think that this is either the time or the place in which to ventilate individual grievances. I suppose that almost every member of the Committee could refer to a number of such grievances, but I have always found Ministers and the Public Service Commissioner also ready to listen to matters of that kind, and the departmental offices are the places in which to ventilate such matters, unless they affect large bodies of men, when I think an honorable member is justified in directing the attention of the House as well as of the Minister to them. I must pay my tribute of commendation to what I think is a step in the right direction, taken by the honorable gentleman now at the head of the Post and Telegraph Department, in making a legitimate endeavour to cheapen the means of communication in the country districts by a modern system. I sometimes think that we attach too much importance to the £ s. d. aspect of the question, and lose sight of the indirect advantages to be gained by making life in the country districts more attractive. It has become customary for politicians to speak of "settling people on the land," but one of the effects of the policy which has obtained in nearly all of the States in the past has been to settle people in the land. Those who have, in the first instance, gone out into the country districts to develop them have worked themselves to death, with but very little return for their labour. It is the people who come after them who reap the benefits of their pioneering efforts. Although there may be some little direct loss on the working of the great Departments which tend to make the conditions of life in the country better, there is an indirect gain which more than counterbalances that loss. If we make the conditions of life of people who go into isolated and remote districts better and more comfortable than they have been made in the past, there will be inducements to the rising generation to go into those districts, and we shall not find so many of them desiring to secure appointments in the Railway Department, the Police Force, and the other public Departments. I suppose that one of the greatest hardships of a member of the Commonwealth, or of a State Parliament, is to have to deal with the number of applications which are made to him to secure employment for some person in the State or Commonwealth Departments. The reverse of that should be the case. The greater attraction should be in the direction of country occupation. The rule that applies in business should be applied in dealing with this matter. If a man has a small business, and a monopoly of a certain line, he may demand what profit he likes, but if he wishes to build up a business with a large number of customers, he will be guided by the old adage, of "small profits and quick returns." Once the spirit of travelling is induced, persons who otherwise would not travel, will be tempted to make many journeys. Introduce a country youth or maiden to the attractions of Melbourne or some other city, and the visit will be repeated. If conveniences for the people are provided, and they are accustomed to the use of them, they will command an increasing number of patrons. And so I think it will be with the telephone system. The Postmaster-General is considering a very wise proposal, namely, to connect various centres by cheap lines with remote districts. When an application is made for telephonic or telegraphic communication from a centre to an outlying district, a guarantee is asked from those persons who reside in the immediate neighbourhood of the proposed convenience, although they are not the only persons who will benefit from its establishment. Supposing that, on its own application, Roma, say, situated at a distance of 300 miles to the westward, is connected with Brisbane; it is not Roma alone which benefits from the connexion, because Brisbane also benefits. Yet a guarantee is asked from only the persons who are located immediately round the centre from which the application is received. Railway communication with a country district benefits not only that country district, but also the terminus with which it has been connected. If a line connects several parts which are benefited by it, why should not the residents of those places be asked to join with the applicants in the guarantee? That result can be achieved by making the expense of the line a tax upon the whole community, instead of upon the very few persons who ask for the convenience. Once the convenience has been used, an ever-increasing number of users will be found, and although the return from each subscriber may be smaller than it is, still in the aggregate the return will be very much larger. That is, I think, the way to make the Department pay. Several honorable members have referred to the difference between the charge for a telephonic message, and the charge for a telegraphic message. They have lost sight of the fact that when a man pays a fee of ninepence for speaking through the telephone for three minutes, he pays for the reply as well as the message, so that a fair comparison cannot be made without including the sum of sixpence for the reply to a telegram. The charges for telephonic communication are too high. By lowering them the volume of business would be increased to a very great extent, and in the aggregate a larger revenue would be derived from that branch. In some country districts, especially across the great plains, where a tree is not to be seen for perhaps fifty or sixty miles, wooden or iron posts are necessary. But in the coastal districts of Queensland, and, I believe, of New South Wales, the idea of the Postmaster-General could be carried out very well. It has been urged that a considerable amount of supervision would be required, in consequence of bush fires occurring, and wild animals running against the wires, and breaking the circuit. As far as the eastern part of Australia is concerned, I do not think that there is very much in that objection. If the suggested plan is carried out, many places which under the guarantee system are cut off from communication with centres of population will be able to obtain these conveniences. I shall have another opportunity to discuss this question fully when we reach the Estimates if a dissolution does not take place in the meantime. I wish to bring a matter under the notice of the Minister of Defence. There is a misapprehension existing in the minds of a good many members of rifle clubs with regard to the issue of the new magazine rifles. A regulation has been made whereby a member of a rifle club may obtain one of these rifles as his own property. If a man pays £1 annually for three years, and makes himself efficient, no further payment is required; but if he is not efficient he is required to pay a further sum of 15s. 9d. I know that the supply of these rifles has been somewhat limited, but there is an impression in the minds of many men that only one rifle is available for purchase to each club. Three rifles have been sent to each club in Queensland, and in some cases have been supplied to the officers—the president, vice-president, and secretary. It is thought that because the rifles have been issued to the club, the officers are entitled to the use of them. I take it that it was intended by the Department that any member of a rifle club should be allowed to use the rifles. Unless a rifle is in charge of one man, and is well taken care of, it will be worth little at the end of twelve months. In my opinion, the officers of a rifle club are wise in keeping these rifles under their own supervision rather than allowing any member of the club to use them at his own sweet will. I would point out to the Minister that if he would allow the members of the rifle clubs to purchase their own rifles, a valuable Defence Force would be armed, not at the cost of the Department, but at the cost of private individuals, and an immense sum would be saved. If a man does very much shooting, the barrel of his rifle will be practically worn out at the end of three years, and I understand that a new barrel can be put on the old stock at a cost of from 15s. 6d. to £1 1s. If the rifle clubs were supplied with rifles, the barrels would require to be renewed at the end of three years, and that would create a further charge on the Department. But if every member of a rifle club were to own his own rifle, he would defray the cost of renewing the barrel. I should like the Minister to seriously consider what saving might be effected in that branch of the Defence Force. I think it will be an important part of the Defence Force when Australia's hour of need arises.

Mr. McCAY.—It has begun to cost a good deal of money, and that shows that it is getting on.

Mr. WILKINSON.—If the Commonwealth has to supply every man who is willing to go to its defence, with a rifle, it will cost a lot more. But if it is made possible for thousands of rifle club men to buy their own rifles, a saving will be effected, not only in the first instance, but when the time comes for renewing the barrels. Tens of thousands of men will be induced to buy their own rifles, and so reduce the cost of defending the Commonwealth.

Mr. DAVID THOMSON.—Will they do that?

Mr. WILKINSON.—I am satisfied that thousands of them are prepared to buy their own rifles. I have a few matters to bring under the Minister of Trade and Customs' notice. I wish to remove a misapprehension which has existed for a considerable time with regard to the reduction of the duty upon timber which is largely used in the manufacture of butter boxes. Some reflection has been cast on the honorable member for Maranoa, because of a vote which he gave when that item in the Tariff was under consideration. It is well known to a good many honorable members, that the imposition of a lower duty was carried against the Government by a majority of one vote, through a mistake on the part of the honorable member for Mernda. The honorable member for Maranoa has been blamed considerably for that decision; but the fact is that the lower duty was carried through a mistaken vote of the honorable member for Mernda, who had intended to vote the other way. New Zealand has put an export duty upon timber such as has hitherto been used in Victoria for the manufacture of butter boxes, and the Victorians are therefore turning their attention to Queensland as a source of supply. The representatives of that State assured them when the Tariff was under consideration that in Queensland there is an unlimited supply of timber superior to that which has been obtained from New Zealand. The matter is now occupying the attention of the Government of Queensland, and I ask the Minister for Trade and Customs to meet sympathetically any proposal which they may make, with a view to bring about the use of Queensland pine for the manufacture of the butter boxes used in the Victorian export trade. It would be a big thing for the Commonwealth if that timber were so used, because there is an unlimited supply of it. At the present time all the butter which is exported from Queensland is packed in boxes made of Queensland pine, and although it is not bringing in the London market prices as high as are obtained for Victorian butter, that is due to the fact that Queensland needs a proper dairying Act, and a proper system of grading before exportation. I have corresponded with all of the leading Queensland butter manufacturers on the subject, and I have placed most of their replies on record in Hansard. They say that, although in times of drought, when it has been impossible to bring timber to the mills, they have imported New Zealand timber, as soon as supplies of the local and northern New South Wales pine were available, they have used it again, a fact which shows that in their opinion it is more suitable than the imported pine. I am sufficiently a protectionist to believe that when we can give preference to a local natural product, or a product which is partly natural and partly artificial, we should do so. A very large business in Queensland pine could be developed if its use were encouraged, and in this way a good deal of the friction between the State and the Commonwealth which has been engendered during the last few years might be removed. Unfortunately the States are beginning to think that the legislation and administration of the Commonwealth has been inimical to their interests, and it is about time that we showed them that the contrary is the case, and that we are more than willing to work hand in hand with them in the development of the resources of the Continent.

Mr. SYDNEY SMITH (Macquarie—Postmaster-General).—Most of the matters to which reference has been made by honorable members arose before I took office, but I shall give early attention to them. I shall have a summary made of the complaints which are recorded in Hansard, and cause full inquiries to be instituted in regard to them. I am very pleased that the proposal which I put forward the other day, to use fences and trees for the support of telephone wires, in order to give the people in the country districts cheaper telephonic communication, has received such favourable notice from honorable members. When I took office I found a large number of applications for telephonic communication from country districts awaiting action; but the cost of procuring and erecting poles would, in many districts, be so large as to make it impossible for the Department to do what is asked. In some cases the erection of poles would cost as much as £20 a mile. Moreover, if it were found that the line did not pay, it would not be worth while to remove those poles to other places, so that the loss to the Department would be very heavy. If, however, the wire was supported on trees and fences, the expense of erecting it would be very little, and should the line prove unprofitable the wire could be removed to another district without much loss to the Department. I have, therefore, given directions in the cases which have come under my notice that they be referred back to ascertain the possibility of utilizing trees and fences for the carriage of the wire, and when they are again reported upon I shall do what I can, having regard to the public interest, to give communication to those who are asking for it. I am fully aware of the disadvantages under which country people live. It is, for instance, impossible in many cases for them to procure a daily paper containing market reports and other information necessary for the proper carrying on of their business, while, should sickness occur, it is difficult for them to obtain the services of a medical man. Therefore, if cheaper means of providing telephonic communication can be devised, I shall do all I can to give outlying districts the advantage of them. I shall also endeavour to impress upon the residents of country districts the need of assisting the Department in the matter of supervision. If an inspector has to be sent some fifty miles from a centre of population to supervise the erection of telephone wires and their maintenance, the cost is considerable; but I feel sure that in many districts the residents themselves will be only too pleased to undertake this work and the erection of the wires at a cheap rate. It should also be possible for the Department to instruct them in the manner of repairing wires, so that if a circuit were broken by the fall of a tree through a bush fire, the trouble could easily be set right. With regard to other matters of administration, although the honorable member for Gwydir says that he expects great things from me, I do not profess to be any better than my predecessors, but I shall do the best I can to give every facility to people both in the country and in the cities in their dealings with the Department, so that its operations may be as beneficial as possible to the Commonwealth at large. I further promise that any matters which honorable members bring under my notice shall receive my personal attention.

Mr. McCAY (Corinella—Minister of Defence).—The honorable member for Moreton asked a question with regard to the magazine rifles issued to members of rifle clubs. Such weapons can be obtained in three ways. Last November authority was given for the sale of 750 magazine rifles to members of rifle clubs for cash at £3 15s. 9d. each, and of that number a proportion was allotted to Queensland. No great advantage was taken of the opportunities presented to acquire these weapons for cash. In March last authority was given for the sale of a further 1,000 magazine rifles to members of rifle clubs, upon the deferred payment system referred to by the honorable member for Moreton. Of this number 100 were allotted to Queensland. The opportunities thus presented have been availed of with a fair amount of freedom. I propose to inquire what number of rifles have been sold under the cash system, and if the circumstances justify the transfer I shall add the rifles for which cash purchasers are not forthcoming to those which are being offered under the deferred payment system, which is preferred for very obvious reasons. Perhaps we all have a sufficient element of the Micawber spirit in us to lead us to prefer paying twelve months hence rather than forthwith. Besides the rifles to which I have referred, 2,910 magazine rifles are being issued to the rifle clubs on loan, the clubs finding guarantors that the rifles shall be properly looked after, and that any damage resulting from misuse or neglect shall be paid for. Of the 2,910 rifles 320 have been allotted to Queensland. The intention is that the rifles issued to the clubs on loan shall be available to all the members, notwithstanding the obvious objection that they will thereby become more liable to damage than if they were placed in charge of particular individuals. It was never intended that the president, vice-president, and secretary of a club should, by virtue of their offices, appropriate the only three rifles sent. Honorable members will see that we must retain a sufficient number of magazine rifles under the immediate control of the Department to provide for the equipment of our first line of defence upon a war footing. Five thousand additional rifles have been ordered, and will shortly be delivered. The first 1,000 are on their way out here now.

Mr. MALONEY.—Does the Minister know that the Victorian Government was swindled in connexion with the rifles sent to them?

Mr. McCAY.—The rifles on order are the new short barrelled magazine rifles now being used in the British Army, and I do not think that there can be any swindle in connexion with them.

Mr. MALONEY.—But the Minister did not make any inquiry?

Mr. McCAY.—I think we may leave all matters of ancient history and mythology for discussion during the want-of-confidence debate. I am merely telling the honorable member of the existing circumstances. When these additional rifles come to hand, I shall—if I am on hand myself—probably be able to supply some more weapons for use by members of rifle clubs. I desire to offer them every facility. That is all the information which I have been able to obtain on the short notice given me this afternoon, and I trust that it will satisfy the honorable member.

Motion (by Sir GEORGE TURNER) agreed to—

That the Standing Orders be suspended in order to enable all steps to be taken to obtain Supply, and to pass a Supply Bill through all its stages without delay.

In Committee of Ways and Means:

Motion (by Sir GEORGE TURNER) proposed—

That towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty for the services of the year ending 30th June, 1905, a sum not exceeding £430,421 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay). — I should like to know if the Treasurer has any objection to furnish the House with the information for which I asked at an earlier stage?

Sir GEORGE TURNER (Balaclava—Treasurer).—I cannot possibly do as the honorable member desires. The only information I have given to the Treasurers has been in regard to the approximate amount of surplus they are likely to receive during the current financial year.

Mr. FISHER.—That is quite right.

Sir GEORGE TURNER. — I thought that I could not do less, in view of the fact that the first three months of the year had practically elapsed, and that the Treasurers were pressing me to give them some idea as to what they might expect to receive back from the Commonwealth. If, however, I had given them any further information as to the anticipated receipts and expenditure, I should have supplied them with a forecast of the Budget statement, and I do not think that that would have been in order. The Treasurers have been told as nearly as possible the amounts that they are likely to receive from the Commonwealth, and upon that information they will be able to base their estimates for the year.

Mr. FISHER (Wide Bay).—I quite agree with the action of the Treasurer; but I think that this is the proper place in which a public announcement should be made regarding the matter. The right honorable gentleman is to be congratulated upon having advised the Treasurers as soon as possible with regard to the approximate revenue they are likely to receive.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

Resolution reported and adopted.

Ordered—

That Sir George Turner do prepare and bring in a Bill to carry out the foregoing resolutions.

Bill presented by Sir GEORGE TURNER, and passed through all its stages.

PAPER.

Mr. DUGALD THOMSON laid upon the table the following paper:—

Return as to temporary employés in the Public Service during the year 1903-4.

MOTION OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Debate resumed from 23rd September (vide page 4916), on motion by Mr. WATSON —

That the present Administration does not possess the confidence of this House.

Mr. RONALD (Southern Melbourne).—I propose to first address myself to the question raised by the right honorable member for Swan, as to the principle of preference to unionists being embodied in the Conciliation and Arbitration Acts passed by the States. The right honorable gentleman has affirmed that preference to unionists was not provided for in the Western Australian Act, and that, therefore, he is not guilty of any inconsistency in claiming to be the pioneer of conciliation and arbitration legislation in Western Australia, and at the present juncture opposing preference to unionists. I am sorry that the right honorable member is not present. That, however, is not my fault. I have taken the trouble to examine this matter very closely, so as to make sure of the ground upon which I stand. The position is that the Western Australian Arbitration Act is modelled upon the New Zealand Act. That was admitted by the right honorable member for Swan, when, as Premier of the Western State, he submitted his Bill to Parliament. In delivering judgment in an appeal by the plumbers of Christchurch, New Zealand, Chief Justice Stout said—

In construing this Act, the aim of the statute cannot be ignored. It does not, as I have said, propose to provide a means of settling disputes between employers and non-associated workmen.

I am of opinion that the Court, having power to determine the status of workmen and the class of persons to be employed, has power to declare that trades unionists shall have a preference over workmen not belonging to a trades union.

The opinion therefore is clearly held—not only by Chief Justice Stout, but by his colleagues, whose judgments are recorded in the same volume from which I have quoted—that preference to unionists, by implication, is embodied in the New Zealand Act. There can, therefore, be no doubt whatever, that preference to unionists is contained by implication in the Western Australian Act. That conclusion has been acted upon by the New Zealand Court, a tribunal which is altogether above any bias of which we may be suspected. Upon the other hand, I must admit that the Western Australian Supreme Court has declared that preference to unionists is not contained in the Act. That decision, however, was arrived at subsequent to the judgment given by the New Zealand Court; and when the right honorable member for Swan, as head of the Western Australian Government, submitted the first Conciliation and Arbitration Bill there, he did so under the impression that it contained the principle of preference to unionists. Again I say that he is grossly inconsistent, in that he attempted to make the Western Australian Bill workable by granting a preference to unionists, whereas he is now endeavouring to render the Commonwealth Conciliation and Arbitration Bill null and void by destroying that very principle. If he objects to my deductions, I will point to parallels which confirm my argument that a principle to be contained in a Bill does not require to be definitely expressed upon its face. In support of that statement, I would cite one of the most interesting illustrations contained in history. I will illustrate what I mean by the great doctrine of the Christian theology. The doctrine of the Trinity, for example, is held by all Christian nations. It has been affirmed by all Courts of law to which an appeal has been made—and there have been many such cases—that that doctrine is embodied in Biblical theology. Yet we may search the Bible throughout, and we shall find no trace of it. It was first referred to in the time of Tertullian. It is implied in the teaching of the Scriptures. It has never been disputed that it is contained in the Scriptures, and yet it is never specifically mentioned there. Similarly, I contend that in the New South Wales Arbitration Act, the principle of extending a preference to unionists is contained. The same remark is applicable to both the Western Australian and the New Zealand Acts; but in the latter the principle has been substantiated and made visible by the decision of the Supreme Court. The right honorable member for Swan must have known that, because the Bill which he introduced was a slavish copy of the New Zealand Act—a piece of political plagiarism. In following the New Zealand statute, he must have known that he was granting a preference to unionists, and, therefore, it ill becomes him, at this hour, to turn round and declare that we are endeavouring to place him in a false position. He wishes to make it appear that he is a paragon of consistency, and that he is still the champion of Conciliation and Arbitration. We are all pleased to know that he has been a pioneer of advanced socialistic legislation. I have simply to say facilis descensus avernii—it is easy to descend. Evil communications corrupt good manners; and, therefore, he has gone down very rapidly. If ever the right honorable member had any leaning towards labour, or any sympathy with the working classes, he seems now to have abandoned it, and to have abandoned it for ever. I maintain that what I stated outside the House was perfectly correct, and I repeat that statement without fear of contradiction. There was, it is true, a slight inaccuracy in the report, which represented me as saying that the right honorable member had declared that preference to unionists was the basic principle of the Arbitration Bill; whereas, it was I who affirmed that preference to unionists was the basic principle of the Bill, and that the right honorable member, in following the New Zealand Act, had wittingly, or unwittingly, incorporated that principle in the measure which he introduced into Western Australia. The right honorable member must know that I have treated him fairly, and have not taken advantage of any quibble. Again, I affirm, without fear of contradiction, that, by implication, preference is given in the New Zealand Act, and the Western Australian Act is a slavish imitation of the New Zealand Act. The New South Wales Act is exactly the same.

Mr. MAUGER.—The New South Wales Act states that there shall be preference to unionists.

Mr. RONALD.—That is so. While the New South Wales Act explicitly states that preference shall be given to unionists, the Western Australian Act copies the New Zealand Act by giving preference by implication. The New Zealand Court has held that the New Zealand Act does not seek to treat with unassociated employes or employers, but only with associated employers and associated employes, or, in other words, with unionists. That Act would be without purpose or reason for its existence unless it dealt with associated men; and therefore it takes no cognizance of unassociated individuals.

Mr. JOHNSON.—There was no intention to imply what the honorable member suggests.

Mr. RONALD.—But the decision by Chief Justice Stout was given before the Western Australian Act was passed. It was before Parliament when the Bill, modelled on the New Zealand legislation, was passed. The right honorable member for Swan then had before him, not only the New Zealand Act, but the decision of the Court under that Act. Either the right honorable member was in absolute ignorance in regard to the decision in New Zealand, or he knew that that decision had been given; and if he knew of the decision he must have known that he was providing in that Bill for preference to unionists.

Mr. JOHNSON.—The right honorable member has expressly disclaimed any such intention.

Mr. RONALD.—The right honorable member for Swan is on the horns of a dilemma, and I cannot help him. The fact remains that that New Zealand decision was given before the Western Australian Bill was passed, and the right honorable member had not only the New Zealand Act, but the decision under that Act to guide him. If the right honorable member cannot read plain Anglo-Saxon, it is too late in life to begin to instruct him. Preference to unionists is the very essence of the measure before this Parliament. Without preference, the Bill will never work; it is a bundle of contradictions, illogical and absurd. I defy the wit and cunning of man to give us a workable Arbitration Bill which does not provide for preference to unionists.

Mr. MAUGER.—That means giving power to the Court to give preference.

Mr. RONALD.—Yes; that is a point I wish to make very clear and explicit, namely, that the Court must be empowered to give preference where there is a substantial majority of those concerned in favour of preference. Unions must be recognised—we cannot treat with men as units. Moreover, I should like to point out to those who are so much opposed to preference, that employers are a united people. In a mining company, there may be 1,000 shareholders represented by three directors and when dealing with the directors, we are dealing indirectly with the 1,000, or it may be 10,000 shareholders.

Mr. MAUGER.—Just as in the case of a brewing company.

Mr. RONALD.—Yes, or any other company. There is unionism of employers, just as much as there is unionism of employés. We cannot get rid of unionism, and an Arbitration Bill is absolutely impossible, unless the principle of unionism is recognised. I marvel at men being so utterly illogical and unreasonable as not to see that companies—railway companies, mining companies, or any associations of men—are bound to be unions or otherwise they can have no locus standi under an Arbitration Bill. I am glad that preference to unionism has been made a vital principle—a principle for which we shall fight and insist on establishing. With preference to unionists the Bill will be a workable measure and may be an instrument by the means of which disputes will be settled; but it cannot be of the slightest value so long as there is not preference to unionists either explicit or implied. I am quite prepared to trust the Court in the matter knowing that individuals can have no locus standi—that they must appear as unions and trades unions at that. But I want to go further in discussing the question whether the present Government have the confidence of the House. In the first place I refer to the very strange circumstances in which we are assembled—the strange conflict of parties. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat, humorously and gracefully—for everything he does has grace in it—described the state of the House by a quotation from Gilbert's Yarn of the Nancy Bell, in Bab Ballads. The honorable and learned member said that the position reminded him of a survivor of the Nancy Bell, the story of which begins as follows:—

'Twas on the shores that round our coast
From Deal to Ramsgate span,
That I found alone on a piece of stone
An elderly naval man.

His hair was weedy, his beard was long,
And needy and long was he,
And I heard this wight on the shore recite,
In a singular minor key:

"Oh, I am cook and a captain bold,
And the mate of the Nancy brig,
And a bo'sun tight, and a midshipmite,
And the crew of the captain's gig."

The honorable and learned member told how this old tar exhausted all his shipmates by eating them up, and only the cook and he were left. The delicate question arose as to which should eat the other.

"Then only the cook and me was left,
And the delicate question, 'Which
Of us two goes to the kettle?' arose,
And we argued it out as sich."

The cook argued that whereas he could cook, and the surviving shipmate could not, the latter ought to go to the pot, and, finally,

"For I loved that cook as a brother, I did,
And the cook he worshipped me;
But we'd both be blowed if we'd either be stowed
In the other chap's hold, you see."

The difficult situation was humorously stated by the ex-Prime Minister, who proved himself not only poetic but prophetic.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Which is the cook?

Mr. RONALD.—The prophecy was fulfilled, because the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, though he objected to be “stowed away in the other chap’s hold,” has been eaten up: he is simply assimilated and consumed by the man with the larger capacity.

Mr. BAMFORD.—Does the honorable member mean to say that the Prime Minister is a cannibal?

Mr. RONALD.—“Boa constrictor” would perhaps be a better term. But while that is all very good and very humorous, and expresses very happily the situation at the present time, and while we are all very sorry for the honorable and learned member for Ballarat—who thought that he was going to be the one survivor, but who finds himself consumed or swallowed up by others—we are very anxious indeed to have in power a Government that shall possess the confidence of this House. And it should possess the confidence of the House in virtue of the measures which it brings before Parliament. I maintain that the present Government has not the confidence of the House, because it has nothing in its programme to justify the confidence of any one. The Government has simply filched and stolen its programme from its predecessors. It has not originated a single new idea to recommend it to the country or to the House.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—It is not very enterprising thieving, either.

Mr. RONALD.—It is not enterprising thieving which the Government has done. There might have been some attempt to disguise the origin of their measures, but there is none. If the Government had wished to possess the confidence of the House, there are many burning questions that could have been taken up. There is, for instance, the question regarding which the honorable member for Hume has given notice of motion to-day. I allude to preferential trade. I cannot for a moment suppose that such a good protectionist as my honorable friend the Minister for Trade and Customs is, can acquiesce in ignoring this question. For years and years protection has had one of its best friends in him, and I cannot think that at this stage he will go back upon the convictions of years. One might have expected, seeing that this is a kind of eclectic Cabinet or combination of protectionists and free-traders, that out of deference to the presence of such a staunch good protectionist as the honorable gentleman in the Cabinet, there would have been some reference to the great doctrine of preferential trade in the Prime Minister’s speech and in the programme which he has put before the country. But what have we? Our idea of preferential trade is not the reduction of duties in the interests of the mother country, but the raising of duties against the foreigner. In that way we should give a preference to the mother country. There is all the difference in the world between our idea and that of the head of the Government.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member’s idea means more protection.

Mr. RONALD.—Our idea means preference to the mother country, but the idea of honorable members opposite involves no preference whatever. If preference is to be logical, or if it is ever to commend itself to the people, it must be extended by increasing duties against the foreigner, and not by decreasing duties upon British commodities. Indeed, our Customs duties are so low that there is scarcely anything to decrease. We have almost reached the irreducible minimum. To reduce our duties lower than they are would be to reach a reductio ad absurdum. There is only one system of preference possible, and this is to raise duties against the foreigner. That is a policy which, I believe, would commend itself to all rational logical protectionists. But from these protectionists who are ready to rush into an alliance with avowed free-traders, we can never expect any preferential trade that is worthy of the name. The present Government never had, and therefore cannot forfeit, the confidence of this House. They have come into existence by a side wind—by a kind of political fluke—by taking advantage of an accident in our political history. I believe that those who desire to stand in favour with their constituents would do well to recognise that fact, and to tell the Government straight away that they do not possess the confidence of the House. If we have arrived at a cul-de-sac, and if affairs are unworkable by means of the present House, the sooner we go back to our constituents, and say to them, “You must decide; we want an arbitrator in this matter; it is a form of arbitration which we cannot settle for ourselves, and the country must settle it for us”—the sooner we do that, the better it will be. I wish to say a word or two about the difference between a positive and a negative alliance. A positive alliance or association, in my opinion, is an alliance amongst men who differ in details, but who are agreed on general principles; or, it is an alliance of men for the purpose of attaining a certain well-defined end. A political alliance of Members of Parliament can only be an alliance for the purpose of carrying out a determined, well-defined policy. That is the kind of positive alliance that has been formed between the members of the party with which I am associated—the Labour Party—and the Liberal Protectionists. Ours is a positive policy for the purpose of attaining a certain well-defined end.

Mr. EWING.—What is the end?

Mr. RONALD.—The end is to legislate for “the greatest happiness of the greatest number.”

Mr. McLEAN.—Does that apply when the greatest number are non-unionists?

Mr. RONALD.—If the greatest number of workers are non-unionists, it only proves that the greatest number are fools; because their interests certainly lie in the direction of unionism. But I was proceeding to show that a negative alliance on the other hand is a combination of men who are simply brought together to “down” some other party, who have no defined end in view, and have nothing original of their own in the way of a policy. They simply have a negative or destructive purpose—that of “downing” some other party. That is the kind of combination which has brought the present Ministry together. The supporters of the Government have nothing in common. They cannot have. Take the Prime Minister. I grant that he has made a study of fiscalism from the free-trade stand-point.

Mr. LIDDELL.—What principles have the members of the new alliance in common?

Mr. RONALD.—I am coming to that. The Prime Minister may be quoted as an authority on fiscalism from the free-trade stand-point. Whether he has gone to the best sources for information, and whether his conclusions are logical and valid, are other points. But that he is an authority on that subject I am prepared to grant. But take him away from fiscalism, and what does he know of politics? Where has he ever made a speech on any social or political subject that would commend itself to any one? He is a man of fourth or fifth or tenth rate order on any other topic than that. He is a man of one idea, and one idea only, and that is fiscalism. Therefore, when honorable members opposite sink the fiscal issue, they sink the whole ship. It is a case of Hamlet with the Prince of Denmark left out. Then take those who have joined the right honorable gentleman as protectionists. They also are men of one idea. They have no general knowledge of politics, though they may have a knowledge of protection.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—If the Prime Minister is a third-rate man perhaps the honorable member will classify himself.

Mr. RONALD.—I leave that to the honorable member for Parramatta to do, and I do not suppose that his opinion of me will have very much weight.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I can assure the honorable member I should not put him in the same category with the Prime Minister, whether third or thirteenth.

Mr. RONALD.—If the honorable member will permit me to proceed, I desire to say that the combination opposite is a negative combination. There is nothing positive in its policy, and it exists entirely for the purpose of “downing” a third party, and to pose as anti-socialistic. The only way in which to successfully oppose any political party with which you do not agree is to supply an opposing force, the expulsive power of a new affection in the minds of the people. To defeat a party we must have first of all what I would call the expulsive power of a new political idea. We must bring forward some new idea calculated to drive out of the minds of the people some error which has found root there. If honorable members opposite believe that some kind of socialistic maggot has got into the craniums of the people who have sent us here to give expression to our views by legislation, their only way to remedy that condition of affairs is to find this new expulsive power; new ideas and a new policy that will take the place of what is erroneous in our policy. That being so, I ask where are the expulsive forces in the policy of the present Government. Is there an original idea in anything they have put before us? Their policy speaks for itself in its baldness, bareness, and barrenness. It is bald, barren, and bare of any original ideas. So far as good legislation is concerned, we have nothing to hope for and nothing to expect from this combination. The predecessors of the present Government had a positive, well-defined policy. We knew where we were going and what we wanted. The only positive matter in the policy of the present Government is that which has been filched from their predecessors, and it is put forward merely as a subterfuge to enable them to hold office, without doing anything for the good of the country. Theirs is a laissez faire policy, or, as a friend of mine used to put it, a policy "more lazy than fair." If honorable gentlemen opposite had any intention of doing anything good for the country, they would have brought in some measure which would have filled the blank, and would not have taken up the position of carrying through a Bill in which they do not believe. As I have said before, they have dealt with the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill in such a way that it is now like a ship sent to sea with an explosive in her hold, so that when she goes a certain distance it will blow her up and sink her. They have put a clause in the Bill which will render it absolutely worthless, and what is worse than all, they are perfectly conscious of what they are doing, and their object is only to betray the people that they may be able later on to turn round and tell them that a conciliation and arbitration law is of no use for the settlement of disputes, and that it only creates disputes and strikes. Preference to unionists is what I am arguing for, and it is the only point of difference between honorable members on either side. Still it is to be found in the models of an Arbitration and Conciliation Bill which we have in the Acts in force in Western Australia, New South Wales, and New Zealand. I say that without it our Bill is not worth the paper on which it is written. It is because we know what we have to expect from the present Government that we affirm that they have not the confidence of the House. Beyond all doubt, the great majority of honorable members on both sides were returned at the last election for the express purpose of carrying a Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. Here we have been wrangling over minor matters, and have not shown any earnestness or zeal for the welfare of the people by placing on the statute-book a measure calculated to settle the disputes which may arise between capital and labour. I do not know that I should try to anticipate any further action on the part of the Ministry. Whatever the subsequent fate of the Ministry may be, it need not enter into our calculations. We are here in the place in which it is required of us to speak what we believe, and I have no hesitation in reiterating that the present Ministry has demonstrated, and is still demonstrating that it has not the confidence of the House. It does not represent one-third of the members of the House, and by its policy it has shown that it has no initiatory power. It has had an opportunity to bring forward a positive policy that would commend itself to the intelligence of the people, and it has utterly failed to take advantage of that opportunity. It has simply adopted a part of the policy of its predecessors, and has in no way sought to improve upon it. Whatever the fate of the Government may be as the result of the coming division, I cannot say, but I earnestly hope that it will be speedily consigned to the shades of opposition, where it will be unable to make a farce of Commonwealth legislation and administration. We are at present seeking for legislation that will settle our industrial disputes, and bring about industrial peace. The very essence of our existence as a Parliament is the pledge to carry out a measure to that end. Instead of proceeding to enact such legislation, we are wrangling, and are not in earnest. I hope that the charge of want of sincerity which may be levelled against us, will shortly be removed by the advent of a Government, whether we have to go to the country for it, or can get it from this House, that will show that it is in earnest, and bent upon business, and that will not seek to make a sham of what is recognised to be the one method by means of which we can right what is wrong. make our country peaceful, and work out the greatest happiness to the greatest number. As the right honorable member for Swan is now present, I repeat that the Bill of which he claimed to be the father, contains preference to unionists. I refer the right honorable gentleman to the decision of the Chief Justice of New Zealand. I maintain that he did not know what were the contents of his own Bill, or he would have known that by implication, as Chief Justice Stout put it, it is intended to be a means of settling disputes between employers and employes, and not between employers and persons who are not associated with any union. I hope that Chief Justice Stout's decision will be carefully read by the right honorable member for Swan, who will then see that he has made a mistake, and that he did not know what were the contents of his Bill. He gave to Western Australia a measure which is more far-reaching in its provisions than he has suspected. We intend to follow the good example of Western Australia, and New South Wales, and have preference to unionists implied, if not expressed, in our Bill, otherwise it would be absolutely useless. I do not intend to detain the House much longer. I have referred to the cry of anti-Socialists which has been raised here against us, and shown, I think, to the satisfaction of every thinking man, that, as His Majesty the King has said, we are all Socialists nowadays. That is not an idle passing remark, but an observation of one who sees the great forces at work. Inasmuch as men seek everywhere for legislative remedies against the evils which are upon us, to that extent they are Socialists. I have also referred to the combination which is positive in this House. I have spoken of the unholy alliance which has sprung up between men who have nothing in common, and everything at variance, between ultra protectionists, and ultra free-traders, who have sunk their personal convictions for the purpose of "downing" a third party. I hope that we shall have a speedy end to this alliance, and that we shall get into a rarer atmosphere with a positive policy. We have to call in a third party to determine the points at issue. We have to appeal to the electors, not because we differ, but because we are so much agreed. We have all professed to be in favour of conciliation and arbitration, and it is because we are in such close touch that there is no line of demarcation. I long to see the day when we shall have, on the one hand, a straight, consistent, logical conservative policy, and, on the other hand, a straight, consistent, logical democratic policy. I long to see the day when we shall have a clear line of demarcation, when men shall be divided by principle, and not by self-seeking or mercenary motives. Measures, and not men, I repeat, must be the determining factor. When a party is prepared to come forward with measures which will commend themselves to the intelligence, the conscience, and the reason of men, then we shall find the electors on their side. But while a party has no remedies for the ills around us, then they will always be in a chronic minority, as they ought to be. We require measures, not men, to determine who shall rule. Under the present system one class of men get into power by a side wind and by accident, when there are no clear issues before the country. There is no issue before the country at the present time. We are suffering here, not because we comprise three parties, but because we form one party. We are suffering here because we are all agreed, or profess to be agreed, that conciliation and arbitration is a right and proper principle to enact. If men were logical they would see that once we start upon a course of conciliation and arbitration there can be no possible halting place until we land ourselves in unionism. The employers are in union. If a dispute were to arise on the railways of a State the Commissioners as a party would represent the State before the Court, and unless the railway men were in a union they would stand as units. Unions must in the very nature of things exist, and we cannot have a Conciliation and Arbitration Court without them. They are the prime requisite, the first step towards conciliation. Unless the Court is empowered, by implication, as in Western Australia, if not by express words, to grant preference to unionists—

Sir JOHN FORREST.—No.

Mr. RONALD.—The right honorable member sets himself up against the collective wisdom of the Supreme Court of New Zealand.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—We have a decision to the contrary by the Supreme Court of Western Australia.

Mr. RONALD.—The right honorable member has admitted that the Act of Western Australia was modelled on the lines of the New Zealand Act, and the New Zealand Court decided that the power to grant preference to unionists is conferred upon the Court, and yet he declares that no such power is contained in the Act of Western Australia.

Where ignorance is bliss,
'Tis folly to be wise.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—The Supreme Court of Western Australia has ruled against that view.

Mr. RONALD.—The right honorable member will find that the power is contained in the Act, whenever an appeal is made to the High Court of Australia. All sane men and impartial Judges will affirm that the power to grant preference to unionists is possessed by the Arbitration Court of Western Australia, although the right honorable member does not seem to know that it is. We hail with delight the opportunity of putting an issue before the people, because it is utterly absurd to conceive of any negative alliance. Our industries are languishing, and our streets are crowded with the unemployed. I was not a party to any fiscal truce. In my constituency, perhaps more than in any other in the Commonwealth, employment is reduced by one-third through the operation of the Tariff, which is "neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring."

Fiscal truce or no fiscal truce, it is high time that Parliament set itself to see if something cannot be done to counteract the baneful influences which were at work when the Tariff was being framed. This will never be done so long as the present Government are in power. Their idea of preference is the reduction of duties in favour of the mother country, whereas our idea—and the sooner it is known the better—is the raising of duties against the foreigner. The latter is the only preference which would be found to be of any value, and it is urgently needed. I believe that at the present time there is some indication that if that assurance were given to the mother country, it would help the cause there. We are very gratified that the honorable member for Hume has given notice of his motion. The division on it will show who are the protectionists and who are the free-traders in this House; who are the friends of Australian industry, and who are the foreign traders. I shall be very much surprised if some of the very pronounced protectionists who now sit on the Treasury benches, having joined a free-trade Ministry, go back on their professions in favour of preferential duties. In any case, the debate will clear the air, and I hail with delight the prospect of a division on the question. It will settle, once and for all, whether a man can sit with a free-trade Government and vote free-trade, and yet represent a protectionist constituency, which is an anomaly and a contradiction.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—Yet the honorable member voted to oust a protectionist Government.

Mr. RONALD.—The right honorable member has said a great deal about our alliance. He has twitted the Labour Party with being a patchwork party, and has said that we have as many free-traders as protectionists in our ranks, which he maintains is as anomalous as the position of the present Ministerial party. But there is a great difference between the alliance of the Labour Party and that of the Government Party. The members of the Labour alliance have many things in common; but honorable members opposite have nothing in common, except that they are opposed to the Labour Party. Take our friends who have come over to us, the Liberal Protectionists. They are the men who have been the pioneers of industrial legislation in Victoria.

Mr. McCAY.—What about the honorable and learned member for Ballarat and the Treasurer?

Mr. RONALD.—The honorable and learned member for Ballarat has not come over to us. I was referring to the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, than whom no man in the country has been a closer student of the exact literature of industrialism and fiscalism. He is a man who would be a host in himself anywhere, so far as information is concerned, and he speaks as one having authority. We are glad to find that a man of his convictions is in harmony with us. I told him years ago that he would ultimately find a resting place with the Labour Party, because their aims and objects were in harmony with his own. The honorable member for Bourke also is a very active, energetic, progressive, up-to-date young man. We have weeded out some of the fossils. We did not expect that they would keep pace with the times, and join the new party. We have acquired the men whose future is before them, while we have left those whose future—to use an Irishism—is behind them. Our ideas are those of the young men, and the flowing tide is with us, while honorable members opposite are being borne back by the ebb-tide. If our alliance goes to the country, and works unitedly, we shall show Australia that there are but two political parties—the Progressives and the Retrogressives, the Liberals and the Conservatives, or the Labour members and the Conservatives. I care not what terms may be adopted, so long as we are divided into parties by measures, without consideration of personnel. With us there is no craving for office, no thirsting for position. We are here in the place where we are required of conscience to speak the truth, to say what we think should be done in the interests of the community. We have no desire to displace Ministers merely for the sake of doing so. What we wish is to see measures placed on the statute-book which will redound to the credit of those who have framed them, and will benefit the people whom we represent. If such measures are to be passed, this House must naturally be divided into two parties—the progressives and the retrogressives. So far as the present Government are concerned, they have not yet had time to commit themselves to important acts of administration; but no doubt if they are left in office long enough, their administration will be on a par with the administration of some of the Ministers elsewhere. Although the policy of a White Australia has not met with any organized opposition in this Chamber, we know that some honorable members who had not the courage to denounce it, or to vote against it, nevertheless dislike it, and when legislation has not the sympathy of those intrusted with its administration, opportunities will be taken to make it null and void. I shall not enter into the case of the six hatters, or of the six potters, but I know that when a measure is administered by one who is not in sympathy with it, it is sure to be badly administered. I am glad that in this Administration we have a protectionist in charge of a protectionist Tariff. For twelve or fifteen years in Victoria, prior to Federation, although we had a far-reaching protectionist Tariff, we had ultra-free-traders administering it. I am glad that to that extent the Government have shown a desire to harmonize the administration with the spirit of the law, although I do not know that their action has been strictly in accord with free-trade principles. I do not know how the Prime Minister can consent to have the Customs Department administered by a colleague of whose policy he does not approve. I trust that the good feeling hitherto exhibited during this debate will continue, and that honorable members will persevere in their efforts to maintain a high standard of debate. We live in a rarer atmosphere than do the politicians of the States, and we should leave old feuds behind us. The representatives of Victoria have had their differences, but have shown mutual respect, and have refrained from those personal recriminations which have been indulged in by representatives of New South Wales. I hope that the right honorable member for Swan will see the error of his ways, and that he will realize that, in order to be consistent, he must renounce his allegiance to the Government, and vote in favour of giving preference to unionists. The Labour Party have been bitterly attacked by the right honorable member for Swan for having thrown obstacles in the way of the passing of the Kalgoorlie to Port Augusta Railway Survey Bill.

Mr. FISHER.—That is an election squib.

Mr. RONALD.—No doubt it is, and it will be assessed at its proper worth in Western Australia. I would remind the right honorable member for Swan that he was in office for three years, and yet did nothing to promote the survey of the proposed railway.

He has reproached the honorable member for Coolgardie with having failed to use his influence with the leader of the Opposition to induce him to stay his hand in regard to the want-of-confidence motion, until the measure referred to had been passed. If the matter was so urgent as represented, the right honorable gentleman should have taken action whilst he was a Minister. I venture to say that the present Government will not bestir themselves very much in the matter, because there is a great conflict of opinion amongst Ministers regarding the desirability of constructing the railway. I have no desire to prolong this debate. I am very anxious to know how the vote will go. I believe that noses have been counted, and that one honorable member holds the fate of this Parliament in his hands. We are all anxious to see how that honorable member will cast his vote, and I trust that we shall speedily obtain the desired information. The sooner we have a good thunderstorm to clear the political atmosphere, the sooner shall we get rid of the confusion which now exists, not because of our declared differences, but on account of our professed agreement. In my student days, I was told that if men were logical and could agree with regard to their definitions, it was quite impossible for them to differ; they were bound to come into agreement if they were logical. I would urgently appeal to honorable members to consider whether the interests of the community would be best served by permitting the present Government to remain in office. I have no hesitation in saying that they should not be allowed to remain there for one day longer, because they have given absolutely no indication that they are capable of initiating legislation calculated to improve the present condition of affairs.

Mr. WILKS.—They are only a job lot.

Mr. RONALD.—I am glad that that expression has fallen from the honorable member, because it conveys what I should like to say myself. No combination can be a sound one that contains such an out-and-out free-trader as the Prime Minister, and such a pronounced protectionist as the Minister of Trade and Customs.

Mr. KELLY.—What about the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, and the honorable and learned member for West Sydney?

Mr. RONALD.—They have never been colleagues in a Ministry. Besides, those honorable members have many things in common. Apart from mere fiscalism, there are many points upon which democrats can agree. In the case of the Conservatives, however, the position is very different. There is nothing else upon which they can agree, except it be a mere negation of the platform of the Labour Party. The honorable and learned member for West Sydney and the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, are as far apart as the poles upon the fiscal issue, but are well able to agree upon most other matters. We have read in text books of extremes meeting. That is not a mere figure of speech—it is a fact.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Will the honorable member produce his authority?

Mr. RONALD.—I can point to many instances in which extremes meet. I maintain that it is quite possible for men entertaining widely different views upon the question of free-trade versus protection to be perfectly at one in regard to working for the happiness of the greatest number. But I would remind honorable members opposite of the great radical distinction between the Labour Party and their own combination. In the Labour Party we are prepared to sink the fiscal issue. I am not prepared to sacrifice my deep-rooted protectionist principles, and the honorable and learned member for West Sydney is not willing to forego his own fiscal views. We can agree to differ upon questions of that kind. The free-trade members in the Labour Party are prepared to say to their protectionist friends, "You prove to us that any reduction of the existing Tariff will act disastrously to labour interests, and we are ready to look into the matter."

Mr. WILKS.—How does the honorable member intend to prove it?

Mr. RONALD.—I think that the matter can be easily proved. The present state of established industries will soon demonstrate that the existing Tariff is working disastrously. There is only one remedy to apply, and that remedy is to be found in a return to a national protective policy. Those protectionists who have allied themselves with the present Administration have no hope of improving existing conditions, by securing an increase in the Tariff duties, because they constitute a minority of the coalition, and must continue to do so. The protectionists have some hope of salvation from us, but they have none from those who have gone over to the camp of the enemy. There is all the difference in the world between trying to take up a neutral position in any combination, and going straight over to the enemy. Our protectionist friends who have allied themselves with the Labour Party have done so to assist the protectionist cause, whereas those who have associated themselves with the free-traders opposite, have surrendered their protectionist principles. They can never hope for a revision of the Tariff from the party which is at present in power. I am very sorry that such advocates of protection, as our highly-esteemed and respected Treasurer, and the Minister of Trade and Customs, should have gone back upon the convictions of a life-time. I am perfectly certain that, so far as any good which they can render to the protectionist cause is concerned, they will soon discover that they might just as well be avowed free-traders. I feel sorry that the old system which compelled men upon accepting Ministerial office, to go before their constituents no longer exists, because I am perfectly certain that had it been operative, protectionist constituencies would never have indorsed the action of these gentlemen in joining a Free-trade Ministry. I believe that, at the coming election, protectionist electors will once more assert themselves by declaring that they do not believe in a man attempting to serve two masters. I repeat that the present Administration does not possess the confidence of this House, and I do not believe that it possesses the confidence of the country. At any rate, I am prepared to take the responsibility of my action in voting against it. I believe that, as the result of a general election, we shall obtain the services of a Government which will give legislative effect to the desires and aspirations of the people.

Mr. LIDDELL (Hunter).—As you are aware, sir, I do not often trouble the House, and when I do speak I never detain honorable members at any great length. But this particular crisis is an occasion on which I feel it to be my duty, not only to myself, but to my constituents and to the Commonwealth, to express my opinion. We have just listened to a very lengthy, clear, lucid, and terse speech from the honorable and reverend member for Southern Melbourne. I waited many hours this afternoon in the hope of finding some point in the honorable member's remarks on which I might hang some observations of my own, but I must confess that, after listening to him from start to finish, I have failed, with one exception. The honorable member spoke of the honorable member for Bourke, and the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, as if they were his friends and brothers. Does the honorable member recollect the position those honorable members took up during the election? Does he remember how they then abused the Labour Party? And yet on this occasion we find honorable members opposite joining forces, and becoming as it were "heavenly twins."

Mr. TUDOR.—Can the honorable member remember the Minister of Customs abusing the Prime Minister?

Mr. BAMFORD.—And vice versa.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I shall deal with that matter later. Just now, only by chance, I picked up a Hansard from the table, and at the first page I opened, I found the following remarks by the honorable member for Melbourne Ports:—

The idea in the mind of free-traders that we are only anxious to avail ourselves of this opportunity for the purpose of obtaining increased protection without making any concessions is altogether erroneous. We are prepared, after due and careful consideration, to make concessions to the old country, and I am sure that, by mutual concessions and mutual consideration, a great deal can be done to foster, not only the industries and agriculture of the Commonwealth, but also the industries and agriculture of the old country.

Mr. MAUGER.—Hear, hear! I have nothing to withdraw.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I ask the honorable member for Melbourne Ports how he can reconcile those remarks with the abuse that he heaped on the leader of this Government, because he was not satisfied with the attitude of the right honorable gentleman on the question of preferential trade? I wish to say that I have no objection, from a constitutional point of view, to the submission of the motion now before the House. The leader of the Opposition—the leader of the Labour Party—has a perfect right to take up the attitude he has assumed, so far as constitutional usage is concerned. But I protest against the indecent haste with which that motion has been submitted. I protest against the uselessness and the iniquity of the motion. I protest against its uselessness, because we know that the leader of the Opposition cannot possibly succeed. Do not the members of the so-called Liberal-Labour alliance base their hopes on the vote of one single honorable member? Do they imagine for one moment that that honorable member is going to vote with them?

Mr. GROOM.—He might vote the other way.

Mr. LIDDELL.—The honorable member publicly stated that he would not vote with the Labour Party.

Mr. GROOM.—When?

Mr. MAUGER.—He said he would vote for a dissolution.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I believe he said he would vote for a dissolution; but I do not care for whom he votes, because I am satisfied that there are honorable members on the benches opposite who are particularly anxious that there should not be a dissolution.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Hear, hear! And honorable members on these benches too.

Mr. LIDDELL.—Honorable members opposite know that the success of the motion would sound the knell of their own political deaths. They know well that the dangerous weapons with which they seek to hurl us from these benches will but recoil on themselves. I am satisfied that whatever their interests, or the interests of their constituents may be, they will, if they are wise men, make an effort to avoid, by some means, the overthrow of the Government. That is a duty they owe, not only to themselves, but to the country. The overthrow of this Government after so brief a term, led, as that Government is, by one of the greatest statesmen of our age, and representing, as it does, the majority of the people of Australia, would be little short of a national calamity. I believe that in making that statement I am voicing the thoughts and wishes of the majority of the people of Australia. But what I feel most is that this mixed marriage—this alliance between the Labour Party and the so-called Protectionist-Liberal Party—is simply an insult to public taste, against which I, must protest. Why one party to this alliance should give to themselves the name of "Liberal" I do not know, seeing that the honorable members on the Government side are the liberals in this Parliament. A great many honorable members on this side, including myself, are satisfied—and I know a great many on the Opposition side are satisfied—that when the last elections were fought, the country decided that the Tariff question should be given a rest.

Mr. McDONALD.—Nonsense!

Mr. LIDDELL.—I claim that what I say is not nonsense.

Mr. WILKS.—The Labour Party always give the Tariff question a rest, for their own safety.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I believe that the honorable member for Hume, the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs, and, further, the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, have pronounced in favour of a rest from fiscal strife. In support of that statement, I ask honorable members to give me their attention for a few minutes while I quote from Hansard; and a better proof I do not think could be asked. I shall quote, first of all, from a speech by that grand old warrior, the honorable member for Hume, a gentleman on whose opinions and word we can all rely. The honorable member said—

The Government do not propose to raise the fiscal issue, but I intend to maintain my principles.

He said that in a manly way, and I admire him for his manliness.

At the same time, I shall adhere to the statement of the Prime Minister that fiscal peace is to be preserved.

That was the pronouncement of the honorable member for Hume. It is recorded in Hansard at page 535. The remark was made during his speech on the Address-in-Reply. Now let me turn to what was said by the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs. I will condemn him out of his own mouth. He said on the 15th March of this year, as reported in Hansard, page 538—

Another question which has been definitely settled so far as Queensland is concerned—

he spoke for the whole of his State—is that there shall be no alteration of the Tariff.

What could be plainer than that? He went on—

I believe that the whole of Australia regarded the issue as being whether the Tariff was to remain settled, at least during the book-keeping period.

Then the honorable and learned member said that the then leader of the Opposition—the present Prime Minister—asked—for the decision of the people, and he has obtained a decision which is clear, beyond all doubt. Could anything be plainer than that? Further, he said—

I think that the people have declared that it is desirable that, until the book-keeping period has closed, we should adhere to the existing Tariff.

Now let me take the honorable member for Melbourne Ports. I will quote something which he said during his election campaign. I suppose he did not think that it would be brought up against him. After saying that the Federal Tariff had adversely affected some trades—he was probably alluding to the hat trade—the honorable member continued—

While recognising this, he also recognised there was infinitely more to be gained by a period of rest than by re-opening the Tariff question. The protectionists were anxious to give the new Tariff a five years' trial, but that was what the free-traders were afraid of.

That was said in December last. One might travel through the length and breadth of New South Wales, and, although there is a small sprinkling of protectionists there, the almost universal opinion—although we have been, as it were, cheated out of our birthright and subjected to a high protectionist Tariff that we did not want—is that the Tariff question should be given a rest. The Sydney Chamber of Manufactures at a meeting of the Council, presided over by Mr. O. C. Beale, the High Priest of protection, discussed the possibility of the re-opening of the Tariff, and it is reported that he said—

The consensus of opinion, so far as the New South Wales Chamber is concerned, was in favour of leaving the Tariff alone for the present, in order to enable the Coalition Ministry to proceed with the legislation of the Commonwealth upon the terms outlined by the Reid-McLean Ministry.

Mr. GROOM.—The same chamber, at a joint meeting in Brisbane, assented to a resolution in favour of the re-opening of the Tariff question, and Mr. Beale presided.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I think I have conclusively proved by the quotations which I have made, and by my arguments, that it was practically agreed that we should have fiscal peace. I wish to know why the question has been re-opened?

Mr. MAUGER.—Because there is no peace.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I do not ask for an answer from the Opposition benches, because I know that I should not get a correct one. But I will give the answer. I am perfectly satisfied that this question has been re-opened at this particular time by ambitious politicians who are anxious for place—who are fighting for place—who are determined to gain their ends by any legitimate means that may be open to them.

Mr. WILKS.—Or otherwise.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I ask honorable members opposite whether they have treated the people who sent them here fairly? I ask whether they are doing their duty? I do not think so. Not only is the small Tariff re-opening party at fault in my opinion, but I also think that the Labour Party are not doing their duty by the people whom they represent. Neither are they acting up to their principles. In proof of that statement, I will quote a remark made by the leader of the Opposition on the 4th March, as reported in Hansard, page 188. The honorable member said—

So far as the Labour Party are concerned we regard it as useless to think of taking a share of the responsibility of Government unless we have in this Chamber a majority of members who are prepared to abide by the programme which we have put before the country.

If that was the position taken up by the leader of the Labour Party, then I ask him: Why do we find his party to-day forming an alliance with a few protectionists with the object of turning the present Government out of office? Furthermore, I object to the Labour Party on the ground that, instead of standing alone, they are constantly obliged to form alliances with other parties.

Mr. THOMAS.—What is the honorable member's own leader doing at present?

Mr. LIDDELL.—He is doing a service to the country. I consider that the Labour Party is, in this connexion, little better than a parasite.

Mr. WEBSTER.—A parasite?

Mr. LIDDELL.—Yes; for the benefit of those who do not know what a parasite is, I will endeavour to explain. It is a plant which has not sufficient strength to grow by itself, and is therefore obliged to fasten on to some other plant, and by that means raise itself above the level of the ground to seek air and light. And, strange to say, the plant to which it clings is eventually crushed, and perishes by the action of the parasite. I can promise the protectionist members of this alliance—this unnatural and unholy alliance—that they will eventually be crushed by the Labour Party, which has allied itself with them.

Mr. MAUGER.—I suppose the honorable member is very sorry for that?

Mr. LIDDELL.—I am, sorry for my country. Let us hark back a little to see what really has been the action of the Labour Party, which boasts that it represents the working men of Australia, that its object is the greatest good of the greatest number, and that in its view the welfare of the people is the supreme law. The members of that party came into power by accident; they professed themselves reluctant to take office. They did not represent a majority in this Parliament, but a minority; and, notwithstanding that fact, they took office. Notwithstanding also the pronouncement of the leader of the party, that they would never dream of taking the responsibilities of office unless they had a majority, they took office.

Mr. STORRER.—They were able to keep a quorum, and the present Government was not.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—What an interjection to come all the way from Tasmania!

Mr. LIDDELL.—It came from so far away that unfortunately I did not catch it. They threw themselves upon the mercy of this House. They said they did not seek office, and that, in fact, they were very sorry to get there. I believe that they were very sorry to get there.

Mr. ROBINSON.—They were sorry to leave there.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I believe they were sorry to get there, because in their old rôle of parasite they were very much happier leaning on the other members of the Opposition. Being forced into a position of power and responsibility, they were obliged to make the most of it. They have claimed that while in office they did everything they should have done, but now that they are out of office we are beginning to see that they did certain things which they had no right to do. I ask the members of this party who profess to legislate not for one class in particular but to secure the greatest good for the greatest number, why, in putting the law into action in the case of the six potters, they prosecuted the employer instead of prosecuting the men?

Mr. PAGE.—If it is not right, why does not the Prime Minister call his dogs off?

Mr. WILKS.—Honorable members opposite said that the Prime Minister instituted the prosecution.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I should like to notice one or two remarks which were made by the leader of the Opposition on Sunday night.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Sunday night?

Mr. LIDDELL.—For my part, I do not approve of these Sunday night political meetings. I do not think it is at all dignified for a member of this honorable House, holding the position of the honorable member for Bland, to address people politically on Sundays.

Mr. MAUGER.—Does the honorable member think it worse than Sunday dinners?

Mr. LIDDELL.—I think it is almost worse than pleasant Sunday afternoons.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable member for Melbourne Ports believe in it?

Mr. MAUGER.—No, I do not; but I think there are a great many things worse.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Hunter will please take his seat. On several occasions to-day I have called the House to order on account of conversations carried on across the Chamber. Last week also I twice called the attention of the House to the same thing. I do trust that honorable members will not compel me to do, what I am most reluctant to do, and that is to name those who persist in transgressing the Standing Orders.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I have alluded to the Labour Party as a parasite party. And I have warned the small Protectionist Party opposite that they will probably be crushed by the Labour Party. In view of my allusion, I ask honorable members to listen to these statements made by the leader of the Opposition. He said—

If we were to have got anything at all, the only possible method was by an alliance, whether tacit or expressed, with one or other of the older and more numerous parties.

There is the parasitic theory, as honorable members will see. The Labour Party cannot get on without support from some other party.

Mr. THOMAS.—Just as the Prime Minister cannot get on without the support of the honorable member for Gippsland.

Mr. LIDDELL.—The right honorable gentleman is very well able to get on as he is. The leader of the Opposition further said—

In a fight of this description, I am willing to accept the assistance of any man—the honorable gentleman does not care what man, or what party he belongs to, whether he is a free-trader or a protectionist, he is perfectly satisfied. He further said—

I am willing to accept the assistance of any man, inside or outside, who was against the common enemy.

I should like honorable members opposite to listen to this, because it will probably come home to them—

We are, it is true, bound to use our influence to prevent opposition by our party to those who are allied with us.

But hear this statesmanlike proposition?

But that does not prevent us using our influence in favour of any man whom the organizations may decide to bring forward.

On one hand, he promises his support to honorable members who are with him in this unholy alliance, while, on the other, he shows that it is not at all necessary for him to support them when the elections come on. Further on, he said—

With regard to the tobacco monopoly, a Royal Commission is to be proposed, and my own view is that the arguments for the nationalization of that monopoly are so overwhelming that I have no fear as to the finding of that Commission.

Mr. WILKS.—Is the alliance in favour of that?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Dalley is out of order.

Mr. LIDDELL.—This brings me to the discussion of one of the planks of the Labour Party, which is the nationalization of what are practically paying industries. The members of the Labour Party, when they get into power—if they ever do—propose to pick out some industry which men, by lifelong energy and the expenditure of their brains and capital, have worked up into a paying concern, and take it over for the purpose of assisting the State. Mark you, these are the men who are going to legislate for the whole people, and not for a particular class. And what do they propose to do in this particular instance? They actually propose to take over the whole tobacco industry, with the object of providing for old-age pensions. Who is it that old-age pensions are going to assist, if it is not the Labour Party? It is the men who form the Labour Party who will ultimately require the most assistance, if legislation is allowed to go on in the course which they wish it to take. I believe that honorable members will admit that in Australia we are supplied by excellent firms with excellent tobacco. No better tobacco can be found in any part of the world than that which we are here privileged to smoke. I speak from experience, having tried tobacco in various other parts of the world. Honorable members will not find in any other part of the world that wages in the industry are higher than they are here.

Mr. MAUGER.—They are shockingly bad here; the honorable member cannot know what they are, or he would not say that.

Mr. LIDDELL.—On the best authority I am in a position to say that the wages paid in the tobacco industry in Australia are exceedingly good.

Mr. MAUGER.—The employés are not getting a living wage.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I can inform honorable members of a country where the wages in the industry are exceedingly bad, and where the industry is run by the Government.

Mr. MAUGER.—What are the rates of wages in the industry here?

Mr. LIDDELL.—I may come to them by-and-by. We can get in Australia the best tobacco that can be obtained anywhere, and it can be purchased at a reasonable price, whilst the men and women working in the trade are not sweated.

Mr. MAUGER.—Can the honorable member give us the men's wages? I shall be able to get them for him to-morrow.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I have them all here, but it does not suit me to give them just now. Let us take the example of the monopoly of the tobacco industry in France. There the tobacco supplied is the worst to be found in the world; it is almost unsmokeable. Not only that, but you have to pay a high price for it, and the people who are employed in its manufacture and sale are ground down, whilst the industry is used as a political weapon by the Government of the country. It was the idea of Napoleon I. to place the tobacco industry under the Government, so as to give the Minister of the Interior great power. To-day the Minister has this power. He has the power to take over all shops giving a profit of over £40 a year. The prefects in various districts have the right to give licences for shops which make less than that; but any shop making a profit of over £40 a year is placed in the gift of the Minister of the Interior. It is very easy to see how the nationalization of such a trade as that places great power in the hands of politicians. Of course, I shall be told that if the State runs this industry it will do away with all political influence. That has not proved to be the case in countries such as France and Italy. We have a very good example of the political influence which exists in the case of State-run industries. We were obliged to put our railways in the hands of Commissioners, in order to avoid political interference. I claim that an industry which is nationalized and run by the Government is not managed with the same business ability as a private industry is, because so much depends upon personal effort. In the case of State-run industries the management is not so good as it ought to be. Take, for example, the railways and the Post and Telegraph Department. I claim that our railways are far from being up-to-date, because, for one reason, no refreshment cars are attached to the trains. I am satisfied that if any private companies were running these railways, and there was anything like competition, such a state of things would not be allowed to exist. Again, before we undertake to build a railway into any part of this country we require to be satisfied that it will pay when built. Private companies do not wait in order to find out whether railways are likely to pay, but they form an idea as to whether they will pay in the future, and by that means they open up new country. Furthermore, we should have a series of light railways, which would act as feeders to our trunk lines. Under private management they would have been constructed long ago. The Post and Telegraph Department is conducted in the same way. Only this afternoon, we had to listen for hours to an outpouring of complaints against the telephone system and the management of the Post Office. I am sure that if these Departments had been in the hands of private companies we should not have heard those complaints, because the grievances would have been redressed long ago.

Mr. THOMAS.—Were there no complaints against the telephones when they were privately-owned in Melbourne?

Mr. LIDDELL.—In Melbourne we have an example of a tramway system which is privately owned.

Mr. THOMAS.—But the honorable member was talking of telephones.

Mr. LIDDELL.—We have heard a great many complaints against the tramway system here, and we have also heard it very highly praised.

Mr. TUDOR.—By whom?

Mr. LIDDELL.—In the House the other day we heard that system praised, as well as criticised. I think it proves that an industry which is run by the State is not so satisfactory as one which is run by a private company.

Mr. SPENCE.—Is the honorable member in favour of selling the railways?

Mr. LIDDELL.—No. In looking at the platform of the Labour Party—it is, of course, a very excellent one, and contains some very good planks—I notice that the first item is "The maintenance of a White Australia." I do not see why the Labour Party should particularly claim that as part of their platform, seeing that it is favoured throughout the length and breadth of this land. Another plank in their platform is "Compulsory arbitration." We have had an example of their compulsory arbitration. We know that it is their object, if possible, to compel all men to enter unions, and that if they once get men into unions they can compel them to vote just as they wish. That is the chief objection I have to the clause relating to preference to unionists. I have always been in favour of arbitration, but I had no idea that the Labour Party would seek to use the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill as they have done, and make it a weapon which would eventually destroy themselves. I notice that a plank in their fighting platform excludes lawyers—

Compulsory arbitration to settle industrial pursuits with provision for the exclusion of the legal profession.

I fail to understand that addition. If the legal profession is to be excluded, why should not the medical profession be excluded? Of course, I shall be met with the cry immediately that there is no greater union in the world than the medical profession.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—Hear, hear.

Mr. LIDDELL.—I thought so. I claim that the medical profession is not a close union in the sense in which the unions of working men are, because there is no law which will bind men to any particular action. We see every day instances in which members of the medical profession please themselves, and nobody can stop them. Another plank in this platform is, "A citizen military force and an Australian-owned navy." I am in favour of a citizen military force, but I am not at all in favour of cutting down the Estimates as the Labour Party have attempted to do. I believe that every man in Australia should be taught to use a rifle. But it is of no advantage for a man to be able to use a rifle unless he is accustomed to some sort of control. And discipline cannot possibly be maintained unless we have a permanent standing force. The object of the Labour Party appears to be to do away with the permanent standing army, and to simply have a number of civilian rifle corps. I distinctly object to the action of the Labour Party in cutting down the Military Estimates, and endeavouring to destroy the cadet movement. I believe that their object was not to encourage cadets, but simply to encourage rifle clubs.

Mr. PAGE.—Who did that?

Mr. LIDDELL.—I believe that the honorable member was in favour of cutting down that vote. I certainly think that the cadets should be encouraged, so that our youths when they arrive at manhood may be accustomed to use a weapon. I protest strongly against the domination of the Labour Party.

Mr. THOMAS.—And we protest against the domination of the honorable member's party.

Mr. LIDDELL.—We have now a representative Government, led by a man whose ability is undoubted, and who is a statesman.

Mr. THOMAS.—What was his opinion of the Minister of Trade and Customs during the general elections?

Mr. LIDDELL.—The position of the honorable member for Gippsland shows the strength of the party on this side. We have here a party made up of—

Mr. PAGE.—Odds and ends.

Mr. LIDDELL.—We have here a party made up of both free-traders and protectionists. I protest most earnestly against this waste of public time and public money. We have been in session for many months. In the space of ten months we have had three Governments, and we are no further ahead now than we were at the beginning of that period. If we have a dissolution at the present moment it will cost the country a large sum, which, as trade is, cannot very well be spared. I think that nothing could be worse for the country at the present time than a dissolution of this House.

Mr. CULPIN (Brisbane).—I wish to say a few words to the House on the subject of the Prime Minister's policy. Hitherto very little has been said about it, but I shall direct my attention immediately to it. It is a very simple policy, but it has been put forward by a complex Ministry. It is, too, a new policy for Australia as a whole, and a new policy also for this Federal Parliament, but it is nevertheless indorsed by the advanced members of the Prime Minister's party, such as the honorable and learned member for Wannon, the honorable members for Flinders, New England, and Parramatta, and the right honorable member for Swan. We have not heard a word of indorsement from the honorable and learned members for Ballarat and Bendigo, nor from the honorable members for Eden-Monaro and Laanecoorie. Neither has the honorable member for Oxley indorsed it, though we may perhaps yet hear something from him in regard to it, because for eight years he lived in a State where a similar policy was in force. He lived in Queensland from 1893 to 1901, when he entered the Federal Parliament and came to Melbourne. Since then he has not had much to do with a policy of this kind, though about a month ago he went to Queensland and attended the funeral obsequies of the remnants of the party which had supported a similar policy in Queensland. He is, therefore, well fitted to assist the Prime Minister of the Commonwealth at the present time. I intend to place before the House the causes which impelled the adoption of a similar policy in Queensland in 1893. The Liberal Party, which was led by Sir Samuel Griffith, was, in 1888, opposed by Sir Thomas McIlwraith, until something very like a dead-lock occurred. This was overcome by a coalition, which adopted a policy similar to that enunciated by the right honorable member for East Sydney. That policy was followed by what came to be known as the continuous Government, from 1893 until its death from inanition in 1903. That continuous Government was in its youth lively enough, but it committed excesses from which the State of Queensland still suffers. The paltry sum of £333,000 which the honorable and learned member for Corio says that the right honorable member for East Sydney placed on the wrong side of his balance-sheet, is a trifle compared with the money which the continuous Government in Queensland played with and dissipated. Their conduct in that and other matters was responsible for bringing the Labour Party into existence in 1893. That party spared no effort to denounce the misapplication of public funds by the Government, and to cover up its sin and shame the Government adopted the policy which has been adopted by the right honorable member for East Sydney—"Down the Labour Party." The constituency which I have the honour to represent forms part of a State which has experienced sad results from the coalition of factors similar to the parties which have come together to support the present Government. My attention was first drawn to politics in Queensland in 1893. The then Government, which subsequently became known as the continuous Government, from the fact that, with variations, it continued in office from 1888 to 1903, was due to a compact between a former Government and the Opposition to combine and divide the spoils. There remained in existence, however, a remnant which did not bow the knee to Baal. A measure for the abolition of kanaka labour had been passed in Queensland in 1888, but it was repealed as soon as the continuous Government came into office. The most serious trouble which resulted to the State, however, was due to the financial operations of the Government. It had no difficulty in persuading Parliament that huge borrowing was necessary, the effect of which is the present heavy debt of the State. Whereas Victoria owes only £47 per head of her population, Queensland has a debt of nearly £80 per head. In 1881, before the continuous Government came into power, the debt of Queensland was only £13,250,000, whereas in 1891 it had increased to £29,500,000.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Does the honorable member intend to connect these remarks with the motion before the Chair?

Mr. CULPIN.—I certainly do. I am about to show how the difference—over £16,000,000—was spent, and why the Labour Party came into existence. Many honorable members think that the money was spent for the benefit of the people of Queensland. That is a mistake. It was not so spent, but was applied to a purpose of which the public had no idea. In 1891 the Government of Queensland received from loans and ordinary revenue £6,269,181, and spent only £5,836,847. Therefore, there was a surplus, somewhere, of £432,344. In 1892 the Government received from loans and revenue £6,907,985, and spent only £5,306,276, leaving a surplus, somewhere, of £1,601,709. In 1893 and 1894 the same kind of thing went on, and during the four years mentioned, a cash surplus of £3,007,755 was accumulated. Honorable members may regard that as a satisfactory result, but in view of the purpose to which the money was applied, there was no cause for congratulation. The Government placed that money in the hands of the Queensland National Bank.

Mr. PAGE.—Was that a coalition Government?

Mr. CULPIN.—It was the continuous Government.

Mr. PAGE.—But was it a coalition Government?

Mr. McCAY.—It was an alliance Government.

Mr. CULPIN.—It was a Government formed by the coalition of the McIlwraith and Griffith parties. In 1892 the Queensland National Bank held £1,403,000 of Government money.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I would remind the honorable member that the question before the Chair is "that the present Administration does not possess the confidence of this House." I have waited for some time in order to discover a possible connexion between the state of the finances of Queensland ten years ago and the question before the Chair, but I have not been able to do so. I trust that the honorable member will confine his remarks to the subject of the motion.

Mr. PAGE.—I believe that the honorable member wishes to connect his remarks with the motion by showing what was done by a coalition Government in Queensland and what is likely to result from our having a coalition Government in this Parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I have been listening to the honorable member for some minutes, with a view to discovering a connexion between his remarks and the subject of the motion, and I have not yet been able to perceive it.

Mr. CULPIN.—As I stated at the outset, my intention is to show that the object of the present Government is identical with that of the continuous Government in Queensland in 1893. It is possible that considerations similar to those which brought about the adoption of that policy by the Queensland Government may be actuating the present Government. As Ministers have declared that it is their policy to "down" the Labour Party, I think that I am justified in showing how the Queensland Government, which had a similar object, conducted its business. After having acted in such a manner as to bring the Labour Party into prominence, they afterwards tried to destroy it, but the Labour Party triumphed. I hope the same result will follow here. We have a perfect right to do our best to bring about the defeat of the present Government. Until the Labour Party in Queensland occupied the Opposition benches in sufficient force to make their influence felt, the Government continued to place their surplus funds in the hands of the Queensland National Bank. In 1892, the total liabilities of the bank amounted to £8,250,000, of which £1,250,000 was due to the Government. In 1893, the total liabilities stood at the same figure, but the cash deposited by the Government represented £2,250,000. In 1894, the total liabilities still amounted to £8,000,000, whilst the indebtedness to the Government amounted to £3,125,000. In 1895 the total liabilities remained the same, but no less than £3,564,000 was owing to the Government. Just before the Labour Party came into prominence, the Queensland Government sent home £600,000, which was placed in the Queensland National Bank in London for the purpose of paying interest on loans, but the bank retained it, and devoted it to other purposes.

Mr. SPEAKER.—I am very reluctant to interfere with any honorable member whilst he is addressing the House, but I am bound by the rules which I have to administer to see that the subject-matter of honorable members' speeches has some connexion with the question under discussion. I cannot discover any relationship between the subject which the honorable member is now discussing and the motion before the Chair.

Mr. CULPIN.—I had just about concluded my remarks upon that branch of my argument. I desire to point out that the policy of the present Government is identical with that which was adopted by the Queensland continuous Government, after it had pursued a most shameful course of conduct. When the Prime Minister outlined his policy, he also defined what he meant by the terms "labour" and "worker." It has frequently been asserted, as a reproach to the Labour Party, by persons who know better but who wish to appear ignorant, that it does not include professional men. As a matter of fact, that statement was recently made by the Daily Mail, a newspaper which is published in Brisbane, and which is gradually taking the place of the Brisbane Courier. It does not contain a particle of truth. Honorable members will perhaps pardon me if I refer to the definition of "working classes" which was given by the Prime Minister, because it is practically identical with that which I gave to the Melbourne Herald on the 11th July. He says—

The working classes include practically every class, because all, except idlers or parasites, are workers.

My definition of the term reads—

Exclude loafers, and you have a very simple problem. When you have cleared off the loafers and idlers, be they poor or wealthy, you have a mass who, in the main, are all working men. Starting with the Prime Minister, every member of Parliament who fulfils his parliamentary duties is a worker; but every man who, being elected to Parliament, evades his duties on the plea that business elsewhere takes him away, is a loafer, as far as Parliament is concerned. The rich man loafing is a loafer, the rich man with an honest profession, honestly attending to it, is a worker.

It will be noted that while the two definitions begin in the same way, my definition makes some progress. The Prime Minister does not belong to a progressive party, and consequently his definition makes no progress. The right honorable gentleman again indulged in definitions in the manifesto which he issued to the people of East Sydney. He said—

With us the term "labour" and the term "worker" have a broad and generous meaning. They are not the badges of a class or section, but the designation of the whole community.

But the very next quotation which I shall make from the utterances of the right honorable gentleman is strangely at variance with that sentiment. In addressing the Kyneton farmers he is reported to have said—

The time had come when it devolved upon him to stand right across the path of the Labour Party.

The continuous Government of Queensland said the same thing until it died. It was a person of the same stamp as the honorable member for Parramatta, the honorable member for Flinders, and the honorable member for Oxley, who asked George Stephenson what would happen to his locomotive if a cow were to stand right across the railway line? The answer of the inventor, it will be recollected, merely expressed fear for the cow. Similarly I think that in the present state of politics the locomotive will not wait for the cow. Then, again, the right honorable member for Swan declared that the Labour Party is attempting to deprive people of their property. Who believes him? Nobody. I ask the honorable member for Eden-Monaro, the honorable and learned member for Bendigo, and the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, whether they indorse his statement? Possibly it might be supported by as numerous a band as the defunct politicians whose funeral the honorable member for Oxley attended. In the Queensland Parliament, of seventy-two members, a remnant of seventeen supporters of the late continuous Government, remains. In reference to this question, I wish to quote the following passage from the Age :—

The two parties of liberalism and labour, which formerly invariably went to defeat under their divided flags, have achieved, in union, a notable victory. The Ministerialists have gained eight seats, having increased in numbers from thirteen to twenty-one; while the labour members in the new Parliament are thirty-five, as against twenty-three in the old House. Thus has come to an abrupt end one of the longest periods of Tory class domination of which Australian history furnishes any record. The old conservative party, which favours the policy of a black Queensland, and advocates the selling of vast tracts of land for nominal sums to large capitalistic syndicates; whose favorite plan of adjusting the finances is to impose what is virtually a heavy poll tax upon the working men, in order to keep up an extragant bureaucratic Civil Service; and whose idea of encouraging national progress is to offer concessions for the building of private railways on the rotten land grant system—such a party can no longer rule the destinies of the northern State now that it is brought face to face with a united Liberal-Labour combination. The lesson should not be lost upon Federal politicians and their supporters in the constituencies. Substantial achievements are only possible for liberals of all kinds when they march together under a flag of practical politics.

The honorable and learned member for Ballarat has been making "copy" for the newspapers. One of the remnants of that continuous Government who has been pensioned off in the nominee Chamber in Queensland, was in Victoria, and interviewed the honorable and learned member, as thus reported :—

Speaking with Mr. Deakin, the Queensland visitor was able to show very plainly what the effect has been in Queensland of the Act abolishing Polynesian labour. . . . Mr. Deakin's reply was—"See the kind of men Queensland has sent to represent it."

Mr. DEAKIN.—Has the honorable member got my telegram, in which I corrected that statement, and which was published in the Courier?

Mr. CULPIN.—As to the telegram, the newspaper extract is as follows :—

We yesterday received a telegram from Mr. Deakin which reads as follows :—

I hope honorable members will all pay attention to this.

"My remarks to Mr. Annear, reported in your paper of 17th, followed, and related to his statement that Queensland now regretted exclusion of kanaka labour, and had no relevance unless that is understood."

That I think was understood. The extract I read gives the exact information, and the honorable and learned member need not have troubled to send a correction. But the honorable and learned member wanted to make it appear that he corrected the statement—that is what he wanted.

Mr. MAUGER.—No, no; there is no doubt about the honorable and learned member's views on a White Australia.

Sir JOHN FORREST.—I think the honorable member for Brisbane is "off the rails" there.

Mr. CULPIN.—There is another contribution from this gentleman, to which he attaches no name—a statement which could only have been made by a vile cur, and it is a pity it was published. I intend to read the statement and also the names the writer mentions in the paragraph, and if there are any of those honorable members present, I hope they will repudiate having had anything to do with the matter. I say that this paragraph was communicated by a vile cur—if the communication was made to Mr. Annear, who is reported to have said—

The Queensland representatives, with one or two exceptions, seemed to have but little influence in the House. Prominent legislators had remarked to Mr. Annear—

The prominent legislators mentioned in the paragraph are Mr. Richard Edwards, Mr. George Reid, Mr. Deakin, and Sir John Forrest. I now give the paragraph referred to—

Prominent legislators had remarked to Mr. Annear—"Surely a city like Brisbane could have sent a representative whom we might really take seriously."

As to the refusal to recommit clause 48 of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill, the Prime Minister and the honorable member for New England stated that the amendment inserted had the same effect as the amendment which the honorable member for Bland intended to submit. That is a very misleading statement, and I ought not to allow the debate to conclude without offering a contradiction. The inserted amendment practically amounts to the same thing as though every member of this House had to be returned by an absolute majority of the electors in his constituency, whereas the amendment of the honorable member for Bland, instead of providing for an absolute majority, would be something like a proposal, which appears in the following newspaper extract—

The membership of the Wages Board in the shirt-making trade having expired by effluxion of time, the Minister of Labour has nominated the following persons to fill the vacancies:—Employers, Agnes Crawford, Ellen Eckersall, Charles McIntyre, R. A. Pryor, Thos. Stephens; Employes: Josephine Fogarty, Ada Gould, Elizabeth Kerrigan, Margaret M. Powell, Marie Stellner. If either employers or employes desire to object, one-fifth of the trade must do so within twenty-one days.

That is a reasonable proposal, the like of which I think might very well have been adopted.

Mr. FULLER.—Does the honorable member not believe in majority rule?

Mr. CULPIN.—I do, and so does the honorable and learned member for Illawarra. But that honorable and learned member would not believe in majority rule if it were necessary for him to be elected by an absolute majority of the electors in his constituency.

Mr. FULLER.—I always have been.

Mr. CULPIN.—By an absolute majority of the electors?

Mr. FULLER.—Yes; I had no opposition last time.

Mr. CULPIN.—I want to draw attention to an admirable statement made by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat on the question of a White Australia. It is as follows:—

A White Australia goes further than the preservation of the complexion of the people whose homes are here. It means the multiplying of those homes, so that we shall be strong enough to use and defend the whole of this Commonwealth. It means the maintenance of conditions of life fit for a white man and a white woman. It means equal laws and equal opportunities for all, and protection against the under-paid labour of other lands. It means social justice, so far as we can establish it, and the payment of fair wages. A White Australia means a civilization whose foundations are built in healthy lives, lived in honest toil, under circumstances that do not imply degradation. A White Australia means protection. We protect ourselves from armed aggression. Why not protect ourselves from aggression by commercial means? We protect ourselves against undesirable aliens; why not protect ourselves against the productions of the undesirable aliens' labour? Unless a White Australia is to have no more than a surface complexion, it must represent a policy which goes down to the roots of the national life from which the whole of our social system and political organization must spring.

On the other hand, we have the half-Minister, who represents Gippsland, anxious to shift the Chinese to Queensland. We do not want them.

Mr. McLEAN.—That is not correct.

Mr. CULPIN.—I am pleased to hear the honorable gentleman deny having made any statement of that kind. I really had not noticed the denial previously, and am pleased to accept it. But if that were done, what kind of a White Australia should we have in a few years under the Reid-McLean Ministry? I intended to say that, and I say it now, notwithstanding the honorable gentleman's denial. On paper it will "read" yellow, and "ma'clean" up piebald. I have given two or three quotations to show what this White Australia business means. The quotations made by the honorable and learned member for Indi, in his speech a little while ago, are important, in that connexion. He quoted the Prime Minister to the following effect:—

What is the hope of the great manufactures of Australia? How are we going to manufacture cheaply or to compete with the cheap labour of other countries? How are we going to compete with these under-paid, sweated countries until our own labour is under-paid and sweated too? In the plenitude of time, when our millions become tens of millions, we shall have a crop of misery which will solve the difficulty in regard to cheap manufactures.

When that quotation was made, the honorable member for Parramatta said that it was a shameful one. Does he reiterate that remark?

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I did not say that, but it does not matter.

Mr. CULPIN.—The honorable member said something very like it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Very like it.

Mr. CULPIN.—The honorable member spoke about reading the context

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Hear, hear.

Mr. CULPIN.—I have looked up the speech, because I wanted to see what kind of context it was which would alter the meaning of such words. The context is as follows:—

Will the erection of a fence solve it? Never.

I do not see how that alters the meaning of the passage in any way. But I have since come across something else that the Prime Minister said when he was in Queensland. I will quote it directly. In the same speech as that from which the honorable and learned member for Indi quoted, the right honorable gentleman said—

When there was a strike in an American factory what was the cure? A ship-load of these people from the south of Europe.

And I am sure from the context that that is what he meant. It is disgraceful to preach such a doctrine as that as a cure for strikes, and it shows that the right honorable gentleman does not believe in conciliation and arbitration.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Does the honorable member suggest that the Prime Minister favoured that remedy?

Mr. CULPIN.—He suggested it. Speaking at Toowoomba on 16th March, 1901, the Prime Minister again expressed his mind on this subject. He said—

He did not expect a protectionist to support him, and if he did he would call him a political humbug and a shuffler.

Mr. FRAZER.—Is the Minister of Trade and Customs listening?

Mr. CULPIN.—I wonder what the honorable member for Oxley says to that. In his appeal to the electors the honorable member said—

I am entirely in accord with the principles of conciliation and arbitration in industrial disputes; old-age pensions; such a Tariff as will not only meet the needs of the Commonwealth, but foster and encourage our local industries.

In the same speech as that from which I have already quoted, and which was delivered at Toowoomba, the Prime Minister spoke of fostering and encouraging our local industries. He said—

Let the Commonwealth Government establish the industries, and then they would be sure that the wages would be paid, and the proper hours kept, and no one could sweat any one or get the profit out of them.

Again, at a meeting at the exhibition at Brisbane during the same tour, he said—

Why not ask the Commonwealth Government to establish industries of the kind the country wanted, and employ men and give them fair wages with no sweating and no middleman's profit? They said that protection set up a standard of wages, but let them go to Victoria and try it. They could set it up in their factories, and then they saw how much they were paying and where the money went, and that the people working in the factories would be treated fairly, and that the State would have to bear the burden. He looked upon the records of the factories system in older nations, and he saw nothing in them to excite his enthusiasm. Still less did he see anything in them that he wished to transplant to this fair land of Australia.

Then the Prime Minister went on to talk of the New York slums, and of the woollen mills crowded with young children, and he said—

The best way to express their horror at such a result was to vote against the policy which created it.

One would imagine from hearing him talk thus that there was no sweating of that kind in free-trade England. But if we compare the labour conditions in England and America I think we shall have no doubt that those in England are the worse of the two. The man who raves about such things being the result of protection, when they exist also in free-trade England, is the man who is killing industrial legislation in Australia. The honorable and learned member for Wannon in his speech last week spoke about rags. He referred to "the ragged corner." He seemed to be anxious to protect his "uncle's" interests, for he again repeated the old chestnut about confiscating £8,000,000 of money deposited in the banks and substituting notes for it. I wish to point out that the continuous Government in Queensland got rid of £3,500,000 of the people's money, and put it into the coffers of the banks. Queensland has only half a million inhabitants, and if a State with such a population can be robbed of £3,500,000, a similar proportion for the whole of Australia, containing four and a half millions of people, would be £17,500,000. I think I am just as much entitled to speak of the Queensland Government confiscating that money as the honorable and learned member for Wannon is justified in saying that we propose to confiscate £8,000,000 of cash reserves. The suggested proposal is not really a confiscation in any way whatever. Honorable members, who talk so glibly about confiscating the banks' gold, wink at the way in which the people's gold is used by their party, when they have the whip-hand. They object to a reasonable system of note issue, accredited by time, and accepted by the people. Honorable members should also remember that such a note issue does great good for the people. It does for the people what Antonio did for his friends. He says—

I oft deliver'd from his forfeitures
Many that have at times made moan to me;
Therefore, he hates me.

Honorable members opposite who squirm, and object to this currency system, which is intended simply to help the people, are in the position of Shylock, when he says—

I hate him. . . .
But more, for that, in low simplicity,
He lends out money gratis, and brings down
The rate of usance here with us in Venice.
If I can catch him once upon the hip,
I will feed fat the ancient grudge I bear him.
He hates our sacred nation; and he rails
Even there where merchants most do congregate,
On me, my bargains, and my well-won thrift,
Which he calls interest.

That is the position of honorable members opposite, and not of honorable members of the Labour Party. Whose fault is it that this Australia of ours is still in the social condition which we left behind us in the Old Country, and in some cases in an even worse condition? The old Conspiracy Act of George III. is still in force in Queensland; and while we have here a continent large enough for 100,000,000 of people, we have, by our laws, given our best lands away. If any one coming here desires to settle on the land, although we have such a huge extent of territory, he must pay rent to some one else, whilst the people who hold the lands hold them for profit, and not for use. They make a profit from them, and obtain the unearned increment, whilst the increased value is made, not by the men who own the lands and receive the rents, but by the farmers and producers who occupy the lands and pay rents which are increased from time to time. That is the result of the unfair legislation which the Conservative Party, that has always been in power, have allowed to go on, and it is time now to make them step down, and let a more progressive party take a hand in legislation.

Mr. HUGHES.—I desire to make reference, by way of personal explanation, to a statement made by the honorable member for Parramatta the other evening. I have here some documents bearing on the matter to which, I think, the House will permit me to refer. The honorable member said that at the last general elections I had asked the Orange Party or the Protestant Party, to put my name on their list, and that I had not asked them to withdraw it.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I did not say that the honorable and learned gentleman had not asked them to withdraw it.

Mr. HUGHES.—I shall read what the honorable member quoted from Mr. Packer's wire—

Never asked to have name withdrawn from list.

I have here a copy of the Watchman, dated 5th December, 1903. No issue prior to that date contains my name. My statement is simply this: I said that I had not asked that my name should be included; and that when it was included, I requested that it should be withdrawn. I now put before the House and the country these documents as proof that what I said was a fact. In the issue of the Watchman for 5th December, 1903, there is given a list of Protestant candidates. Amongst that list my name occurs. That was a week and a few days before the last general election. In the issue of the same newspaper, dated Sydney, 12th December—the next issue of the paper—there is a list of Protestant candidates, for whom, of course, those who supported this newspaper, and the movement with which it was connected, were asked to vote. My name does not appear in that list. I think that in itself may be taken as conclusive evidence that my name was withdrawn at my request, since no other name that appears in the list, published on the 5th December, was withdrawn or altered in any way. I have a further statement which I received by wire on the 24th September, from Mr. Connington, who was connected with my committee, to this effect—

I remember hearing you at two meetings repudiate any sectarian nomination. You asked constituents not to vote for or against you under a misapprehension.

Mr. Connington's letter, which confirms that telegram, is also dated 24th September, and arrived here yesterday. He writes—

I have a distinct recollection of the circumstances in connexion with the election, and will, if necessary, swear that my telegram of 24th September, 1904, is absolutely correct.

I merely wish to put those documents forward. I think the House will indulge me so far. I have no wish at all to deny anything in connexion with the matter which actually occurred. I desire merely to say that I never asked Mr. Packer to do anything at all in the direction of including me in the list; that Mr. Packer had been a friend of mine, and that I thought he was still a friend, until I received a notification from the wire quoted by the honorable member for Parramatta that he was not. When he put my name in the list, as honorable members can readily see from these papers, I went to him, and I said, "Well, I ask you to put a letter in saying that I did not ask for or authorize such a thing." He said, "I cannot do that, because that would get me into trouble, since I put it in without authorization of the head body." That he withdrew it, at my request, I think, is pretty clear, because it was withdrawn whilst no other name was withdrawn, as honorable members will see by reference to the two issues of the Watchman to which I have referred. With this statement I shall leave the matter to the judgment of the House.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member is not entitled to discuss the question, but if he has an explanation to make on his own account, he is entitled to make it, though not to make any contribution in the nature of debate on the matter now before the Chair.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I am quite aware of that, Mr. Speaker. I was only going to say that the honorable and learned gentleman's statements to-night simply put him in issue with my authority. It is now a matter between the two of them. The position, as I understand it from the statement made to me, is that the honorable and learned member for West Sydney did ask to be put on the list, and when he found that that was not working for him, as he thought it would, in his electorate, he went and asked to be put out of the list.

Mr. BAMFORD.—This is another version.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—The honorable member can have a lot of versions if he wants them.

Mr. TUDOR.—We have not the slightest doubt about that.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I say that I prefer my informant to the honorable member, and I propose to stick to my informant too.

Mr. FRAZER.—If the first statement does not suit, it can be amended.

Mr. TUDOR.—The honorable member has got other versions.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—There are no other versions. The honorable and learned member for West Sydney himself admits going to see Mr. Packer.

Mr. HUGHES.—I did nothing of the sort, until my name was included in their list.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order!

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—And afterwards the honorable and learned gentleman said he had not been to see Mr. Packer.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Parramatta is debating the explanation made by the honorable and learned member for West Sydney. The honorable member is not entitled to do that. He is only entitled to explain any matter in respect to which he has been misrepresented or misunderstood.

Mr. JOSEPH COOK.—I merely wish to say that the statement I made the other night speaks for itself. It was upon that authority that it was made, and it has been corroborated by other gentlemen who know the facts of the case. They corroborate me, just as the honorable member's statements from his own electorate corroborate him. It is a matter of credibility, and there it must rest.

Mr. McLEAN (Gippsland—Minister of Trade and Customs).—As there have been so many personal explanations made in this debate, I desire to give another honorable member an opportunity to make one. When the honorable member for Kalgoorlie was addressing the House last Friday, he referred to the action of the Prime Minister and the right honorable member for Swan in addressing women's meetings, and he asked what they had to do with extending the franchise to women. He said that they had taken no action to enfranchise women, but now that women had been enfranchised they were doing all they possibly could to secure their votes. And then, seeing me sitting on the Treasury bench, he asked what did the Minister of Trade and Customs ever do in the way of giving the franchise to women. I interjected that I had been an advocate of women's suffrage before the honorable member was born.

Mr. FRAZER.—But the honorable gentleman did not put a measure on the statute-book, though!

Mr. McLEAN.—Unless the honorable member is much older than he looks, that statement is absolutely true. He went on to say that when I was Premier of Victoria I had the opportunity of bringing in legislation to extend the franchise to women, but that I had never attempted to do so.

Mr. FRAZER.—I said that the honorable member did not do so.

Mr. McLEAN.—That statement was lustily cheered by the honorable member for Melbourne, who, as an old member of the Victorian Legislature, knew perfectly well that he was cheering a statement which had no foundation in fact. I was taken back a little. I stated at the time that the extension of the franchise to women was one of the principal planks in the platform of my Government. The honorable member for Kalgoorlie then said that I never attempted to introduce a measure for that purpose. I looked up the matter, and I found that I brought in a Bill, which I carried through all its stages in the Legislative Assembly by the necessary statutory majority, and sent on to the Legislative Council. •

Mr. TUDOR.—And asked the Council to throw it out.

Mr. McLEAN.—That statement is absolutely incorrect. The representatives of my Government did all they possibly could to carry that Bill through the Legislative Council.

Mr. REID.—They will stick at nothing over there now.

Mr. McLEAN.—The interjection is on a par with other statements which have emanated from that side. But that is not all. The reason given by a number of members in the Legislative Council for opposing the Bill was that they did not believe that the electors of Victoria were in accord with the members of the Legislative Assembly in asking for its enactment. In order to test the matter, I then brought in a Bill to remit the question by way of referendum to the electors of Victoria. I carried that Bill through all its stages in the Legislative Assembly, and it also was lost in the Legislative Council. I can only tell my honorable friend, who is a young man of considerable promise, that if he were a little older, I would say perhaps a good deal more.

Mr. FRAZER.—Why did the honorable member not correct me at the time if I was misrepresenting him?

Mr. McLEAN.—Is that the best excuse which the honorable member can give?

Mr. FRAZER.—No.

Mr. McLEAN.—Does the honorable member make random statements?

Mr. FRAZER.—No, I shall make full and ample apology when I get an opportunity.

Mr. McLEAN.— I shall say no more about the matter if the honorable member acknowledges that he was wrong; but it is most unfortunate that a reckless statement of that kind should be made.

Mr. MALONEY.— It is not a reckless statement.

Mr. McLEAN.—Honorable members may accomplish their object of misleading the electors, and by that means placing the party which does not resort to those tactics at a temporary disadvantage.

Mr. MALONEY.—I say that the honorable gentleman left me without a seconder the first time a proposal was introduced to grant the franchise to women.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not know what the honorable member is referring to.

Mr. MALONEY.—Women's suffrage.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member knows that I supported women's suffrage every time it was introduced.

Mr. MALONEY.—I say that the honorable member did not, and Hansard proves that he did not.

Mr. McLEAN.—Perhaps the reference is to one of the honorable member's erratic motions, moved at a time when he knew it would not be discussed.

Mr. MALONEY.—What about the Maffra sugar business?

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member was always bringing in motions which were not intended for the House, but for the people outside, and I paid no attention to them.

Mr. MALONEY.—I never robbed the revenue of the country over the Maffra business.

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order!

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member knows that in regard to the matter to which he refers I have nothing to be ashamed of. He was one of those who helped to put hundreds of men out of employment in connexion with that industry.

Mr. MALONEY.—That is not true.

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable member for Melbourne will withdraw that remark.

Mr. MALONEY.—I withdraw the remark, and say that the statement is not correct.

Mr. McLEAN.—That interjection is on a par with a good many of the honorable member's statements. Coming to the matter more immediately under discussion, I find, from the complaints of the leader of the Opposition, for whom I have the highest respect and esteem, and complaints from the honorable and learned member for Indi—not in the present debate but in a recent debate—that the sins of this Government consist primarily in extending unfair treatment to our predecessors in office, and in coming into power as a result of that unfair treatment. A more egregious misstatement of facts was never uttered in a deliberative assembly. Such statements are childish and ridiculous to the last degree. During my political career I have never known a Government under similar circumstances to receive such indulgent treatment as was extended to our predecessors in office. What were the facts? When the late Government first took possession of the Treasury bench there were twenty-five or twenty-six members all told on this side in a House composed of seventy-five members. In spite of that grotesque condition of things, not a single member of the late Opposition ever challenged the position of the Government by moving a motion of no confidence.

Mr. TUDOR. — Because they were not game.

Mr. MAUGER.—Because they had not a ghost of a chance of carrying it.

Mr. McLEAN.—No member of the late Opposition, I repeat, ever moved a motion of no confidence in that Government. What were the conditions under which the late Government went out of office? At the instance of the Minister of Defence the House carried an amendment on a detail of the Arbitration Bill, to the effect that in the opinion of the Court, the unionists asking for preference should constitute a majority of the workers interested in that particular industry. That was carried by a majority of five votes. Then the Prime Minister immediately afterwards moved the adjournment of the House, and, when he met honorable members on the next day of sitting, said that he would ask them to reconsider their decision. But he then went outside the House, and told the press, who published his statements broadcast over the Commonwealth, that if honorable members would not reverse their decision, if they would not stultify themselves—because that is what it would have amounted to—his Government would resign office. Under that threat he afterwards asked the House to agree to the recommitment of certain clauses, including that in regard to which the threat had been made; but the members of the then Opposition very properly told him that they had discussed and settled the matter, and would not reopen it.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That was very fair, was it not?

Mr. McLEAN.—It was absolutely fair. If the honorable member understands anything about parliamentary practice, he must know that it is ridiculous to say that a Government is dealt with unfairly if it is given an opportunity, as the late Government was, to poll its last vote. Every vote in the House was accounted for on the occasion to which I refer.

Mr. WEBSTER.—On which division?

Mr. McLEAN.—On the division which determined the fate of the late Administration.

Mr. WEBSTER.—I was referring, not to that division, but to the snatch vote on the clause.

Mr. McLEAN.—How can the late Opposition be chargeable under the circumstances with unfair treatment? The late Government, in my opinion without justification or reason, chose to regard a defeat on a detail of the Bill as vital, and expected the Opposition, whose members, although they had never challenged their existence, did not believe in them, to stultify itself by reversing its previous vote. The next complaint levelled against us—if it can be so called—is because of the meagre policy which we have submitted to Parliament. That complaint comes with a very bad grace from our predecessors, after the policy which they submitted. They came into office when the session was four months younger than it was when we did so, and they had four months more in which to transact public business. But what measures did they submit, in addition to those proposed by us? The Seat of Government Bill, the High Commissioner Bill, a Royal Commission, and a slight amendment of the Post and Telegraph Act. The discussion of any one of those measures need not have occupied more than two or three days, and the Seat of Government Bill, which was practically the only debatable measure on the programme, was dealt with in three or four days.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That decided the fate of the Ministry.

Mr. McLEAN.—Those four small measures were all the late Government proposed for a session of four months longer than that at our disposal. We came into office after the House had been in session for six months, and when, if we desired to keep to the proper season for sitting, we should have been considering the question of closing the session.

Mr. McDONALD.—The Government have been considering that question ever since it took office.

Mr. McLEAN.—Then what measures did the late Government propose for its second session? It told us that it would bring in a Bill to annex some £8,000,000 worth of the banks' deposits, and another Bill to nationalize the tobacco industry. That, if I remember aright, is all that was foreshadowed for the second session.

Mr. THOMAS.—Was it not enough?

Mr. McLEAN.—I think that the present Government has made reference to a much larger number of measures, and certainly to measures much less mischievous than those of the late Government.

Mr. SPENCE.—What about an old-age pensions scheme?

Mr. McLEAN.—That was common to both programmes.

Mr. THOMAS.—Both the heads of the present Administration forgot to mention it.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member should not try to take advantage of an omission of that kind, since he knows that the subject was referred to by a leading member of the Government in the Senate on the day that we first met Parliament.

Mr. THOMAS.—I did not know it, because I was not in the Senate at the time.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member knew it when he made his interjection just now. He knew that the Government must have arranged to deal with the old-age pensions question, because, otherwise the Attorney-General would not have announced the fact in the Senate on the first day that we met the House. I maintain that, although we outlined a number of very important measures as those with which we intend to deal next session, the proper time to announce the programme for that session will be when the Governor-General delivers his speech in opening Parliament. Every old parliamentarian will bear me out in that. Even if we had omitted to refer to any of the work with which we intend to deal next session, that could not have been charged against us as a serious omission. As a matter of fact, however, we referred to a number of important measures with which we intend to deal, and to more than were referred to by the late Government as likely to find a place in their programme for the next session. Statements have been made to the effect that there is a secret understanding between the free-traders and the protectionists, which has not been made public, and that statement has been fathered—I do not know with what authority—on our friends in the corner, though I hardly think that any of them would make such a statement, since it is without the slightest shadow of foundation.

Mr. McDONALD.—Every one outside thinks that it is so.

Mr. McCAY.—Those in the Opposition corner do not.

Mr. McLEAN.—Those who practice that sort of thing are always prone to suspect others, but I can tell my honorable friends opposite that there was nothing in the shape of any understanding between those two parties that was not made as clear as noonday. The conditions of our alliance were embodied in the manifesto drawn up by the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, and there is no intention on our part to do anything whatever at variance with that programme.

Mr. MAUGER.—The Protectionist Party never agreed to that.

Mr. McLEAN.—The leader of the protectionists and the main body of the party agreed to it.

Mr. MAUGER.—The main body rejected it.

Mr. McLEAN.—As my honorable friend has referred to that matter, let him be fair. I would ask him what was the objection that was urged when that manifesto was read at our caucus meeting?

HONORABLE MEMBERS. — Oh! What? Caucus.

Mr. McLEAN.—The objection was that the fiscal truce did not go far enough.

Mr. REID.—Hear, hear!

Mr. McLEAN.—It was stated all round the room that we had already won a fiscal truce for the natural life of the present Parliament, and the honorable and learned member for Ballarat was asked if it would not be possible to induce the right honorable member for East Sydney to agree to an extension.

Mr. MAUGER.—No such resolution was carried, and the Minister knows it.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE. — The Minister's statement is absolutely untrue.

Mr. GROOM.—It is absolutely untrue, and the Minister knows it.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member for Melbourne Ports is wrong again. I did not say that any resolution was carried.

Mr. MAUGER.—Only two or three honorable members suggested it.

Mr. McLEAN.—I say that that was the almost unanimous view.

HONORABLE MEMBERS.—No, no.

Mr. McLEAN.—I did not hear a single voice raised that day in favour of reopening the fiscal question during the life of this Parliament.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am surprised to hear the Minister make such a statement.

Mr. McLEAN.—I thought it would take a good deal more than that to surprise my honorable friend.

Mr. STORRER.—I desire to explain—

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! The honorable member may raise a point of order, but he cannot make any remarks with any other object.

Mr. STORRER.—My point of order is that I was present at the meeting referred to and—

Mr. SPEAKER.—That is not a point of order. The honorable member cannot make an explanation at this stage.

Mr. REID.—Did any one ask that the fiscal truce should extend over a shorter period than was proposed?

Mr. McLEAN.—In rising at this stage of the debate I am placed at a great disadvantage, inasmuch as all the big guns in the Opposition corner have so far refrained from making their voices heard. I am compelled, therefore, to go back to the speech of the honorable and learned member for Indi, delivered during a recent debate, because, really, his speech, and that of the leader of the Opposition, contained the only charges—if charges they can be called—that require any reply. We know the great ability of the honorable and learned member, his fertility of resource, and his great command of language, and I must say that he used all these attributes to the utmost advantage in denouncing the action of the protectionist members who sit on this side of the House. He accused us of having abandoned our protectionist principles, and of having betrayed the cause of protection. These are very serious charges, and I think that they come with very bad grace from my honorable and learned friend, in view of his own action in the whole matter. Immediately after the elections the then Prime Minister, the honorable and learned member for Ballarat, announced that it was not intended to re-open the fiscal question during the life of the present Parliament. In spite of that announcement, my honorable friend continued to support the Government, and never uttered one murmur or complaint against their decision. When that Government went out of office, and were succeeded by the Labour Government, the honorable member for Bland made a similar announcement. He stated his intention, both in the House and at Wagga, in his own electorate, not to re-open the fiscal question during the life of this Parliament; and yet my honorable and learned friend supported that Government throughout the term for which they held office, without one complaint or murmur about their omission to re-open the fiscal question.

Mr. MAUGER.—I raised the question.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am not speaking of my honorable friend, but of a much more formidable, a much more able man.

Mr. MAUGER.—No one disputes that.

Mr. McLEAN.—The moment the late Government were defeated, my honorable and learned friend called together his little band of seceding protectionists—for what purpose?

Mr. ISAACS.—The Minister means the succeeding protectionists.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not care to use the term "deserters."

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—We are better than the traitors on the Government side of the Chamber.

Mr. McLEAN.—The object of that meeting was to find a pretext to justify honorable members in deserting their leader, abandoning their election pledges, and joining forces with the Labour Party.

Mr. HUME COOK.—Why did the leader of the protectionists accept terms that were previously rejected?

Mr. McLEAN.—The present Government was not formed, and, if I am not mistaken, the Prime Minister had not even been sent for to form the present Administration, when the honorable and learned member commenced negotiations with the Labour Party to re-open the Tariff.

Mr. MAUGER.—The Minister is wrong—it was afterwards.

Mr. McLEAN.—Was not that the object of the alliance that was entered into—will my honorable friend deny it?

Mr. REID.—It was something else. It was another crutch.

Mr. McLEAN.—I believe that there were three planks in the platform of the seceders, and they were very important ones. I would be the very last to underrate their significance. One of the planks was the revision of the Tariff; another referred to the Manufactures Encouragement Bill; and the third had reference to preferential trade. If my honorable friends had fought for these provisions, I could have understood their action. No doubt they did fight for them, but what did they get? So far as the public can ascertain from all the published statements and from the manifesto of the alliance which has been issued, they did not obtain a single concession in return for their support of the Labour Party, except immunity from opposition at the coming election. I think it is only fair to the honorable and learned member for Indi to say that he could not have been thinking of himself when he stipulated for that condition, because we know perfectly well that the Labour Party could not affect his chances in his own constituency.

Mr. ISAACS.—How does the Minister know that I made any such stipulation? It is a mere assumption upon his part.

Mr. McLEAN.—Stipulated for what?

Mr. ISAACS.—For immunity from opposition.

Mr. SPENCE.—They did not make that stipulation.

Mr. REID.—The stipulation is contained in the document.

Mr. McLEAN.—At any rate, I think it is a reasonable assumption, when we know that the stipulation is contained in the manifesto, and when we have had a recent admission from the leader of the Opposition that he had no right to put it there without consulting his masters outside.

Mr. ISAACS.—I never heard that admission from the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. McLEAN.—My honorable friend should have attended the meeting which was held on Sunday at the Queen's Hall, and he would have heard something very like it.

Mr. McDONALD.—The Minister was not present anyhow.

Mr. McLEAN.—No; I do not attend political meetings on Sunday. I think that six days a week are ample to devote to politics. A man must be a glutton who would give up the seventh day to a political discussion.

Mr. ISAACS.—Then why did the Minister advise me to attend?

Mr. McLEAN.—I did not. I should have respected my honorable friends—although it was in violation of their election pledges—if they had insisted on the concessions which they demanded upon the three great questions to which I have referred. But when I find that they surrendered their claims without receiving any consideration other than that which I have stated, I am forced to the conclusion that there was some other motive for their action, which has not been divulged. It is not for me to suggest the nature of that consideration. Every honorable member can fill in the blank according to his own imagination. I would remind my honorable friends in the first place that their action constituted a distinct violation of their hustings pledges. I am aware that the honorable and learned member for Indi was not opposed at the last election, and probably he gave no pledge. But the utterances of several honorable members in the Opposition corner, including the honorable member for Hume, the honorable member for Bourke, and the honorable and learned member for Darling Downs—

Mr. GROOM.—I was not opposed.

Mr. McLEAN.—But the honorable and learned member made a statement which I am sure he will not deny.

Mr. GROOM.—Hear, hear!

Mr. McLEAN.—The only other member of the party who spoke during the course of the debate was the honorable and learned member for Corio. He manfully admitted that he had pledged himself to his constituents in favour of fiscal peace. He informed us that he released himself from that pledge on the ground that there had been a change of Government. What that circumstance had to do with the deliberate violation of an election pledge I have yet to learn. However, that is a matter between himself and his constituents. My point is that the honorable and learned member admits that he pledged himself to fiscal peace during the life of the present Parliament. We also know that the leaders of the three parties in the House immediately after it assembled, declared that the result of the general elections had been to secure fiscal peace during this Parliament. I may be pardoned, perhaps, if I read a few extracts bearing upon this point. The honorable and learned member for Ballarat said—

The fiscal issue is dead and buried during this Parliament, at all events.

The present Prime Minister said—

I recognise that that is the verdict of the constituencies.

The honorable member for Bland said—

I share the gratification of the Prime Minister that with the last election, the issue, as between free-trade and protection, has disappeared for some time to come, at any rate, so far as the Tariff is concerned.

Further on he said—

Practically the fiscal issue is dead, at any rate, so far as this Parliament is concerned.

Again, on the 12th November, he said that under no circumstances would he be a party to the disturbance of the fiscal peace now reached. Speaking at Wagga on the 9th August last—

Mr. REID.—Why, that was only last month.

Mr. McLEAN. — Speaking at Wagga upon the 9th August, the honorable member said—

I believe there is no probability of any appeal for an alteration of the Tariff being responded to during this present Parliament.

I admit at once that if honorable members subsequently received information which, in their opinion, justified them in reopening the question in the interests of the country, they would be warranted in doing so. But before taking such action, I certainly think that they should take their constituents into their confidence. They should resign their seats. The honorable member for Melbourne Ports laughs at the idea of resigning his seat. I can quite understand that that laugh comes from his very heart. If my honorable friends felt so strongly upon this question, how is it that they entered into an alliance with the Labour Party, by giving up every tittle of what they claimed? Not a single shred of comfort for them is contained in the manifesto which has been issued concerning either of the three questions to which I have referred. In regard to the Manufactures Encouragement Bill, every honorable member of the alliance is to have "freedom of action as to method of control." In other words he is to be at liberty to do exactly as he likes. When my honorable friends agreed to that they knew perfectly well that the Labour Party, which outnumbered them by two or three to one, would to a man, favour State control, notwithstanding the fact that the States will not nationalize the industry.

Mr. McDONALD.—Do not be too sure of that; one State in the group is very likely to take the matter up.

Mr. REID.—Is that Fiji?

Mr. McLEAN.—Then it is provided that preferential trade is to be "discussed by the joint parties." What a definite forward movement that is! Then the Tariff is to be "inquired into." The greatest opponent of the revision of the Tariff might agree to those conditions without abating one jot of his convictions. I believe that the free-traders would not be more averse to an inquiry than would the protectionists.

Mr. ISAACS.—There is provision for something more than an inquiry.

Mr. REID.—It is not worth more than a ticket for a soup kitchen.

Mr. McLEAN.—Let us hear the magnificent provision which follows:—

Legislation (including Tariff legislation) shown to be necessary.

(1) To develop Australian resources. (2) To preserve, encourage, and benefit Australian industries, primary and secondary. (3) To secure fairer conditions for labour for all engaged in every form of industrial enterprise, and to advance their interests and well-being without distinction of class or social status.

Mr. REID.—Indi again!

Mr. McLEAN. — That is magnificent. But what follows?

(4) As to any regulation arising under this paragraph only, any member of either party may, as to any specific proposal—

Now listen to this—

(a) Agree with the members of his own party to be bound by their joint determination, or

(b) Decide for himself how far the particular circumstances prove necessity, or the extent to which the proposal shall be carried.

A lot of magnificent proposals are laid down, and then we have "a" and "b" taking any particular starch or benefit out of them. I must say that when I read this document, I thanked my stars, for the sake of my old friend, the honorable and learned member for Indi, that he had not gone any further in alphabetical order. If he gave up everything he had contended for in the two initial letters of the alphabet, it would be sad to contemplate what he might have done when he had reached the letter "z." I fancy I can hear the honorable and learned member bargaining, not for himself—I admit that he has no necessity to do that—but for some of his followers, with the leader of the Opposition, to spare them at the election. I can imagine that I hear the polite and gentlemanly leader of the Opposition telling him in the language of the poet—

I will place thee in a sylvan bower
And guard thee like a tender flower.

The honorable and learned member for Indi, in his facetious manner, went on to describe the parties sitting on this side of the House as a "sexless" combination. I can only say that if my honorable friend, in his negotiations with, and his final surrender to, the leader of the Opposition, showed any political sex it certainly was not the masculine sex. The honorable and learned member promised to "love, honour, and obey" the leader of the Opposition on condition of receiving what the weaker vessel always receives, even in a savage land, from her lord and master—personal protection. But the honorable and learned member went on, and promised the leader of the Opposition a very numerous family, which, in his own graphic language, was to comprise "all the progressive forces of the Commonwealth." We can imagine "all the progressive forces of the Commonwealth" being galvanized into life, and action being taken on such a soul-stirring plank as that preferential trade is to be "discussed." The honorable and learned member went still further. He agreed to constitute himself a sort of decoy duck to lure any erring spirits from this side of the House to the labour fold. Really, the appeal he made the other evening to honorable members to cross the floor was most touching—it was made with all the blandishments that my honorable and learned friend can command. I presume the reason he called us a "sexless" lot was that there was not a rush to cross. I am sure he must have realized during all these trying negotiations the truth of the lines—

Oh, what a tangled web we weave,
When first we practise to deceive.

In the same spirit, on the very day that the motion of no-confidence was tabled, the honorable and learned member perpetrated a most magnificent farce. He rose, and in austere manner, and, with an air of pristine innocence and almost vestal purity, gave notice of his intention to move, next day, for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the working of the present Tariff. I need hardly say that that idea was borrowed from the Minister of Defence, who had expressed an opinion in that direction, in a press interview, some days before. That, however, is not the important point. When the honorable and learned member for Indi gave notice of that motion, he knew that as soon as he sat down the leader of the Opposition would give notice of a motion which would arrest all business—a motion which my honorable friend had no doubt helped to frame, and which, if successful, was intended to result in a general election. That is what the late Government asked the Governor-General to grant them, and what they were working for. But if the motion of which the leader of the Opposition at that time was prepared to give notice were successful, my honorable and learned friend knew that it would be utterly impossible ever to reach the question involved in his motion. Of course it was a splendid electioneering cry. My honorable friends opposite seem to be adepts at that sort of thing. I know that my honorable and learned friend has great ability, and I am sure that there are very few honorable members who respect him more highly than I do. But in matters of this kind we have to speak out plainly; and I must say that my honorable and learned friend displayed a capacity for acting which I never gave him credit for. The whole thing was about as clever a piece of acting as it has ever been my good fortune to see. It may have been a little overdone. For instance, the anguish that my honorable and learned friend expressed at the havoc that was being wrought by the present Tariff was, I think, a little overdrawn; and the indignation that he expressed against the protectionists on this side of the House was perhaps a little too terrible when we remember that both of those emotions had slumbered peacefully for the previous nine months, and had only been suddenly galvanized into existence when the Labour Government were turned out of office. I am reminded forcibly of a countryman of my own, who, having failed to see the point of a joke, racked his brains for two days in the effort to discover it. At last, having found a wrong and not the real point of the joke, he laughed most heartily, and said, "Eh, mon, it was guid." And then he added, "And it flashed on me a' o' a sudden." This necessity for an immediate revision of the Tariff must have flashed on my honorable and learned friend "a' o' a sudden" when the Labour Party went out of office. My honorable and learned friend referred in rather scathing terms to the reactionaries and conservatives on this side of the House. Any one who will express any serious fear of an influx of the conservative element into a Parliament which is elected on the most democratic franchise that the world has ever seen must be trying—I do not care to use harsh terms, but he certainly cannot be very sincere in his denunciation. Honorable gentlemen who are so ready to denounce what they call the conservative element know perfectly well that if four, five, or half-a-dozen persons having conservative leanings get into a House of seventy-five members, it is the utmost that can be expected under such a franchise as we have. They know also that those persons cannot possibly do any harm. They cannot retard progressive legislation.

Mr. SPENCE.—If they hold the balance of power they can.

Mr. McLEAN.—At the same time our honorable friends know that honorable members opposite, who are quite as exclusive as is the most crusty conservative, are a much more dangerous body.

Mr. REID.—Hear, hear; a Masonic Lodge.

Mr. McLEAN.—But it is a safe thing to rail at a weak party, and it is probably a prudent thing to speak well of what is really a rising party. The leader of the Opposition complained bitterly of the remark I made to the effect that the Labour Party represented only a section of a class. I should be very sorry indeed to misrepresent my honorable friends in any way. I can assure them that so far as the personnel of the party is concerned no one has more respect for them than I have, or more friendly feelings towards them. But I spoke from the evidence of my own senses in this House what I believed then, and what I still believe, to be literally and absolutely true.

Mr. SPENCE.—How could we get here without being elected in the same way as other honorable members?

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not mean to say that persons of no other class vote for my honorable friends opposite. I know perfectly well that they do. But when my honorable friends enter this House what consideration do they show those other persons who vote for them? Whom do they represent outside? Trade unionists? They certainly do not represent the free labourers.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—We do.

Mr. McLEAN.—This is most extraordinary.

Mr. SPENCE.—We desire fair play for everybody.

Mr. McLEAN.—And yet my honorable friends support legislation which would rob the free labourer of his means of living.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That is not correct.

Mr. McLEAN.—They do more. They abuse them in language which I hardly like to repeat. Such terms as "scab," "blackleg," and "members of the criminal classes," are the epithets that are hurled by members of the Labour Party at free labourers.

Mr. HUME COOK.—The free-traders have called the protectionists robbers?

Mr. MCCAY.—What did the honorable member call the Labour Party?

Mr. SPEAKER.—Order! I am sorry to have to mention the name of the Minister of Defence, but this is the second time he has offended. I must ask that these interjections across the Chamber shall be absolutely repressed.

Mr. McLEAN.—With the exception of a few days given to the consideration of the Seat of Government Bill, the Labour Government while in office devoted practically the whole of their time to the consideration of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill. I was a constant attendant in the House, and I never heard a member of that party advocate any provision from the employers stand-point.

Mr. SPENCE.—There was no need for that. They had plenty of friends to do that for them.

Mr. McLEAN.—Honorable members opposite cannot claim to represent them. They cannot claim to represent the free labourers. I should, therefore, like to know whom my honorable friends opposite represent outside trade unionists?

Mr. SPENCE.—We are prepared to give everybody fair play, and that should be all that is needed.

Mr. McLEAN.—I admit that they represent trade unionists well. They are certainly true to their pledges to those people. I have never known them desert trade unionists on any occasion whatever. I still say, judging from all that I have seen, that whoever may support them at the elections, when they come into this House honorable members of the Labour Party represent only one section of the workers, and that is the trade unionists. During this debate we have heard a good deal about Socialism. I have been a little exercised about my honorable friends' eagerness to deny that they sympathize with Socialism.

Mr. KING O'MALLEY.—Nobody here denies it. I am a Socialist from my toes to my nose.

Mr. McLEAN.—What is a Socialist? All authorities I have read on the subject assert that the ultimate end of Socialism is the nationalization of land, of capital, and of industries. I think my honorable friends opposite will admit that.

Mr. WEBSTER.—They will admit anything.

Mr. McLEAN.—It is on that point that I join issue with them. As for their present milk-and-water programme, there is no great harm in it. I am sure I should have been quite willing to have let my friends opposite remain in possession of the Treasury bench while dealing with their milk-and-water legislation. I do not know that I should have been wise in doing so, because when we know that men are travelling on a dangerous road to a goal that we know would be destructive to the best interests of the country, the sooner their progress is arrested the better it will be for all concerned.

Mr. THOMAS.—That is why we have proposed a motion of want of confidence in honorable gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McLEAN.—When the honorable member for Darling, whom we all respect, beamed on us the other day for five solid hours, he devoted his time to teaching us the beauties of Socialism, and the great attractions and advantages of State control. The honorable member even went so far as to tell us that in regard to the care of children the mother is not in it with the State.

Mr. SPENCE.—I did not. I merely quoted facts.

Mr. McLEAN.—My honorable friend told us that children that were farmed out by the State were infinitely better cared for than those under the care of any mother.

Mr. SPENCE.—I did not. I said that in South Australia the record of babies farmed out is a favorable one. That is merely a fact which can be ascertained by any honorable member.

Mr. McLEAN.—My honorable friend went on to point out the beauties and advantages of land nationalization. He told us that when the State secured possession of the land, it would have so much money coming in from it that the Government could remit taxation in every direction, and could run railways free for the convenience of the people. But the honorable member never once told us how the State is to get possession of the land. Surely there are only two ways by which the State can get possession of the land—by purchase or by confiscation? The honorable member for Darling would not, I believe, advocate confiscation. I am only saying that there are two ways of obtaining possession.

Mr. SPENCE.—I did not advocate either.

Mr. McLEAN.—I understand from my honorable friends opposite that they have no sympathy with the confiscation of private property. Is not that so? Well, then, my honorable friends must intend to buy the land. Am I right there?

Mr. REID.—Tax it first.

Mr. McLEAN.—That shows the unfortunate position of gentlemen who have no knowledge whatever of business matters. It looks splendid—most attractive. But let us come closer to the question. In order to buy the land you must, in the first place, borrow the money to buy it with.

Mr. SPENCE. — It is unnecessary to do that.

Mr. McLEAN.—Take the case of Victoria. Victoria has, I think — speaking from memory — 24,000,000 or 25,000,000 acres of alienated land. If, leaving out city land, we put the value down at, say £4 per acre—that is, I think, a moderate estimate of the value—we should have, in the first place, to borrow about £100,000,000 to buy out the Victorian privately-owned land. How is the value of land ascertained? The real value of land is the capitalization of its net income, computed at the current rate of interest. That is the rental value of land, the tenant paying all local taxes. The rental value of land should represent the annual interest. Therefore the rent that my honorable friends would receive—even if they got the highest rent that the most grasping private land-owner could get, and tenants will not give more than the interest represented by the profits from the land—

Mr. SPENCE.—Why, then, did the honorable gentleman advocate compulsory land resumption?

Mr. McLEAN. — I advocated a very different kind of land resumption. I will tell my honorable friend later what I advocated, but I will deal with this question first. There would be no money left from the rents to go to the State. But the State would have to provide for the interest connected with it. The State would also have to provide the enormous expenditure involved in supervision—the supervision that is at present exercised by the individual land-owner, and that would amount to an enormous sum. What then becomes of my honorable friends' millions that are to be rolling in, and which will enable them to abolish the freights on the railways? Another phase of this question of State-owned land is this: Every one who understands the question knows that land that has been cultivated by a tenant, unless it is cultivated under the most stringent conditions and the most careful supervision, will, in the course of a few years, be exhausted. It is absolutely necessary to give back to the land the properties that are extracted from it by cultivation. We can imagine therefore the amount of supervision that would be necessary on the part of the State in order to keep the land from being impoverished or exhausted by the tenants.

Mr. BATCHELOR.—Is this part of the Government policy?

Mr. McLEAN.—It is part of my honorable friends' policy, and I am showing what they are working towards and what constitutes a very serious menace to the future prospect of Australia if they become strong enough to govern.

Mr. SPENCE.—Yet the honorable gentleman supported it himself?

Mr. McLEAN.—I will tell my honorable friend what I supported. I supported the purchase of land for the purpose of dividing it into small holdings and planting a peasant proprietary on the soil, and I looked to the purchasers being able to pay for that land by the labour that they put into it each year. My anticipations in that respect have been thoroughly justified by the experiments we have made. I believe that it is a sound policy to plant an industrious yeomanry on the soil.

Mr. WEBSTER.—That is our policy.

Mr. McLEAN.—No. My honorable friend's policy is that of the tenant and the landlord, the State being the landlord, and the people who work the land the tenants, who are personally interested in taking all they can extract, and giving back as little as possible in return.

Mr. WEBSTER.—The honorable gentleman's policy is that of the mortgagee and the borrower.

Mr. McLEAN.—The policy of closer settlement is, I believe, a sound and healthy one. I should like to see all the good productive land of Australia in the hands of small holders, who would have a personal interest in preserving it from impoverishment and exhaustion. These men would be the best colonists we could have. They would have a vested interest in the country, and would do nothing to endanger its welfare or progress.

Mr. SPENCE.—The honorable gentleman is on the same platform as we are.

Mr. McLEAN.—When the leader of the Opposition was twitting the Government with its intention to confer with the States Governments during the recess, he told us, in a high-handed manner, that he would not treat with the States Governments, but would appoint a High Commissioner for the Commonwealth straight away, and trust to public opinion compelling them to transfer to him the work which the Agents-General are now performing.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Where did he say that?

Mr. McLEAN.—He used words to that effect.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Let the honorable gentleman quote his words.

Mr. McLEAN.—How can I quote the exact words? My honorable friend will find the words in Hansard, and the honorable member for Bland will not deny that he used them. He is too honorable and straightforward to deny what he said.

Mr. THOMAS.—No one would care to deny what he said; we only ask the honorable gentleman to quote his words.

Mr. McLEAN.—Those are his words, as nearly as I can remember them.

Mr. THOMAS.—As nearly!

Mr. McLEAN.—He said that he would appoint a High Commissioner during the present session, and he added that public opinion would compel the States Governments to come into line at once.

Mr. SPENCE.—That is, those who refused to come in by negotiation.

Mr. McLEAN.—Negotiating with a pistol held at their heads.

Mr. SPENCE.—Hear, hear; a good way too, sometimes.

Mr. McLEAN.—That statement showed a want of business tact and diplomatic skill which, in my judgment, would utterly unfit any person holding those opinions for the leadership of the Government of the Commonwealth.

Mr. FISHER.—I think that the honorable gentleman is doing the leader of the Opposition an injustice. What he said was that the appointment of a High Commissioner was necessary, and, no doubt, the States would see to their own affairs.

Mr. McLEAN.—The leader of the Opposition said that public opinion would compel the States to come into line. I distinctly remember him using those words.

Mr. SPENCE.—That was in answer to an interjection.

Mr. McLEAN.—That was dealing with the States Governments, who have rights under the Constitution, in precisely the same way that the honorable gentleman tried to deal with the House when he held out a threat if we did not eat our own words and reverse our vote he would go out of office.

Mr. WEBSTER.—He said that if the Opposition did not give his Government time to discuss the question he would go out of office.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member can give his own version. The leader of the Opposition ridiculed our idea of conferring with the States Governments with a view to have a uniform system of old-age pensions for the Commonwealth in place of the systems now in operation in New South Wales and Victoria. He told us that he would pass an Old-Age Pensions Bill, irrespective of the views of the States. Is not that a threat?

Mr. THOMAS.—He said he would establish old-age pensions whether the States would agree or not.

Mr. McLEAN.—What sort of a position should we be in to negotiate with the States Governments if we told them beforehand, "We are going to negotiate with you, but unless you do exactly as we tell you we shall proceed without you?"

Mr. THOMAS.—He did not say any such thing.

Mr. McLEAN.—That is the inevitable inference to be drawn.

Mr. THOMAS.—That is not correct, and the honorable gentleman knows it is not. He is most unfair, and I am surprised at him.

Mr. McLEAN.—What construction would any one put on the honorable gentleman's statement, but that he would proceed with an Old-Age Pensions Bill whether the States would agree to his proposal or not?

Mr. THOMAS.—Will this Government give us old-age pensions?

Mr. McLEAN. — When the honorable member rises he can speak about the Government. I am speaking about the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. FRAZER.—We will admit that much.

Mr. McLEAN.—I am glad that my honorable friend admits it.

Mr. FRAZER.—Only that much.

Mr. McLEAN.—Whenever we spoke of our honorable friends opposite as being under the domination of outside organizations, we were invariably met with a contradiction from their side. We were told that they were absolutely independent of outside organizations. When we mentioned that the minority must bow to the decision of the majority in caucus, that was denied, in spite of the fact that we had before us the pledge that every member of the party has to sign before he goes up for election. When speaking to their masters outside —

Mr. THOMAS.—Are not the people outside the honorable gentleman's masters as well as ours?

Mr. McLEAN.—Not in the same sense. We are not the bondsmen of certain organizations outside. What did the leader of the Opposition say on Sunday night, when he addressed the audience that assembled in the Queen's Hall, Melbourne?—

It was true the labour Members of Parliament were the result of organizations, were governed by the rules of organizations, worked by a platform prepared by organizations, and had to abide by decisions in caucus.

That is all we ever asserted about the Labour Party.

Mr. TUDOR.—No.

Mr. McLEAN.—I never heard any one go further than that.

Mr. THOMAS.—Nonsense.

Mr. McLEAN. — I do not see how it would be possible for any one to go further, because the honorable member for Bland admits that the Labour Party are the creation of these organizations, are governed by their rules, and are compelled to abide by the decision of a majority in caucus—

Mr. THOMAS.—On the platform.

Mr. McLEAN.—On matters affecting the platform, which is a very much wider thing.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Honorable members on the other side are in the same fix.

Mr. McLEAN.—If we were all in the same fix, I could tell the honorable member how the House would be situated at the present time. If we had a caucus, and the majority could compel the minority to sit with them, speak with them, and vote with them, the honorable and learned member for Indi and his friends would be here, in their proper place, supporting us.

Mr. MAUGER. — The caucus decided against the honorable gentleman, and he knows that it did.

Mr. McLEAN.—My honorable friends opposite admit that the members on this side constitute a majority of the Protectionist Party.

Mr. ISAACS.—If we had all kept our pledges, the honorable gentleman would be still on this side of the House.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not know whom my honorable and learned friend means by "we."

Mr. MAUGER.—The majority of the caucus, and the honorable member knows it.

Mr. McLEAN.—I did not accuse the honorable and learned member for Indi of breaking his pledges.

Mr. KENNEDY.—Were we not free to vote as we thought fit?

Mr. SPEAKER.—The honorable members for Moira and Echuca, and I think the Prime Minister, though the Minister of Trade and Customs being in front of him I could not hear distinctly, have been guilty of an offence to which I have drawn attention two or three times, that is, of conversing across the chamber. I would also remind the honorable and learned member for Indi, and the honorable member for Melbourne Ports, that they will both have an opportunity to speak later on, and therefore I hope that they will not continue their interjections.

Mr. McLEAN.—All the members now sitting in the Opposition corner should be supporting the Government with voice and vote, and would then be doing a much wiser thing for themselves and their country than they are now doing. I wish to say in conclusion—because the hour is late, and I have spoken longer than I intended—that it is the earnest desire of this Government, and all our actions will be devoted to that end, to make Australia a land worth living in, and not a place to be avoided. We believe that the best way to do that will be to stimulate and to encourage primary production and industrial enterprise by every legitimate means in our power.

Mr. ISAACS.—That is our platform.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable and learned member and those with him have given that up with their "a" and "b" provisions. We make no such surrender. We shall endeavour to secure to every man and woman in the Commonwealth the legitimate reward of their honest toil.

Mr. SPENCE.—By what means?

Mr. McLEAN.—By the means which we have announced in our platform, and by other legislation on the same lines. In the true spirit of the Constitution, which provides that every man and woman in the Commonwealth shall have an equal voice in framing the law, we shall endeavour to make them equal before the law.

Mr. FRAZER.—When speaking to the motion now before the House, I said—

The honorable member for Gippsland may have stated on the hustings his belief in woman's franchise; but, although he was Premier of Victoria for a considerable time, he did not introduce a Bill to give effect to that belief.

I was led to make that statement because of my knowledge that the women of this State are not enfranchised under the Victorian law, and the Minister did not correct me at the time.

Mr. McLEAN.—Yes, I did.

Mr. FRAZER.—The honorable gentleman has since repudiated the charge, and on looking through the records of the Victorian Parliament when he was in office, I have ascertained that he introduced a Bill, and then a second Bill, providing for the submission of the question to a referendum of the people. I wish, therefore, to unreservedly withdraw my former statement, and to ask the Minister and the House to accept my assurance that when I made it I believed it to be correct.

Mr. McLEAN.—Hear, hear. That is manly.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE (Hume).—Before asking for an adjournment of the debate, I think it right, since certain statements have been made by the Minister of Trade and Customs, to say a word or two on a subject which I regret has been brought before the House. I refer to the divulgence of certain proceedings which took place in a caucus of the Protectionist Party, under the seal of confidence.

Mr. McLEAN.—Who violated the confidence?

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—The Minister: and he has made a statement which, I regret to say, is not in accordance with what took place. He said that a majority of those present were in favour of a longer extension of the fiscal truce than was proposed in the memorandum submitted by the then leader of the party; but the only member whom I heard say a word in reference to the matter was the honorable and learned member for Bendigo.

Mr. McLEAN.—I heard many honorable members express that opinion.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Two or three others may have done so. I did not hear them, and no vote was taken on the question.

Mr. McLEAN.—The honorable member was himself in favour of extending the time.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I was absolutely against it.

Mr. McLEAN.—I do not say at the caucus, but when addressing the electors at Albany.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—I am speaking of what took place at the caucus. I shall have something else to say about what has been alleged, in reference to my statements elsewhere. I am referring now to statements which have been made to-night in reference to the proceedings which took place at the caucus, and I wish my refutation of them to be published side by side with the statements themselves. The Minister also said that a majority of the protectionists were in favour of a coalition, and in refutation of that statement, I wish to say that there was a unanimous decision not to join under the leadership of the present Prime Minister. It was a clear understanding that, before any further steps of any kind were taken, another meeting of the party would be called; but such a meeting has never been called. I am sorry that these matters have been referred to, but as statements have been made which are quite contrary to what really took place I have felt bound to say a word or two in regard to them. I shall not proceed to-night with the remarks which I wish to make on the motion before the House, because they will take some little time, and I think that I am justified in asking for an adjournment of the debate until to-morrow.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—I desire to make a personal explanation. I regret that any private conversation which took place at the meeting of the Liberal-Protectionists has been disclosed this evening; but, as the honorable member for Hume has mentioned my name, I wish to state most distinctly that I never advocated an extended term for any coalition.

Sir WILLIAM LYNE.—Whv, the honorable and learned member moved it.

Sir JOHN QUICK.—What I said was that if there was to be a coalition, it would be ridiculous to terminate it upon the eve of a general election, and that it ought to be extended over two Parliaments. Therefore the honorable member for Hume places me in a false position when he suggests that I advocated an extended term for a coalition. The honorable member ought to know that I opposed the coalition. I drafted the following resolution:—

Resolved, That the present circumstances do not render advisable either of the proposed coalitions or alliances, and that every effort should be made to maintain the unity and integrity of the Liberal Party.

So far as I am concerned, I have endeavoured to give effect to that resolution, and I am no party to any coalition.

Debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

MOTION OF WANT OF CONFIDENCE.

Mr. REID (East Sydney—Minister of External Affairs).—I move—

That the House do now adjourn.

In the interests of the public, I must suggest that this debate should not become interminable. We have already been sitting here discussing this very simple proposition, regarding which every one has made up his mind from the first, for more than a week, and I hope that, in the interests of the public, we shall endeavour to bring the debate to a termination as soon as possible. I quite admit that every honorable member has a perfect right to express his views, and no one wishes to limit that right, but I hope we shall arrive at a decision very soon, because the present time is one of great anxiety.

Question resolved in the affirmative.

House adjourned at 10.42 p.m.

Senate.

Wednesday, 28 September, 1904.

The PRESIDENT took the chair at 2.30 p.m., and read prayers.

PACIFIC CABLE CONFERENCE.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—I desire to ask the leader of the Senate, without notice, if he will lay upon the table a copy of the instructions which were given to the Earl of Jersey, as the representative of the Government at the Pacific Cable Conference, to be held in London next November.

Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON.—I ask my honorable friend to give notice of the question.

SUPPLY BILL (No. 4).

PACIFIC CABLE: PUBLIC SERVICE EXAMINATIONS: POST AND TELEGRAPH EMPLOYEES.

Bill received from the House of Representatives.

Motion (by Senator Sir JOSIAH SYMON) proposed—

That the Bill be now read a first time.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH (Western Australia).—I regret that I was not able to give the Attorney-General sufficient notice of the question which I asked just now to enable him to answer it before the Senate adjourns. The question is one of great importance, and this Parliament has a right to know what instructions were sent by the previous Government to their representative in London with regard to the Pacific Cable Conference to be held next November. I wish to correct some erroneous statements which have been circulated with regard to the Pacific Cable Company's value and usefulness. It has been stated in an influential quarter that it is a burden to Australia, and valueless to the Commonwealth. I have no hesitation in saying that a full consideration of the whole facts of the case must lead one to the conclusion that such statements cannot in any way be substantiated. From 1869 to 1902 the cabling business of Australia was absolutely in the hands of the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company. For thirty-three years that company had an absolute monopoly of all telegraphic communication to Australia, and, with a capital of a little over £1,500,000, made a profit, not altogether out of Australia, of £6,500,000. Every honorable senator must admit that that is beyond what may be called a fair trade profit, and that the company had become a great monopoly, which had to a considerable extent exploited the people of Australia for its own benefit. The cable rate which it charged was 9s. 4d. per word, including, of course, the address and the signature. That price was so extortionate that it was only possible for a wealthy company or well-to-do persons to use that means of communication. Other persons were debarred from cabling, and had to resort to the slower process of communicating by letter. In that way a very great injury was done to Australia and to commercial expansion. In every way this monopoly was proving very burdensome, expensive, and injurious to the people of Australia.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Yes; but the rate was lowered from 9s. 4d. per word before the Pacific Cable Company came into existence.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH. — Certainly.

Senator HIGGS.—But not before the agitation took place.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH. — I shall prove to the satisfaction of my honorable friend the reason why the rate was lowered.

Senator PLAYFORD.—Why did not the honorable senator say so? Why did he imply that the company charged 9s. 4d. per word?

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—If my honorable friend will only allow me to state my case, he will find that I shall do so perfectly fairly, because I know all the facts. The construction of the Pacific Cable has caused the cost of cabling to be reduced from 9s. 4d. to 3s. per word. Senator Playford has said that that statement is not correct. Before the first Conference was held in London in 1887, but subsequent to the calling of it, the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company offered to reduce the cable rate to 4s. 9d. per word, but that was done solely for the purpose of blocking the construction of the Pacific Cable. While there was no competition the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company not only insisted upon a high rate, but desired guarantees from the various States that its enormous profits should be maintained. Directly a joint proposal of various communities was broached, that another company should be started to compete with the monopoly, the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company tried to kill the movement by immediately proposing a large reduction in the rate. At the conference in London, in 1887, the Honorable Alfred Deakin made the following remarks:—

Whether the Pacific Company succeeded or not in entering upon active operations, it had already conferred a considerable benefit upon the Australasian Colonies by bringing the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company to a much more liberal frame of mind.

Mr. Deakin was a member of the Cabinet that came to an agreement with the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, which was not ratified by the Senate on my motion. Speaking in July last year, Sir Edmund Barton said—

They maintained the higher rate whilst they had an opportunity of doing so in the absence of competition; and it is a fact which must be placed to the credit account of the Pacific Cable that undoubtedly it was the expected competition of that cable which largely led to a reduction of rates on the part of the Eastern Extension Company.

I could quote dozens of extracts from various speakers, Australians, Canadians, and others, to confirm that view. There is not the slightest doubt that the company would not have reduced its rate but for the fear of competition breaking up this monopoly, and its desire to strangle that effort in its very inception. What has that reduction meant to the people of Australia? Excluding press and Government messages, which go at a lower rate, considerably over 2,000,000 words are transmitted annually. So that the reduction means a saving of considerably over £600,000 a year to the people of Australia, while Victoria alone benefits to the extent of £250,000. That is the benefit which Victoria and the other States have directly received as a result of the construction of the Pacific Cable.

Senator PLAYFORD.—The merchants get the advantage of the reduction, and the general public have to make it up.

Senator STANFORTH SMITH.—The merchants get the advantage of the reduction, but the development of trade and commerce benefits every individual. It benefits the merchants and stockbrokers directly, but it benefits all indirectly. The expenditure which Victoria has had to incur has been £10,000 a year in order to reap that enormous benefit of an annual saving of £250,000 to its people. A second advantage has been derived. When the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company reduced the rate from Australia to Great Britain to 3s. per word, it also had to reduce the rate from Australia to India, because the latter country is on the direct route, and situated about half way between Great Britain and Australia. Therefore the company reduced its rate from 4s. 10d. to 2s. 6d. per word. So that another result of the construction of the Pacific Cable has been a considerable reduction in the cost of cabling between Australia and Asia. A third advantage has been obtained. The Cape Cable, via Cocos Island, was built simply as the result of the agitation for the Pacific Cable. At the Jubilee Conference, held in London in 1887 to consider these matters, the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, in order to kill the Pacific Cable project, made a proposal to lay a cable to Great Britain from Australia. via South Africa, if the people of Australia would give it an absolute monopoly for all time of cable communication with their country. That proposal was, of course, refused. Then the company made a second proposal. It said that it would lay a cable via South Africa if Australia would give a guarantee to the extent of £100,000 a year. That proposal was also declined. Then the company started to work immediately to construct a line via South Africa with the intention of killing the Pacific Cable project. That line has given us direct cable communication with that continent, and is of enormous advantage to Australia. At the Hobart Conference, held in 1895, the representatives of the various Colonies agreed to guarantee the Eastern Extension Company to the extent of £227,000 a year. It must not be forgotten that the result of the construction of the Pacific Cable has been that we have done away with these guarantees and payments to the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company, and where we paid a certain sum to the Pacific Cable Company we benefit by stopping all subsidies to the other company. Another great advantage which will be appreciated by all Australians is that we now have direct communication with any other continent. With North America, containing a population of 100,000,000 English speaking people, we must have enormous trade relations in the future, seeing that it is situated in another hemisphere and its seasons are, consequently, different from ours. Our trade relations in the future will be enormously greater with North America, with its 100,000,000 people, than with South Africa, with its 3,000,000 or 4,000,000 of white people and coloured races. What are these meagre polyglot populations, compared with the enormous populations in North America? That is another advantage which has accrued from the construction of the Pacific Cable, completing a direct chain of cable communication between Australia and every continent on the planet. If I might summarize the advantages, I would say that the people of Australia have been saved the annual expense of £600,000 as a result of reduced cable charges, that the rate to Asia from Australia has been reduced from 4s. 10d. to 2s. 6d. per word, that we have direct communication with the continent of Africa, that we have wiped out the large subsidies and the large guarantees that we gave to the old company, that we have direct communication with the 100,000,000 people of North America, and that our trading relations with those people will increase enormously in the future. These are some of the direct advantages which we have gained from the Pacific Cable, which has been stated to be a burden to the Commonwealth, and absolutely useless. Three States are bearing the whole burden of any deficiency in the working of that cable, viz., Queensland, New South Wales, and Victoria, and as Australia's share of the loss was about £30,000 last year, each State had to provide a third of that sum. The action of New South Wales in allowing the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company unfair trading competition with the Pacific Cable Company two or three weeks after it had signed an agreement to construct the Pacific Cable, and guarantee any loss thereon, was most extraordinary. New South Wales was one of the guarantors to the Pacific Cable Company against any loss which might be incurred; but in spite of that fact, it allowed to the Eastern Extension Telegraph Company unfair privileges, which have the effect of decreasing the profits of the Pacific Cable Company, and necessitating the provision of a considerable sum to make up the deficiency. Whereas they got no benefit whatever from a monetary point of view from the Eastern Extension Company. If Victoria desired to do so, she could more than make up the loss that accrues as her share in the deficiency on the Pacific Cable. She could do that in connexion with the terminal and transit rates. The terminal and transit rates charged on cables sent both by the Pacific and Eastern Extension lines, are 5d. per word. But the division is different in each case. If a cable is sent from Victoria via the Eastern Extension Company, Victoria gets 1d. per word of that terminal rate, and South Australia gets 4d. per word. If a cable is sent from New South Wales that State gets 1d. per word, and South Australia gets 4d. Then cables sent from Broken Hill do not come through Victoria. But, with regard to the Pacific Cable, the terminal rates are divided between each State through which the message comes. If a cable is sent from Victoria via the Pacific Cable, the fivepenny terminal rate is divided equally between Victoria, New South Wales, and Queensland. Therefore, for every word that is sent from Victoria via the Pacific Cable, the revenue of Victoria benefits to the extent of practically $\frac{2}{3}$ d. per word. New South Wales benefits to the extent of $\frac{2}{3}$ d. on every message sent via the Pacific Cable because she divides the 5d. equally with Queensland. On the other hand, New South Wales receives only 1d. per word on every cable sent via South Australia. Therefore, if the eastern States liked to send their cables—or a fair proportion of them, and that is all I ask for—via the Pacific Cable, they would be able, not only largely to increase their internal revenue, but that plan would more than compensate for the loss they have to make up on the Pacific Cable. Victoria alone would benefit to the extent of more than double what she is paying now to make up the deficiency. She would not only increase her internal revenue, but those extra messages going via the Pacific Cable would turn an annual deficit into an annual surplus, and make the Pacific Cable pay directly it got a fair proportion of the Australian cable business. It seems to me that the Pacific Cable has been very unfairly treated by the people of Australia, and by some of our Legislatures. I have no personal axe to grind in this matter. Western Australia does not benefit and does not lose by the Pacific Cable. She has nothing to pay in connexion with the deficiency, and she does not send £100 worth of cables across the Pacific line. The Western Australian cables go by the Eastern Extension line, which lands at Broome and Fremantle. Western Australia gets no revenue from terminal rates from the eastern States, because no cables are sent via those lines, and she suffers no loss if the Pacific Cable does not pay even working expenses. It has been suggested that we should have what is called a joint purse; that all the revenue from the four cable lines—three belonging to the Eastern Company and the Pacific line—should be put into a joint pool. That is to say, it is suggested that we should arrange a division of the total revenue. It has also been suggested that the Pacific Cable should be leased to the Eastern Extension Company—that is, that Australia should once more be placed in the octopus grasp of a company which would have an absolute monopoly of the cabling business of Australia.

Senator HIGGS.—That is the brilliant idea of the Age.

Senator STANIFORTH SMITH.—That would mean deliberately returning to the thralldom of the monopoly under which we have been suffering for thirty-three years, and which was never broken until a new cable began to compete for business. It would not only be unfair to our partners, who in good faith have joined with us in building this British-owned cable line—unfair to New Zealand, Canada, and Great Britain—but if we look into the matter, we shall see that it would be a most unbusinesslike proceeding from an Australian point of view. It is not difficult to insure a fair division of the traffic of Australia for the Eastern Extension Company's lines, and the Pacific Cable. I do

RULINGS—

Senate:

President, The.

Address-in-Reply.—Debate on has precedence of all business, except that of a formal character, 288

Adjournment of Debate.—By grant of leave to a senator to continue his speech on another day, the debate is adjourned, and a date for its resumption must be fixed, 1523, 6088, 7390, 8199

RULINGS—President, The—continued.

- A motion to adjourn a debate cannot be discussed, 573a
- On a motion to make the resumption of a debate an order of the day for the next sitting day, a senator may move an amendment to add words fixing an hour, 8458-60
- Amendments.*—Amendment not seconded cannot be put, 361, 580
- An amendment cannot be moved unless any prior amendment is withdrawn, 2864
- A senator who has spoken to the original question and an amendment cannot afterwards move an amendment, 2872
- An amendment which is not a direct negative, can be put, 7072
- Amendment to an amendment must be disposed of before another amendment can be moved, 8463
- Anticipating Discussion.*—A senator ought not to anticipate the discussion on a motion, 401, 3145, 8170, 8177-8, or on a Bill, 4355, 8251, or on an order of the day, 1603, 7942-4
- Even on the first reading of the Appropriation Bill, a senator is debarred from discussing any matters on the notice-paper, 8178
- Bills.*—An amendment to the motion for second reading must be strictly relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill, 1517-22, 1738-9
- An amendment to a clause must be relevant to subject matter of Bill, 3243
- A Committee can consider only the matters delegated to it, 3531
- If the recommittal of an additional clause be opposed it can only be moved as an amendment to the motion, 7282
- A Bill, or part thereof, may be recommitted as often as the Senate thinks fit, 7596
- In a Bill which which has originated in the House of Representatives, it is competent, under standing order 227, for a senator to move a new amendment as an alternative to an amendment to which the other House has disagreed, and on which the Senate is asked not to insist, provided that it is not objectionable in point of substance, 8062
- Chairman of Committees* must be appointed by ballot in the case of two or more nominations, 552
- Debate.*—The remarks of a senator should be relevant to the question 6261, 6802-3, 7081, 8459, 8462-8
- The rule of relevancy applies to a motion that the Senate, at its rising, adjourn to an unusual day, but the debate must be confined to the matter of public importance introduced by the mover, 401; to a motion for a second reading of a Bill, 1777, 8458, 8586; to a motion for making an order of the day, 6802-3
- It is not the duty of the Chair to call a senator to order on the ground that his remarks are not in good taste, 555
- A senator can, in reply, introduce any relevant matter which has not been referred to in the debate, 1854
- On first reading of Bill which Senate may not amend, the rule of relevancy does not apply; but at the next stage the debate must be confined to its subject-matter, 2873, 4286, 8186, 8249

- Strictly speaking the debate on a motion to close a sitting should be relevant to the question of adjournment; but pursuant to a resolution of the previous session a senator may discuss a matter irrelevant to the motion, 2882
- The subject-matter of an order of the day cannot be discussed on the motion to adjourn the Senate, 7942-4
- In debating a "policy" speech, a senator is entitled to show that the Prime Minister is not a proper person to be at the head of the Government, 4388
- When an amendment is moved to a question after a senator has spoken, he may speak again, but his remarks must be confined to the amendment, 6273; as far as possible, 6274
- When the debate on a question has been adjourned the reasons for the adjournment cannot be discussed, 6802; nor the general question, 6803
- The same question cannot be discussed twice in a session, 7358-60
- Any clause of a Bill, or part thereof which has not been agreed to by both Houses, is open for discussion, 8062
- Where a senator has been permitted to withdraw an amendment to move it in the form in which he was inadvertently prevented by the Chair from doing, he ought not to exercise the right of speech, 8461
- The mover of an amendment has the right to speak to any amendment which may be moved thereto, 8465-6
- It is out of order to debate the question of pairs, 8457, 8468-9, 8472
- A senator should not indulge in tedious repetition, 8467
- Divisions.*—After tellers have been appointed, senators should retain their seats until the result of the division has been declared, 7806
- A call for a division cannot be withdrawn if any senator objects, 8458
- Formal Motions.*—The standing orders preclude any discussion on a motion which has been declared to be formal; but the Senate may vote thereon, 26
- It is not in accordance with the Standing Orders for the mover of a formal motion to ask leave of the Senate to make a speech thereon, though he may indicate the nature of a correction which he wishes to be made in a return, 4328
- Interruptions* are disorderly, 74, 77, 4363 4483-7, 4591, 4608, 5916, 5935, 7383, 7481, 7672, 8434, 8459
- If senators will not obey the standing order against interjecting while a ruling is being given, they will be named, 8459
- Language, Parliamentary.*—It is permissible to say that the statement of a senator is incorrect, or that a senator is stone-walling, 2088, or that the Prime Minister slanders people, 4379, or that it would be an ungracious act if the Senate refused to do a certain thing, 7666
- A senator cannot be stopped from making accusations against commercial men, so long as his remarks are in order, 6161

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order to impute to any senator dishonesty, 358; untruth, 2088, 4363, 4483, 8471 to characterize a Bill framed by the Senate as a wretched little or absurd Bill, 644 to impute to the Senate dishonesty, 2083 to reflect on the Senate, 8170; or, except when moving for its rescision, on a decision of the Senate, 8170 to say a senator deserves discredit for what he has done, 8471; or that Ministers say what is not true, 4683

to state that a debate has degraded the Chamber, 4307 to reflect upon a person in a personal explanation, 5449 to accuse Members of Parliament of indulging in any political engineering, 8419 to say there has been touting for votes against a Bill, 8458 to accuse a senator of introducing a Bill which he must know is merely waste-paper, 8571

Ministerial Statement.—A Ministerial statement cannot be made in a debate on a motion for the appointment of two senators to a Select Committee, 1245

A debate on the policy of a Government is as a rule taken before other business is called on, 4354

Unless there is some motion before the Senate, a Ministerial statement may not be made except by leave, 6151

Motions.—A motion ought not to be moved without notice unless the standing orders are suspended, and then only after routine business has been dealt with, 1462-4; but it may be moved by unanimous leave of the Senate, 1465, 6257

A motion relating to the business of the Senate may be moved by a Minister without notice, 1244

When an unexpected adjournment of the Senate is about to take place, a motion for leave of absence to a senator may be moved, by leave, without notice, 1246

The President will, at the request of any senator, order every proposition in a complicated motion to be put and voted on separately, 1522; but the request should be made before the question is put, 6439

By leave a senator may amend the terms of his motion before the question is proposed, 1585, or when he is replying, 6433, or after he has replied, 8468

It is entirely for the Senate to say whether a complicated motion shall be considered in Committee, 1585

Motion for Adjournment.—When a senator wishes to move the adjournment of the Senate under standing order 60, he ought, prior to its meeting, to furnish the President with a written statement of the matter of urgency, 3129

The passing of the Appropriation Bill does not prevent a senator from moving that the Senate, at its rising, adjourn till an unusual hour, to discuss a question which he could have discussed on the measure, 8562

RULINGS—President, The—continued.

Notices of Motion.—After the Senate has proceeded to the business of the day notice of a motion may only be given by leave, 987

Notice of motion may be received concerning the procedure of Select Committees, 4581

When two notices of motion cover the same ground, only one of them can be proceeded with, 6787, 7365

A notice of motion which attempts to anticipate the discussion of two orders of the day is not in order, and ought not to appear on the notice-paper, 7357

A senator may give notice of a motion identical in terms with a notice of motion on the notice-paper, provided that he abandon the latter; but he ought not to give notice of a motion to discuss the same question, though he can give a general notice of motion under standing order 104, provided that twenty-four hours before it comes on he hands into the Clerk the particular motion which he wishes to move, and such notice of motion does not conflict with the Standing Orders, 7358-60

It is possible to call attention to the report of a Select Committee, and to move thereon any number of motions different in substance, 7361

When a senator wishes to change the day for a motion, he can give notice to that effect under standing order 102; if he should not do so, he can afterwards move, under standing order 70, that the motion be postponed to that day, 7365, 7470-2

A notice of motion is not in order which affirms the same principle as has already been affirmed in same session by the Senate by Bill, 7365

A notice of motion is out of order if it anticipates an order of the day dealing with identically the same subject, 7365

A senator ought to comply with the requirements of standing order 98 when he gives notice of a motion, 7572

A notice of motion cannot be brought forward on the notice-paper: it may be put down for a later date, 7573

Orders of the Day.—An order of the day for the further consideration of a matter in Committee cannot be dealt with by the Senate; it is for the Committee to act, 2874

Papers ordered to be printed by either House ought to be circulated at once, 836

If to be printed, the Senate should give the necessary order when they are tabled, 836

Any senator can move at once that a paper be printed, otherwise he must give notice of a motion, 941, 5704

A senator cannot move for the printing of a paper after other business has intervened, 5450

The production of an original paper ought not to be insisted on when the Government are in possession of only a copy of it, 1468

If a senator quotes from a paper he must lay it upon the table if ordered by the Senate, 1854, and such order may be made, without

notice, immediately after the speech is concluded, 7671

Personal Explanation.—A senator may make a personal explanation in regard to some matter arising out of an answer which he has received, 4284

By the indulgence of the Senate a senator may make a personal explanation as to any matter in which his actions or words therein have been misrepresented; but he cannot attack persons or refer to attacks made upon himself in the press, 5449

Petitions.—A petition may set forth reasons why a Bill should not be passed, and may quote the debates of a previous session in the other House, 5902

A petition should be signed by a person in his own name, 7665

Points of Order.—The misrepresentation of a senator does not involve a question of order: it is a matter for personal explanation, 3234

The Chair is not called upon to interpret the Constitution, 4127, 8571, or to answer abstract questions, 7573

Privilege.—A question of privilege cannot be raised until after notices of motion, if any, have been given, 833

A refusal to supply senators with documents laid upon the table does not involve a question of privilege, 835

A senator ought to read the motion of privilege with which he intends to conclude before he proceeds with his speech, 1106

Questions upon notice.—A notice of a question cannot be read, but must be handed to the Clerk, 231

A question arising out of a reply to a question upon notice, should be relevant thereto, 5705, and not prefaced with an argument, 5706

Questions ought to be such as ask for information, and not such as give information and ask for opinions, or attack the character of an individual, 7363

Questions relative to tittle-tattle in the newspapers, and opinions of outside authorities, are not out of order, but the practice of asking them is to be deprecated, 7364

A question may be objectionable, and not out of order, 7364

Questions without notice.—A question arising out of a notice of another question cannot be put until the latter is asked, 231

A senator cannot ask a question without notice, and at the same time move a motion, 833

No argument may be offered in asking a question, 834, 1291, 2173, 4283, 7256, 8562; or in answering a question, 4283

A Minister cannot be made to answer a question, 1736

A senator can ask, without notice, any question, whether it arises out of a question asked by another senator or not, 1736

Questions may only be asked of Ministers concerning public matters generally, and of a private senator concerning any matter of which he has charge, such as a Bill, or other business before the Senate, 4283

Quotations and References.—It is not in order to refer to a debate of the same session in the other House, 5724, or in the Senate, 7079, 7294, 8469

Rulings.—If a ruling is thought by a senator to be wrong, it should be challenged in the proper way, 5450

Select Committees.—If a select committee do not report on the date fixed by the Senate, they must ask leave to report on another date, 1121

Under standing order 70, a senator cannot move for an extension of time to a Select Committee; but on the order of the day for the reception of its report being called on he may ask for further time, 4355

Where two senators have to be appointed by ballot to a Select Committee, only two names should be struck out of the ballot-paper, 1244

Where the Senate has agreed to the appointment of a Select Committee, consisting of six senators and the mover of the motion, the six senators must be chosen by ballot; and a senator can strike seven names out of his ballot-paper if he includes that of the mover, otherwise he must strike out six names, 1207-8

The mover of a motion for the appointment of a Select Committee may ask leave to substitute a name before the question is proposed, 1843

It is not a privilege, but a duty, for a senator to serve on a Select Committee; and unless excused by the Senate or a standing order, any senator appointed must serve, 1245, 1843

The granting of leave to a Select Committee to sit in another part of the Commonwealth during the sittings of the Senate will initiate a most objectionable practice, 3153-4

The Senate has a right to reflect upon the proceedings of a Select Committee, at all events, after it has reported, and to accept or ignore the report of a Select Committee, 4580

Standing Orders.—A motion to suspend standing orders, when moved without notice, cannot be carried except by an absolute majority of all the members of the Senate, 1984, 3153

Strangers.—By leave, the President may invite a distinguished stranger to take a seat within the Chamber, 4495, 6032, 6650

See BAKER, Senator Sir Richard.

President, The Acting—

Right of Speech.—The time which is allowed to a senator by standing order 62 cannot be extended, 3137

See DRAKE, Senator.

Chairman of Committees :

Bills.—On an amendment to fill the blank in a clause amendments may be moved, 1859, 1863; but a senator should refrain from moving a second amendment until the Committee has come to a decision on the first, 1981

An objection that a Bill is unconstitutional cannot be taken in Committee, 1863

An amendment to a clause cannot be moved while a prior amendment is before the Committee, 1872, 1957

A clerical error in a clause can be corrected without an amendment being moved, 1891

- An amendment to an amendment must be put first to the Committee, 1960
 An amendment to an amendment cannot be amended by the mover when objection is taken, 1964
 An amendment to a part of a clause that has been agreed to can only be moved at a later stage, 1978
 An amendment must be in writing, and signed by the proposer, 2778
 Every amendment should be relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill, 2797
 The insertion of a new clause may be moved at any time, 3534, 7109
 An amendment to insert a new definition in a "definition" clause is in order, 3656
 Proposed clauses to Trade Marks Bill in order, 4126
 Amendment not the same in substance as a rejected amendment in order, 6653
 An amendment substantially the same as one negated cannot be moved until reconsideration or recommitment of Bill, 7020
 A proviso not a contradiction, but a modification of clause, is in order, 7108
 On a motion not to insist on a Senate's amendment, omitting a proviso, a senator may move an amendment for the insertion of words in the proviso, 8060, and also for the omission of words therefrom, 8065
 The machinery clauses of a Money Bill should be postponed until the schedule has been dealt with, 8253
Debate.—When a senator makes a statement which in the opinion of another senator is not correct, no question of order is involved, 1963
 A senator is entitled to reply to a statement concerning himself, 4134
 The disclaimer of a senator ought to be accepted, 6556
 A motion not to insist on an amendment admits of considerable scope for discussion, 8077
 On Defence Estimates a senator is entitled to discuss question of the compulsory training of youths, 8392, or the conduct of any officer for whom a salary is provided, 8395
 The standing order against anticipating discussion does not extend to a question on the notice paper, 8395-7
Interruptions.—Interjections, 6543, 7096
Language, Unparliamentary.—It is out of order to attribute to a senator obstruction, 1973, or dishonesty, 6983 to reflect on a senator, 6552, 7097, 8382, 8395 to say that a senator's statement is false, 6555
 to accuse the Government of trying to delude the public, 7908
Motions not Debatable.—A motion to report is similar to a motion to adjourn a debate, and cannot be discussed, 1599
Points of Order.—It is not the duty of the Chair to decide a point of law, 4126
Quotations and References.—It is irregular to allude to any debate of the current session in the other House, 8071
 A senator may read an extract from the Hansard report of the debates of the Senate during the same session, 8391
 F.13481.—c.

RULINGS—Chairman of Committees—continued.

- Regulations.*—When regulations referred to a Committee, only a motion to disallow a regulation or part thereof may be moved, 1598
Rulings.—Objection must be in writing, 4138

See HIGGS, Senator.

House of Representatives:

Speaker, Mr.

- Amendments.*—Until an amendment to a question has been disposed of, another amendment to the question cannot be moved, 7423.
 An amendment cannot be moved by a member who has already spoken, 755, 3491
 If a member during his speech makes an intimation to that effect he may afterwards formally move an amendment, but cannot discuss it, 3519
 At the request and in the absence of the mover an amendment may, by leave, be withdrawn, 1323
 An amendment to an earlier portion of a motion cannot be moved unless the amendment to a later portion is temporarily withdrawn, 1328
 An amendment not varying a decision of the House on a motion is in order, 3598-9
 When any words have been added to a motion, no amendment prior thereto may be moved except by way of addition thereafter, 3603.
Anticipating Discussion.—On a motion for adjournment of the House, it is not out of order to discuss when a Bill should be brought on, or additional questions in connexion with it, but it would be out of order to discuss the Bill itself, 2309
 It is in order to discuss whether certain clauses proposed to be inserted in a Bill then in Committee shall be referred to an existing Royal Commission for consideration and report, 3263-5
 A discussion on the policy of a Bill before the House, or matters affected by it, cannot be allowed at question time, 2468
 No discussion can be allowed in the House on any matters connected with a Bill which is in Committee, 3262-73
 It is out of order to anticipate the discussion on a Bill, 3449, 4276, 5899, 7729, 8111, or a notice of motion, 3889, 4141, 4147, 4153, 4686, 5131, 6210, 7724, or a question, 4650, or a message from the Senate, 5860, or the Estimates of a Department, 6887-8; or a motion that is not before the Chair, 7439-40
 On a motion for special adjournment the discussion on an order of the day cannot be anticipated, 3465-7, 3727-8, 3733, 3736; nor on a motion to suspend the Standing Orders to discuss a matter of urgent necessity, 4141
 On a motion of no-confidence, only incidental references may be made to the subject-matter of a notice of motion on the business-paper, 4995-6, 5131, 5379, 5382-3
Appropriation Bills.—Where the Estimates in Chief and Estimates for Works and Railways have been separately transmitted to the House by the Governor-General, the Committee of Supply may report its two sets of resolutions separately or simultaneously, as it thinks fit, and the House may be asked in one motion to agree to them. After the resolutions of the Committee of Ways and Means have been come to, reported, and agreed to, the House, in accordance with the Constitution, will order a Bill to be prepared and brought in to carry out each set of resolutions, 7438-40

Bills.—After the question for third reading of A Bill has been put, it is too late for a member to move for the recommitment of any of its provisions, 1043

If there is no objection to the recommitment of a clause, and the question is simply as to what shall be done upon its recommitment, that matter can be most appropriately dealt with in Committee. But if there is any difference of opinion as to whether it should be recommitment that matter should be debated in the House, 4522

The reasons for disagreeing to the Senate's amendments in a Bill may be put separately, 8016

New clauses ought not to be debated until the Committee stage of a Bill is reached, 8159, 8316

The proposal of Mr. Watson to amend the Senate's additional proviso to clause 55 of the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill is not out of order, because, although by defining the words "political purposes" in that proviso it might also be held to define the meaning thereof in the previous proviso, the two matters sought to be amended are inseparably related, 7992

Chairman of Committees.—A proposal to elect a Chairman "for the current session" conflicts with rule 215, and cannot be moved, 685

Debate.—A member not holding office under the Crown cannot speak from the ministerial bench, 1289, 1662

The use of the second person by a speaker is unparliamentary: his remarks should be addressed to the Chair, 1368, 1582, 1657-8, 1661-2, 4080, 4155, 6566

A member must refer to another only by the name of the constituency he represents, 1582-3, 2112, 3333, 5252, 6566

A member should not turn his back upon the Chair and address the galleries, 4832, or other parts of the Chamber, 5547

Repeated disobedience of the calls to order by the Chair merits and must receive only one form of treatment, 1662

In a debate on the policy of the Government a member may make only incidental references to past events for the purpose of defending himself against imputations which may have been cast upon him: the scope of the debate should be confined as far as possible to the proposals of the Government, 1540-2. If a member deems an expression used on a certain occasion by the Prime Minister to be an approval of some socialistic programme, he is entitled to indicate what the nature of that programme is, 1662

A member addressing the House cannot ask a question of another member, 3510

The discussion must be relevant to the question, 220, 3262-73, 3499, 3508-9, 3521-3, 3604, 4063, 4071, 4076, 4079, 4082, 4145-7, 4157-9, 8518, 8596-8

The rule of relevancy in debate applies to—

A "formal" motion for adjournment, 2110, 3339, 3347, 3351, 3670, 3727, 5742, 6095, 6097, 6098

A motion to recommit a clause of a Bill, 4157-9, 4162, 4165, 4175-9, 4180-2, 4220, 4224, 4231, 4239, 4246-8, 4255, 4262

A motion for special adjournment, 3465-7, 4686-7

A motion for second reading of a Bill, 5593, 5604, 5938, 5943, 5945, 5958

A motion to postpone the consideration of the Orders of the Day, 6581-3

A motion to restore an Order of the Day, 6586, 6587, 6590

A motion to agree to resolutions, 7438

A motion to give precedence to Government business, 7721-4, 7729

A motion to agree to a report, 8013-4

A motion to adjourn a debate, 8710, 8550

An irrelevant interjection in no wise justifies an irrelevant speech, 87, 4076, 7724

On a motion for adjournment to discuss the distress existing through the want of employment, a member may refer to the effect of the Tariff in that regard, 3333

The standing orders preclude the discussion of any matter other than that which is immediately before the House; an irrelevant interjection cannot be held to justify an irrelevant speech thereupon, 87.

It is irregular to debate an irrelevant interjection, or even an irrelevant remark made by a speaker, more especially when it was discontinued by direction from the Chair, 3512

When two distinct issues are involved in a complicated motion, they may be discussed separately, by unanimous consent, but not otherwise, 3484-5

Every member is entitled to place his views before the House, even though they may be views from which every other member dissents, 3726

On the question that a clause of a Bill be recommitment in order that its proviso may be replaced by another, the two alternatives may be debated, 4065

The question of the dissolution of Parliament or otherwise is within the prerogative of the Governor-General, and must not be debated, 4141

On a motion to suspend the Standing Orders to discuss a matter of urgent necessity, a member has the right to use any reasonable arguments on the point, 4142-3; and his remarks should be relevant to the question, 4145-9, 4153. He cannot discuss the subject which he wishes to debate if the motion be carried, but he may give, as fully as he pleases, the reasons why he thinks the Standing Orders should be suspended, 4147, 4150-1

A member who has not spoken, may reply to anything relevant said by any other member, 4154

On a motion to suspend the Standing Orders, to pass a Supply Bill, a member may argue that the Government have not the confidence of the House; but it would be more convenient if he dealt with the matter on the Bill itself, 4269

The Standing Orders do not require an assurance that a statement is incorrect to be accepted, but amongst gentlemen it is always done, 4345, 5247

On a motion of no-confidence in the Government, the remarks of a member should be connected with the question under discussion, 4774, 4828, 4880, 4955, 5034-9, 5194-5, 5332, 5399, 5401, 5553, 5557; he is entitled to reply to any allegations made by previous speakers, 4996, 5539, 5553-5, but not to discuss the acts of a private member in a State Parliament, 5401, except when that member has referred to them, 5402

On a motion for adjournment of the House, it is not competent for a member to discuss matter relating to an adjourned debate, unless what he desires to say relates to some urgent matter, and he obtains leave to make a statement, 5216

Members should make a stronger effort to uphold the dignity of debate, 5289

On a no-confidence motion the conduct of Ministers may fairly be discussed. But the conduct of Ministerial supporters may only be discussed in so far as they have spoken during the debate, and expressed views one way or the other, 5539

A remark in reference to the fairness of a Select Committee, interjected by a member, and requested to be withdrawn by the member speaking, cannot be withdrawn at that stage, 5858

On a motion for the second reading of a Bill, to provide for a bonus, a discussion on the relative merits of protection and free-trade cannot be allowed; but a member may incidentally refer to the possibility of a protective duty being required later on to assist the industry, 5943-4; and he may instance any analogous case, 5958-9

Unless a speaker complies with the direction of the Chair to connect his remarks with the question before the House, he must resume his seat, 5958, 8154

On a motion to restore an Order of the Day, anything relating to the necessity for the motion is in order, 6565; the policy of the Government cannot be discussed, 6586

The Standing Orders do not prevent a discussion on a question, even though it may be under consideration in some other form by a Select Committee of the House, 7115

On a motion to agree to resolutions of the Committee of Supply, a member is entitled to discuss a matter which could have been dealt with on the Estimates for a Department, 7441

On a motion to give precedence to Government business, a member may discuss the order in which a notice of motion and an order of the day, under the head of general business for that day, should be discussed, 7720

On a motion to adopt the Committee's report on the Senate's amendments to a Bill, a member may discuss the amendments, but not the general aspect of the measure, 8013-4

The debate on a question is closed when the mover has spoken in reply, 8110

In dealing with the second or third reading of an Appropriation Bill, a member cannot discuss a question of policy concerning anything which is not strictly provided for by the Bill, 8111-2, 8143-7. On a motion to adjourn the debate a member may advocate the adjournment, on the ground that it will enable the House first to receive information as to the scope of a Royal Commission, so long as he does not go into matters of detail, 8148-54

On a motion relative to preferential trade, a member cannot discuss the question of protection or free-trade, 8347-8; or the question of wages as affected by a fiscal policy, 8502

Debate, Adjournment of.—A member cannot conclude his speech with a motion to adjourn the debate, 1610, 3274, 6210; but he may ask leave to continue his speech on a later day, 5861.

When the mover of a motion objects to the adjournment of the debate on the ground that he wishes to exercise his right of reply, his proper course is to vote against it, 1914

Divisions.—A division cannot be taken unless it is called for, at once, by at least two members, 807

Interjections and Interruptions.—Interruptions are disorderly, 86-7, 121, 143-4, 145, 463, 480, 482, 529, 600, 934, 1387, 1414, 1566, 1573, 3333, 3347, 4032, 4154, 4220, 4423, 4818, 4951, 4961, 4972, 5044, 5055-6, 5069, 5205-6, 5210, 5239, 5240, 5263, 5314, 5492, 5514, 5580, 5740, 5939, 6207, 6214, 6298, 7728

A member should not interject when the Speaker is addressing the House, 529, 4154, 4822

A member should not provoke another member to interject, 600

The Prime Minister should be given a patient hearing when he is setting before the House the policy of his Government, 1283

It is improper for members to interject continually, 1341, 1381, 1406, 1652, 1659, 3348, 5006, 5050, 5109, 5210, 5314, 5555, and particularly to interject by remarks to each other across the Chamber, 1341

It is very disorderly for a Minister to interject across the table, 1348, 4154-5, 4968, 5747

A member is not in order in interrupting a speech in order to contradict a statement therein made; he can make an explanation, if he desires, when the speech is concluded, 1382, 4964

Members should make only such interjections as appear to them to be absolutely called for, and should not interrupt the speaker, 1383, 5432-3

A speech should not take the form of a dialogue, 1652, 5439

Members should not converse in loud tones, but should give their attention to the speaker, 1300, 2372, 4691

Members should either refrain from conversing with each other, or converse in such a tone that the speaker will not be interrupted, 3036

Interjections are disorderly, but conversations across the Chamber are grossly disorderly, 3879, 4195, 4423, 4445, 4771, 4951, 4972, 5045, 5063, 5312, 5514, 5938

A member ought to remove his hat before he interjects, 3447

Members should listen to the speaker, without striving by interjection to force him to express their views instead of his own, 3726, 5107

It is not permissible for a member to read an extract during the speech of another member, 4461

In his speech a member should not make remarks which almost demand an answer by another member, 5050, 5439

Members who distinctly and repeatedly disobey the Chair will have to be named, 4197, 4809, 4951, 7727

If members do not make a more dignified use of the liberties they enjoy, the extreme course of naming them within the meaning of the Standing Orders will be adopted, and the procedure will be followed by suspension for such term as the House may direct, 5063

After the conclusion of a debate in which of necessity special liberty was allowed to members, proper decorum should be observed, and the rules of the House against interruptions complied with, 5580

Interjections which are short and of rare occurrence are not objected to, but those which are so frequently made and so long as to interrupt a speaker cannot be allowed, 5780

Not only is it disorderly to interrupt by interjection, but it is equally disorderly to interrupt by loud laughter, 6569

Exchanges across the Chamber which deal purely with personal matters, and not with the question before the Chair, are entirely out of order, 7726

Language, Parliamentary.—It is not out of order to say that the issue in New South Wales, at the general elections, was a "dirty issue," 86; or that the remarks of a member have sometimes been "very rude," 3464; or that a statement made to a member is untrue, 3510, 5062; or that a statement in a newspaper is untrue, 4416; or that a member is monetarily interested in the Denton Hat Mills, 5378; that the intention of members generally is to waste time, 6591; or that the interjections of a member are a source of annoyance, 7727

Unless the remarks of a member are unparliamentary, they cannot be ruled out of order, on the ground that they are contrary to good taste, 6502

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is not in order to describe the conduct of a member as cowardly, 86; or buffoonery, 3347; or to speak of "his wiles, his turns, his tricks, his subterfuges, and his appeals for votes," 4223 to say a member's statement is untrue, 93, 517, 599, 668, 1343, 1661, 1664, 3439, 3510, 3738, 4186, 4221, 4224, 4231, 4255, 4409, 4733, 4829, 4961, 5062, 5116, 5219, 5285, 5430, 5573, 5583, 5850, 5946; or blackguardly, 3612; or false, 5103, 5574; or mad, 6585

to refer to a member as a slanderer, 669; as "my republican brother," 2112; as a mountebank, 4229, or as a sand-bagger, 4262; as a political hypocrite, 4823; as half a lunatic, 5400; as "a ridiculous political ass," 5945; as a nuisance, 7431 to designate the answer to a question as an official falsehood, 1560; or an amendment as a despicable trick, 4030; or language of a member as "Fenian," 4823 to allege that a member has been trying to square twenty members, 3611; or would be open to accept a bribe, 3612; or was not sober, 5050; or is a gentleman the reverse of the highest type, 5741; or attempted to mislead the House, 5748; or that his action is an indecent shuffle, 6213 to charge the House, or any section thereof, with resorting to despicable methods, 4151

to characterize one-half of the charges of any members as being malevolent and the other half as false, 4232 to impute to a member a desire to bribe any members, 4255; or unworthy motives, 5289, 5793 to say that on the previous evening a member was "pulled down," 4261 to accuse a member of bribery, 5045; or of lying, 5575; or of wasting time, 6591 to apply to any members the term "assassination," 5247; or "asses," 5392 to say that any member of the Parliament has stolen anything, 5546 to reflect upon a member, 5741; or upon the action of the Chair, 7727 to hint at a suspicion of corruption on the part of a member, 5792-3 to cast a slur on the House, 5792 to speak of a section of the House as a servile or slavish majority, 6591 to repeat a statement, 6885 to describe a member's speech as drivel, 7428 to allege that the Government resort to contemptible and miserable tactics, 7724, or to contemptible tricks, 7725

to request a member to shut his mouth, 7726

to assert that any ruling is unfair, 8110 to charge the Prime Minister with laughing at the case of starving men, 8153

A remark must be withdrawn which is regarded as offensive, 3335, 3464; or as objectionable, 4147, 4158, 4164, 4231, 4248; 5205; or as displeasing, 4851, 5252

A remark ruled out of order must be clearly withdrawn, 93

An unparliamentary remark should be withdrawn without qualification, 1343, 5050; or argument, 3510; or remark, 5573

If a phrase used by another member is objected to by the speaker, it must be withdrawn, 1662

A remark to which the Chair cannot take exception, but which is considered by a member to reflect upon himself, should be withdrawn, 2309

An unparliamentary statement cannot be reasserted, 3510; or practically repeated in another form, 3612

Personal remarks about a member's status are not in order, 4508

RULINGS—Speaker, Mr.—continued.

- If a member desires a statement to be withdrawn he is entitled to have his request complied with, 4509
- If a member is offended by any remark from a speaker, he has a perfect right to ask for its withdrawal, 7727
- Ministerial Statement.—A Ministerial statement relative to a matter in Committee on a Bill cannot be made in the House without leave, 2696
- No Minister has the right to make a statement to the House without leave, 6884
- It is always open to the Prime Minister to lay a paper on the table, and to make any remarks he may desire in connexion with the motion that it be printed, except that in that regard he has no privileges which any other member does not possess, 6884-5
- A Ministerial statement relative to the Tariff Commission should be made after the questions upon notice have been disposed of, 7522
- Motions.—A motion requires to be seconded, otherwise it cannot be debated, 336-7, 6889
- A member may intimate his desire to have a notice of motion standing in his name set down for another day, 2185
- After the mover of a motion has concluded his speech, the motion cannot be altered except by way of amendment, 1313, 2383
- A motion to refer to a Royal Commission certain clauses proposed to be inserted in a Bill before a Committee is in order, 3463
- A motion cannot be withdrawn, except by leave, 7722
- A motion cannot be moved without notice, except by leave, 8476
- Motions for Adjournment.—A member is required to hand to the Chair a statement of the purpose for which he desires to move the adjournment of the House, 2521
- The debate on a formal motion for adjournment cannot exceed the allotted time unless the orders of the day be postponed, 3348, 3740
- A member must obtain leave before he can move the adjournment of the House to discuss a particular subject, 3726
- After the adjournment of the House is moved (at conclusion of sitting), it is not competent to move another motion, 5286
- Even though the Estimates are under consideration in Committee, a member may move the adjournment of the House to discuss a matter personal to himself, and affecting him in his representative capacity, 6080; but a convenient rule is for an attack on a member or on the House to be dealt with on a question of privilege, or in a personal explanation, 6098
- A motion to adjourn the House to an unusual day may be moved without notice by a Minister, 6298
- A member having moved the adjournment of the House cannot amend his motion, 6888
- The adjournment of the House cannot be moved by a member to debate a question which he will be at liberty to discuss the same day on the first item of the Estimates for a Department, 6887-8

- The fact that five members support a motion for adjournment is conclusive evidence of its urgency; but it is out of order when it is moved if it anticipates the discussion of a question on the notice-paper, 6888-9
- A motion for adjournment should relate to one definite question, 7206, 7212
- Orders of the Day.—When two hours have elapsed since the meeting of the House, the orders of the day must be called on, unless otherwise determined, 6580
- In the case of a count-out in Committee of Supply, it is in order in the one motion to move first that the consideration of the business be resumed, and secondly, that a date be fixed for its resumption, 6569
- Papers.—With general concurrence original papers may be returned, when applied for, in any case where it appears improbable that they will be further required, 2018
- Original papers which it is considered inadvisable to copy, can be placed by the Minister upon the table in the Library, 2018; but the Librarian cannot guarantee the safety of any document in a file, 2184
- There is no authority or practice warranting the distribution, as a paper of the House, of a paper prepared by a member, unless it has been laid on the table, and the Printing Committee has authorized the printing of it, 7112
- Personal Explanation.—A member cannot make an explanation during the speech of another member, 116, 4964, 5342, 5574, 5583, even with his permission, 116, unless the unanimous consent of the House is given, 1387
- An explanation is allowed to be made at the conclusion of a member's speech, 3599, 4458, 5342; but not after the mover of the motion has replied, 5589
- A personal explanation by a member is not open for debate, 1393, 4685, 4812, 4824, 4960, 5560, 5938, and should be free from argument, 1657, 4518, 4684, 4825, 4834, 5047; and from new matter, 5048, 5052
- A member making a personal explanation cannot continue from that explanation into a speech, 4231-2
- If it is the pleasure of the House a member may make a second personal explanation, 1668
- In making a personal explanation, a member ought not to traverse, except incidentally and most briefly, any matters which another member in his speech was prevented by the Chair from continuing to discuss, 1672-3
- A member may make an explanation concerning any statement of his own; but he cannot challenge the statements of any other member, or ask that certain questions shall be answered at a later stage, 3245
- The prohibition of debate on a personal explanation precludes explanation after explanation being made, first by way of attack, and then by way of reply, 4834
- A member is only entitled to explain any remarks in respect of which he has been misunderstood or misrepresented, 4824, 4960, 5045, 5052, 5113, 5160-1, 5560
- A personal explanation may be made by a member in regard to a speech delivered outside the House by another member, who is

- at liberty to make a rejoinder, provided that it is in the nature of a personal explanation, 4917
- A personal explanation by a member cannot be allowed as a reply to what another member has said, 5045, 5559, 5560, or to an interjection, 5052; but the House may be asked for leave to make a statement, 5052, 5161, 5216
- A member is at perfect liberty in the House to explain the circumstances under which a certain course was taken in Committee; but he cannot reflect upon the Chairman, 6884
- Petitions.*—The questions for receiving and for reading a petition are put separately, if so desired, 489
- It is for the Printing Committee to recommend whether a petition or any part of it shall be printed; a member may not move that a petition be printed unless he declares his intention to take action upon it, 489
- A petition praying the House not to pass the Conciliation and Arbitration Bill (although stating views at great length) is in order, 490
- A petition containing no prayer is informal and cannot be received, 3223
- The omission of the words "in Parliament assembled" does not invalidate a petition, 8306
- Points of Order.*—The motive of a member in the course he has taken is not a point of order, 3737
- No question of order is involved in a refusal to accept the denial of a member, 5247; or in a statement that a member is monetarily interested in the Denton Hat Mills, 5378; or in a question of good taste, 6592
- Every member has the right to raise a point of order whenever he may please; but members should abstain, as far as practicable, from taking points of order again and again and rely upon the watchfulness of the Chair, 4178
- A general discussion on a point of order is irregular, 7991
- Private Business.*—There is no standing order that when orders of the day are taken first, notices of motion shall be called on at the expiry of two hours; but, in accordance with the desire of members, the time on Thursday afternoons will be equally divided between orders of the day and notices of motion, 7423
- It is not out of order for the Prime Minister to move a motion, on notice, to give precedence to Government business, 7718
- Privilege.*—The failure of a member to elicit the opinion of the Government on any subject does not involve a question of privilege, 3034
- The misrepresentation of one member by another outside the House does not involve a question of privilege, 4917
- A member may state in such manner as he may desire, but at not too great length what the question of privilege is, or he may conclude with a motion, 4917
- Questions on notice.*—A member may hand in a notice of a question to the Clerk at any time during a sitting, 143

- Where the question of a member has not elicited the desired information, it cannot be allowed to remain on the notice-paper unless a request to that effect be made, 2520; nor can the matter be regarded as a question of privilege, 3034
- A Minister should not discuss a question to which he is replying, 6099
- Questions without notice.*—A member in asking a question is not permitted to express an opinion or discuss the matter, 456, 2426, 2428, 2468, 2654, 2656, 3033, 7489
- A question without notice cannot be asked after the questions upon notice have been answered, 2696
- A question arising out of another question should not be asked until the latter has been answered, 3070
- A question addressed to a Minister may be answered, first, by the Prime Minister, and then by the Minister addressed. The Prime Minister, by virtue of his office, may reply to any question of policy, 6882
- Questions addressed to one Minister may be answered by another, but one private member cannot reply for another, 6882
- Questions may only be addressed to private members in respect of any business of which they have charge, 6885, 7410, 8093
- Quotations and References.*—It is not in order to refer to anything that has taken place or is pending in the Senate, 91, 2606, 3610; or to its business-paper, 8200
- to allude to the religious belief of parliamentary candidates, 221
- to refer to debates in another place, 2112
- to allude to a previous debate of the session, 3270, 3730, 4170, 4687, or to a debate that is pending, 4141, 4143, 4153, 5899, except by leave, 5216
- to quote from a letter an expression to the effect that a member's statement to the House was false, 3633
- A member is allowed, on the motion for adjournment, to refer to a previous debate for the purpose of making a personal explanation; but he is not permitted to exceed the limits of a personal explanation, 1393, 1672
- A member is not allowed on the motion for adjournment, to refer to a debate pending, 5045
- A member cannot be prevented from quoting from a State parliamentary paper an extract reflecting upon another member, 5045
- When an allusion has been made by one member to a previous debate of the session, subsequent speakers may refer to his statement, though remarks in reference to past debates, and casting reflections on the previous actions of members, are very undesirable, 6584
- The course of referring in the House to the proceedings in Committee is not a desirable one; but, as a matter of privilege or personal explanation, a member may refer to an occurrence in Committee, 6883-4
- Right of Speech.*—A member cannot discuss a motion to adjourn a debate until it is seconded, 336-7, 5894
- By leave a member may continue his speech on a subsequent day, 353, 832, 1287, 1393, 2896, 3275, 6210, 7732

When the time allowed for the consideration of notices of motion has expired, the speaker may either ask leave to continue his speech on another occasion, or move the postponement of the orders of the day, until after its conclusion, 7732; or he may ask leave to continue his speech on the present occasion, 8108

To ask a question on the motion for adjournment is to exercise the right of speech, 1289

An inquiry by a member on a motion forms part of the debate, 8110

A member is only entitled to speak to a formal motion of adjournment for the prescribed time, 3349, 5752

Where a member was understood by the Chair to rise only for the purpose of making a personal explanation he cannot proceed to discuss the question, but must await his turn to be heard, 4231-2

After the mover of a motion has commenced his reply a member who has not spoken to the question cannot speak except by leave, 4690-1

When the mover of a motion has replied, no further speeches are allowable, 5589

Where one member moved the recommitment of certain clauses of a Bill, and another member concluded his speech on the motion by moving an amendment, and the debate being confined to the amendment until it was disposed of, the only members who cannot speak to the motion when the debate is resumed are those two, 4522

When a member asks for an adjournment of the debate, and proceeds to say that he will offer only a few remarks, he is held to have begun his speech on the question, 5859

A member cannot speak to a motion which has been withdrawn by leave, 6478

No member, whether the Prime Minister, or any other, has any right to make a statement, without the leave of the House. There must be some matter before the Chair to enable any member to speak, 6884

The mover of a motion is not enabled to answer a question by any speaker until he exercises his right of reply, 8016

The rights of the mover and seconder of a motion to adjourn a debate are not interfered with when the motion is negatived, 8551

Rulings.—A member ought either to observe the ruling of the Chair, or to move that it be disagreed with, 4247-8, 6888

Select Committees.—After a motion for appointing a Select Committee has been moved no substitution of a name may be made, except by way of amendment, 1313

Unless a Select Committee has obtained leave to report the minutes of evidence from time to time, its proceedings cannot be reported in the press, 1524

Standing Orders.—Any motion that would violate the terms of a standing order could not be accepted by the House, 685

On a motion to suspend the Standing Orders to discuss a matter of urgent necessity, the mover may proceed until the Chair should find it necessary to interpose, 4141, 4145-7

It is quite competent for the House to suspend the Standing Orders for one purpose or for more than one, 4149

RULINGS.—Speaker, Mr.—continued.

The debate on a motion to suspend the Standing Orders is restricted by standing order 119, 4155

A motion to suspend the Standing Orders may, by leave, be moved without notice, 4542, 7510

The suspension of the Standing Orders should not be moved until the necessity has arisen, 7438

Strangers.—By leave, a distinguished stranger may be invited to take a seat within the Chamber, 6088

See HOLDER, Sir F. W.

Speaker, Mr. Deputy.

Section 36 of the Constitution does not prevent the Chairman of Committees from relieving the Speaker in the chair during a sitting of the House, 686

Anticipating Discussion.—On a motion for the House to adjourn to an unusual date a member may refer to the work which might otherwise be done, but he cannot discuss the business on the notice-paper, 3893

Subpoena to Clerk.—By leave of the House the Clerk or an officer of his staff may obey a subpoena from a Court to attend and produce a writ, 2466

See SALMON, Hon. C. C.

Chairman of Committees.

Anticipating Discussion.—A member cannot anticipate the discussion of a notice of motion, 6008-9, 6025, 6303, 6314-5, though an incidental reference to the subject may be made, 6016, 6143

By leave, a Minister may make a statement before the Estimates of his Department are reached, 6383

It is out of order to anticipate the discussion on a clause, 2625; or an item in the Estimates, 6429; or an amendment, 7562, 7961

Bills.—An amendment cannot be moved in a portion of the clause preceding that with which the Committee is dealing; it may be moved at a later stage, 2197

An amendment cannot be withdrawn except by leave, 2289; or if one member objects, 7350

An amendment cannot be altered by the mover if one member objects, 7540

If it is the pleasure of the Committee, a clause may be put paragraph by paragraph, 2384

If an amendment to an amendment is relevant it is in order, 2850, 2990

An amendment to omit words precludes the moving of an amendment to amend these words, 3940

The Committee on a Bill is not bound by the result of a ballot in the House as to the filling of a blank in a clause, 3947

The insertion of a new clause cannot be moved until the clauses in the Bill have been disposed of, 4677

An amendment to a proposed new clause must be disposed of before another amendment can be moved, 7350

An amendment involving the same question as a previous amendment cannot be moved in the same Committee, 7539

Only that part of a clause which has not been agreed to is open to amendment, 7546

Once an amendment to the later part of a question is moved, the earlier part cannot be amended, 7557; except by concurrence, 8356

A proposition to limit the operation of a clause should be moved as a proviso to that clause, and not as a new clause, 7558

It is not competent for the Committee to give definitions to those parts of a Bill to which the Senate has agreed, 7985

Where an amendment of the Senate takes the form of a proviso to a clause, only the proviso is open to amendment. A proposal to add to a proviso words which travel beyond its scope, is out of order, 7989, but it may be brought in order by a decision of the Committee against the ruling of the Chair, 7989

Misprints in Bills need not be altered by motion, 8218

It is competent for a member to move any amendment to the short title of a Bill which is not contrary to the principle, 8219

It is not in order to move to amend "manufactures" by inserting the letter "r" before the letter "s"; the substitution of "manufacturers" for "manufactures" should be moved, 8219

It is not in order to alter the destination of proposed bonuses, 8220

Debate.—On an amendment to an amendment the remarks of a member should be confined to the question, 2008, 2012, 7537; except where the words proposed to be inserted in the amendment convey no meaning by themselves, 3012

When it is understood by the Chair that a member intends to conclude with an amendment which will necessitate the withdrawal of the amendment before the Committee the rule of relevancy is not enforced, 3971

A member may read a newspaper while another member is addressing the Committee, 1992

When an amendment is pending, so much of the clause as has not yet been agreed to is open for discussion, 2048

A motion as to the expediency of making an appropriation for the purposes of a Bill may be debated, 2239

On a motion to report progress a member may discuss the Bill before the Committee, 2648

The denial of a member should be accepted, without comment, 2745, 7951

The conduct of the Chief Justice of New South Wales ought not to be discussed, 2645, 2808

A member is entitled to discuss a matter which is likely to come within the scope of an amendment to an amendment, 2902

A member who has been called by the Chair may give way to another member, 2991

Ordinarily only the clause before the Chair may be discussed; but with consent a general discussion may take place on the first clause of a new part proposed to be introduced into the Bill, 3094

When the discussion on the merits of the sites proposed for the Seat of Government is concluded progress with the Bill must be reported, and a ballot then taken, 3618

A member should not be referred to by his name, 3859, but by the name of his constituency, 7447

The front bench on the right hand of the Chair is reserved for Ministers, 3949. A member may occupy any convenient seat on any other bench, 7967

A member should not adopt the interrogative form of speech, 3969, 7188

A speaker has no right to ask categorical questions of members, 6014

A member may reply to any statements made in debate so long as he keeps within legitimate limits, 6016

The rule as to relevancy applies to an item in the Estimates, 6303, 6318-9, 6598, 6644, 6752, or to a division, 6745, 6748, 7029, 7327

On the vote for the Public Service Commissioner a member may not discuss the salaries paid to officers, save in regard to the increases for which the classification scheme provides, 6430, 6610

When the Estimates for a Department are being taken in sub-divisions, the rule of relevancy applies; but with concurrence the sub-divisions may be put as one, and a general discussion may take place, 6625

A matter cannot be discussed on a division of the Estimates which does not provide for any expenditure therefor, 6631

Although the Chair has acquiesced in an irregular discussion on the first item in the Estimates for a Department, it cannot allow irrelevant questions to be discussed, 6710, 6725, 6737, 6742, 6744, 6748.

Irrelevant discussion is not permitted on a motion to dissent from a ruling, 6749

The Chair cannot accept a motion that a member be no further heard, 6750

Continued irrelevance or tedious repetition by a member may be reported by the Chair to the Committee, 6751

Mr. Webster is guilty of tedious repetition, 6752, and on the ground of continued irrelevance and tedious repetition is directed to discontinue his speech, 6753. He may appeal to the Committee against the direction of the Chair, but the question that he be further heard cannot be debated, 6753. The responsibility for taking this action rests with the Chair, 6759

The Chair cannot intervene until an offence has been committed, 6770

Members should conclude their inquiries before the Minister replies, 7028

The principle of a Bill should not be discussed on an amendment to a clause, 7565

A vote on an amendment to alter the wording of an amendment to a clause does not decide the whole question, 7563

A discussion as to the Senate's amendments in a Bill ought not to take place in the absence of a motion, 7621, 7632. The discussion may be of a general character, 7643, but confined to the amendments, 7657, 7748, 7752. Afterwards, a member must confine his remarks to the particular amendment before the Committee, 7835, 7846, 7852-3, 7854, 7855, 7887, 7889, 7950, 7966-8, 7972, 7974, 7995-6.

RULINGS—Chairman of Committees—continued.

There can be no discussion without a question being submitted to the Committee, 8600

A member in his speech is allowed incidentally to ask questions of Ministers, but not to ask categorical questions in regard to an irrelevant matter, 8612

Divisions.—A member calling for a division must vote with those who, in the opinion of the Chair, were in the minority, 2202

Interruptions.—Conversations, 1135, 2551, 2711, 4528, 6244, 6700, 8613; interjections, 2042, 2435

A request from the Chair for order should be complied with by every member, 2562, 2682, 2711, 2742

It is out of order for a member to anticipate his speech on the question by interrupting the speaker, 3841, 7187-8

A member cannot interrupt the speaker in order to correct a statement, 4268

Questions ought not to be put to the Treasurer during the delivery of the Budget speech, 5675

Language, Parliamentary.—It is not out of order to say "it is a disgrace to allow a man who is distrusted in that way to appoint a Commission like this," 7447; or to ask who prepared a member's brief, 7747; or to use the term "brutal majority," when stating a supposititious case, 7866

Language, Unparliamentary.—It is out of order to say that the statement of another member is untrue, 1204, 2804, 7240, 7453, 7463, 7755; or a malicious libel, 1950 to remark that a member has made a statement which he knows to be incorrect, 7453, 7755 to assert that a member did not believe one word that he said, 1814; had organized a big strike, 1950; is a sham, 2079; or a paid agitator, 2566; or is acting unjustly, 3818; or played a contemptible part, 7462 to characterize the action of a member as dirty and contemptible, 2243; or foul and contemptible, 2567 to reflect on the Chair, 2009; or any member, 2079, 8603; or a vote of the House, 3988; or a decision of the Committee, 8615 to say that any members are throwing dust in the eyes of the workers, 2908; or wasting time in discussing an item, 6431; or are not in a fit state to discuss the Estimates, 6768; or are called upon to rob the public, 8221

to apply to a member the word "untruthfully," 3629 to convey a threat of obstruction, 6751 to instruct the Chairman as to his duty, or to contradict him, 6752 to describe any members as howling dingoes, 6749; or as a pack of dingoes, 6769; or as a brutal majority, 7866

to speak of a member as "that man," 7447 to reflect on members who supported a point of order, 8006

to say that a Bill has been carried up to its present stage only by trickery and misrepresentation, 8220 to describe a Bill as a political job, or to say that it has all the appearance of a political job, 8221

to refer to expressions which have been withdrawn, 8224 to ascribe to another member intentions by which he says he is not governed, 8225

A member should withdraw a remark which, to another member, is distasteful, 1950, 2240; or objectionable, 2009, 7453; or offensive, 2240, 7755; or is regarded as a personal reflection, 7855

An unparliamentary remark must be withdrawn, 2009, 2079; and its withdrawal must be unconditional, 2009, 3630, 8221; and without implication, 6769; or qualification, 7453

Points of Order.—A second point of order cannot be taken until the first is decided, 2566

Where a matter has been referred by the House to a Committee for consideration it is not competent for the Chair to entertain an objection that it anticipates the discussion on an order of the day, 7421

Questions to the Chair.—Any member has the right to seek information from the Chair by means of a question, 2202

Quotations and References.—A member cannot refer to a question which has been dealt with by the Committee, 2908; or to the position of a Bill in the Senate, 6764

Unless an extract is pertinent to the question before the Committee it cannot be read, 3371, 7752

Only incidental references may be made to a matter not relevant to the question before the Chair, 6012; but an incidental reference by one member cannot be discussed by another, 6318

A member can only quote those portions of an Act which affect an officer whose salary is being discussed, 6751

It is out of order to read an extract referring to a debate in the House during the same session, 6763

Right of Speech.—A member cannot be heard after the question has been put to the Committee, 1731; but if the leader of the House has no objection the question may be put again from the Chair, and any member who rises may be heard, 1732

The practice of the Chair has been to keep a list of intending speakers, and call on a member from each side alternately, 2583; but in future no lists will be kept, and the parliamentary rule will be observed, 2650

Rulings.—The substance of a ruling should be embodied in a motion of dissent, 6748

A direction to a member to discontinue his speech is not a ruling or decision, and, therefore, a motion of dissent cannot be moved, 6753, 6757

The withdrawal of a point of order as to the relevancy of an amendment does not absolve the Chair from giving a ruling, 7988

An objection to a ruling is required by the standing order to be decided by the Committee; but if it is so desired Mr. Speaker's opinion on the point of order may be obtained, 7089

Supply.—Where it is the desire of the Committee an amendment to reduce the proposed vote for a subdivision will not preclude the moving of an amendment to an item therein, 5982

The consideration of a question which has been stated from the Chair cannot be postponed, 6312

By concurrence votes may be taken on divisions, 6743, or the subdivisions of a division may be put separately, 6746, 7219

Ways and Means.—Where two motions have been proposed at the same time they will be put separately if desired by any member; but if put together it would not prevent the introduction of separate Bills, 7443
